MR. BUCHANAN: Would it not be possible to refer the question of fishing rights in Scotland to the same Committee that the Government have expressed their intention of appointing, and will the Government say that until that inquiry is carried out no more sales of Crown rights in fishing will be made?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): There has been no undertaking whatever to appoint a Committee. In the course of the debate to which reference has been made an impression was formed in my own mind, and gave expression to that impression; but there was no pledge whatever, and the statement just made by the First Lord of the Treasury ought, it seems to me, to satisfy the hon. Member. If it should be found that the matter cannot be satisfactorily dealt with by one Committee, it will be the duty of the Government to consider the matter; but meantime the hon. Member is aware of the promise given by the Treasury on the subject.

CIVIL LIST PENSIONS.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the following recommendations with respect to Civil List pensions, which are contained in a work undertaken for and published by the Incorporated Society of Authors; that the sum of £1,200 be yearly voted for the purpose of assisting distinguished men and women of letters, art, and science, by granting pensions when they have arrived at the age of 55, or are incapacitated from work by ill-health, mental or bodily, and their widows or daughters, if they are in distressed circumstances; that under no circumstances whatever shall any portion of the money be granted to any persons for public services in the Army, Navy, or any Civil Department, to the Sovereign or to the Country, or to widows, children, or relations of such persons; and, whether he will consider the advisability of adopting any or all of these recommendations?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not aware of, nor have I seen, the publication alluded to by the hon. Member; but the recommendation seems to be that a sum of £1,200 should be placed on the Estimates for providing pensions for distinguished men and women of letters, art, and science. I have great doubts as to the expediency of submitting such a proposition to the House. The language of the second recommendation is of a very involved nature, but the answer I have given above will probably be sufficient.

SUGAR BOUNTIES.

MR. PIOTON (Leicester): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (Baron H. de Worms) when he proposes to bring in the Bill made necessary by the Sugar Bounties Convention?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS): That is a Question for my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House.

MR. PIOTON: Then perhaps the First Lord of the Treasury will tell me when the Bill will be brought forward?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not in a position to say when that Bill will be introduced, but full notice will be given of it.

CONVERSION OF STOCK.

MR. MOLLOY (Queen's County, Birr): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if it be a fact that he has cancelled a considerable portion of the outstanding Three Per Cent Consolidated Debt, by exchanging it for Local Loans Stock at a price below the quotation current in the market, and how much below the current quotation; by what means he obtains command of the Local Loans Stock for this purpose; and, whether he proposes to increase the Floating Debt to the extent of the uncanceled portion of the Three Per Cents by an issue of Exchequer bonds, and so burden the market with that form of security?

*MR. GOSCHEN: It is a fact that the National Debt Commissioners have bought a considerable amount of the outstanding Three per Cents, though not so large an amount as I have seen stated in the Press, and have also sold Local Loans Stock to some of the parties from whom they bought those Three per Cents. In fixing the price at which to sell the Local Loans Stock, the Commissioners have been able to arrive at, and to act upon, the closest possible estimate of its market value in large amounts, from the fact that tenders amounting to £7,000,000 were lately received for the two and a-half millions of Local Loans Stock offered to the public. The terms of such tenders afford something like an infallible test of the present market value of the Stock. The Local Loans Stock thus sold by the National Debt Commissioners was obtained by them at par in exchange for Consols and for the bonds of the Public Works Loan Board, both at par. As the amount of Local Loans Stock held by the Commissioners on behalf of savings banks was very large, and as the Stock for some time was not as current as was desirable, it has been a great incidental advantage to interest large banks and other leading institutions in this Stock, the future of which, as the means of raising money for various local purposes claiming the aid of public credit, is of such immense importance to the community. In reply to the third paragraph of the Question, I do not propose to create Floating Debt to the extent of the still uncanceled portion of the Three per Cents by an issue of Exchequer bonds; but when I introduce the Bill for completing the conversion I shall ask Parliament to allow me a very free hand in dealing with the responsible task of paying off so large a sum.

MR. MOLLOY: Is it then the fact that Local Loan Stocks were sold at prices below the quotation current in the market at the time?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I have explained to the hon. Member that the prices at which they were sold were fixed in accordance with tenders which were made for Stock in large amounts, and which afforded a much better estimate of the real value of the Stock than a single transaction in a single day on the Stock Exchange. I must ask to be relieved from answering Questions as to the exact prices which are obtained by the National Debt Commissioners. I am dealing with very shrewd men of business, and if, by means of answers in this House, they obtain the opportunity of looking over my hand, while I cannot look over theirs, the public interest will be placed at a very great disadvantage.

MR. MOLLOY: I will not press the right hon. Gentleman for any more information now, but I beg to give notice that I will call attention to the matter on a future day.

M O T I O N S .

NEW WRIT.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. A. AKERS-DOUGLAS) (Kent, St. Augustine's): I beg to move, "That Mr. Speaker issue a Writ for Lambeth (Kennington Division), in the room of Mr. Robert Gent-Davis, on his acceptance of the Chiltern Hundreds."

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I do not propose to resist the Motion. I do not call in question the right of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to grant the Chiltern Hundreds to Mr. Gent-Davis, nor do I intend to say a word against Mr. Gent-Davis, now no longer a Member of this House. But I desire to call attention to the singular circumstances under which this Motion is made. So long ago as November last a communication was made to the Speaker by Mr. Justice North to the effect that Mr. Gent-Davis had been committed to prison for contempt of Court in appropriating to his own use and neglecting to pay into Court, in obedience to the order of the Court, a large sum of money received by him in a fiduciary manner. There can be no doubt, in the face of the communication of the Judge, that Mr. Gent-Davis was convicted of having committed a breach of trust in a money transaction. There is equally no doubt that the established practice of this House in cases of this kind is to vindicate its honour by the expulsion of the Member guilty of such a transaction. I will only refer to one authority. A Predecessor of yours, Sir, in the Chair, Lord Colchester, in the case of Benjamin Walsh, explained that a breach of trust in a money transaction justified expulsion from the House, and added that the principle extended not only to public but to private property, and that it was commonly the practice of Parliament first to vindicate its own honour, and then to consign the individual offender to legal prosecution. Now, after the communication from Mr. Justice North had been received by the Speaker, the First Lord of the Treasury, the guardian of the honour of this House, was asked what steps he proposed to take, and the right hon. Gentleman said—

“I do not think it will be my duty to ask the House to take any action in the matter. I am not in possession of information which would justify me in taking that course. I should take upon myself a serious responsibility if I were to proceed, even upon the report of the learned Judge, to ask the House to pronounce judgment upon the financial transactions of the hon. Member.”

I thought that answer so astounding, that I asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he had been advised in the matter, and I received no reply. I can only say that whatever advice the right hon. Gentleman might have received upon the subject was bad advice. Apparently to prevent any misconception as to the nature of the offence of which Mr. Gent-Davis was guilty, Mr. Justice North again, in January, in open Court, put on record the nature of this financial transaction. He said that if proceedings in a Criminal Court had been taken against Mr. Gent-Davis, and if he had been convicted, the period of his imprisonment would have been longer than the imprisonment which he had endured. After all that, the First Lord of the Treasury has taken no steps. Even now he has not taken any, but permitted Mr. Gent-Davis to purge the House, to vindicate the honour of the House, by applying for the Chiltern Hundreds. There is only one other point which I wish to bring to the notice of the House. Her Majesty's Government have sinned with their eyes open and with full knowledge.

Mr. E. Robertson

Last year one of the projects of legislation of the Government was known as the “Black Sheep Bill,” the main object of which, as stated by the Prime Minister, was to confer upon the House of Lords the same power of dealing with unworthy Members which, he said, the House of Commons already possessed; and one of the main clauses of the Bill was that the report of a Judge that one of the Members of the House of Lords had been guilty of unworthy conduct should be sufficient to justify the House in taking action against that Member. I propose to leave the matter here. As I have said, I did not rise to oppose the Motion. I simply wish to put on record my own emphatic protest against the action, or rather the inaction, of the Government in this matter. I do not know whether the First Lord of the Treasury will think it necessary to give any explanation; but, in my opinion, no explanation will relieve the right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues from the charge which I now make, that throughout the whole of this painful affair they have been indifferent to the honour of the House, and that by such indifference they have violated one of the best and worthiest traditions of the House of Commons.

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The hon. and learned Gentleman, without giving me any notice, has thought it right to charge me with being indifferent to the honour of the House. I emphatically deny that charge, and I shall be content to leave myself to the judgment of the House when I have made my explanation. I wish to recall the attention of the House to the circumstances of the case. The hon. and learned Member for Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) gave notice that he would move the expulsion of the hon. Member for Kennington. That Gentleman was not in his place and could not be in his place in the House, and the hon. and learned Member for Longford withdrew that notice, in order that he might bring the question forward at a time when the hon. Gentleman could be in his place in the House and give an answer to the charge which the hon. and learned Member said he would make against him. I am charged with indifference to the honour of this House. It is one of the gravest charges which could be made against a man holding the position which I have the honour to fill. I stated, when the matter was previously before the House, that at least one of the duties of the Leader of the House is to be exceedingly careful how he proceeds to deal with a question affecting the personal honour of Members of this House. I have always stated that that is as responsible a duty as any other duty imposed upon me. Complaint has been made that when a charge of apparent irregularity and breach of trust was brought against Mr. Gent-Davis I did not instantly take steps for his expulsion. We indicated that if it were the desire of any hon. Member to bring the conduct of the late Member for Kennington under the notice of the House, the Government would not issue the Chiltern Hundreds to him, so that he might still remain within the jurisdiction of the House. I should have been the first to agree to any inquiry into the conduct of Mr. Gent-Davis. But, as reference has been made to my conduct and the duties imposed upon me, I must remind the hon. and learned Member that there are cases within the knowledge of this House of breaches of trust of the most serious character, which have been committed, and which, as far as this House is concerned, have been condoned, not by the action of Her Majesty's Government, not at the request of Her Majesty's Government, by the issue of the Chiltern Hundreds. But I do not wish to enter upon an explanation of those cases. The honour and character of individual Members of this House is the cherished possession of the House itself; and I say again that I should have been unworthy of the position I occupy if I had made use of the power which is placed in my hands to put an hon. Member in a position of extreme personal difficulty, unless charges were brought before this House which could be investigated, and which could properly form a subject of investigation. I am content with the explanation I have given. I believe that at the time I answered the Question I answered it to the satisfaction of the House itself; and I am not conscious that I have departed from the terms of it.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): Like my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. E.

Robertson). I certainly do not rise for the purpose of opposing in any way the issue of this Writ, or for the purpose of condemning the Government for issuing under these circumstances the Chiltern Hundreds. I admit that at first the grant in a case of this kind raised considerable doubts in my mind. But on examining the matter, and on the authority of the book to which we always refer in these matters, I found that in recent years all words have been omitted from the grant of the Chiltern Hundreds which formerly attached to those offices. In old days there was a record that the Chiltern Hundreds had been granted in consequence of the honourable services of Members.

MR. GLADSTONE: And shining virtues.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The honourable services and shining virtues of the Member who took the post. My right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian, who probably had some experience himself of the difficulties in these cases, ordered those words to be removed from the grant of the Chiltern Hundreds. Therefore there is no objection to be raised on that score. It is a very inconvenient method—probably belonging to those numerous anomalies which we cherish in the English Constitution—that there should be no other form for a Member resigning his seat in Parliament; and I think it would be well worthy the consideration of the House to inquire whether a simpler method of resignation should not be established by the House. I have no word of criticism or condemnation to make on the grant of the Chiltern Hundreds by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. But my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. E. Robertson) has raised a different question, and that is whether the Government ought not earlier, of their own accord, to have taken this matter in hand. In this regard I do not desire to press the thing too hardly against the Government or the Leader of the House; but I was glad to take notice of his admission of the fact that the honour of Members of this House is the first duty of the First Lord of the Treasury. Later on, perhaps, we may have cause to ask him to discharge that primary duty. But the right hon. Gentleman has said—and the plea was certainly good and valid—that in the first instance he objected to acting because the hon. Member whose conduct was in question was not able to be present. But when the Member was able to answer for himself—when he was at large—I confess that I should have thought that the persons to take the first action in this matter, by compelling the retirement of the Member in one form or another, would have been Her Majesty's Government, and the First Lord of the Treasury as principally responsible to the House. We know very well that, in the case of persons who ought not to be allowed to fulfil offices of public trust, sometimes their retirement is obtained by the process of enforced resignation, or by public dismissal; and in one form or another I should have thought that it was the duty of the Leader of the House to see that one of these courses was taken. The right hon. Gentleman has referred to cases where breaches of trust have been condoned by the grant of the Chiltern Hundreds. But he must allow me to draw a broad and clear distinction between cases where there has been an open and public Judgment, and cases where the facts are only known by general rumour. The cases are very different, especially with regard to the action of Her Majesty's Government. It is very difficult and almost impossible for a responsible Minister to act on a rumour, however credible it may be; but it is a totally different thing when there is a legal Judgment, as was the case in the matter before the House; because the Judgments of the Court of Chancery are just as much legal Judgments as the Judgments in the Common Law or Criminal Courts. Without desiring to press the matter too hardly, I think it ought to be recognized that, where there is a legal pronouncement in Court on the misconduct of a Member of the House of Commons, the persons who ought to take the earliest and first initiative in the matter are Her Majesty's Government. It ought not to be left to anyone else. I only make these remarks because the right hon. Gentleman said that anyone else might have taken action. That is quite true; but it is primarily the duty of the Leader of this House to take notice of these Judgments in the Courts of Law. That is all I desire to say in the matter, and I hope that I have not said it in any manner offensive to Gentlemen on the opposite bench, because I know the delicacy and difficulty of performing a duty of this character, and I hope that, without further comment, the Writ will be allowed to be issued.

MR. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I rise to point out that between the manner of the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down and the manner of the hon. and learned Member who opened this discussion there is a very marked and agreeable contrast. It may be a question of judgment as to whether or not action ought to have been taken in the matter before; but the hon. Member for Dundee has gone further. He has said that the First Lord of the Treasury has violated the best traditions of the House; and that in his position as Leader of the House he has shown himself in a marked degree insensible of the dignity of the House. I venture to repudiate every word of that charge. I believe that the vast majority of Gentlemen on the other side of the House do not approve of such allegations against the right hon. Gentleman. When the hon. Member for Dundee brings a charge of this kind against the Leader of the House of Commons he places himself in a remarkably inconsistent position when he follows it up by saying that he intends to take no further action. If it is true that the Leader of the House has shown himself absolutely insensible of the honour of this Assembly, it is perfectly clear that he has no right to occupy such an exalted position. I do not say this as a Member of the Conservative Party, but as a Member of the House of Commons. I say that such charges against the Leader of the House ought not to be made unless further action is intended. The hon. Member for Dundee ought to withdraw these charges, or ought not to be allowed to let them rest as they at present stand.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I should like to make a personal explanation. My statement was really in the nature of a syllogism. I stated that it is not denied that the First Lord and his colleagues are the guardians of the honour of the House, and that it is not denied that it is the practice of the House to vindicate its honour by taking immediate notice of charges such as those which have been made against Mr. Gent-Davis. I inferred that in not taking immediate action the First Lord of the Treasury and his colleagues have been indifferent to their duty to the House.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Mr. Goschen, St. George's, Hanover Square): The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) said that his mind had been exercised as to whether the Chiltern Hundreds ought to have been granted in this case; and he stated that he had come to the conclusion that there was little discretion left to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that my mind was equally exercised; and I thought, like the right hon. Gentleman, that it was right to look very thoroughly into the matter. Looking, however, to the precedents and to what has been laid down on the subject, I thought it was my duty to grant the Chiltern Hundreds. And in this course the right hon. Gentleman concurs. It was stated by the First Lord that, there being some delay while I was looking into this matter, a communication was made by my right hon. Friend who sits behind me to the Member for Nottingham (Mr. A. Morley), so that the opportunity might be given to any hon. Member of the House to bring the matter forward. The Government had not the slightest intention of withdrawing the matter from the cognizance of the House. Then the right hon. Gentleman, in language of which no one can complain, spoke of the delicacy of the question as to what action should be taken by the Executive Government in a matter of this kind. I think that the right hon. Gentleman rather indicated than declared that it was the duty of the Government at once to act, but he said that he would not pass any censure on the Government with regard to the matter. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that it is a matter of extreme delicacy to determine in what instances the Executive Government is to act. The right hon. Gentleman has said that the Executive should act in cases where the Court has laid down that an hon. Member of this House has been guilty of misconduct.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I should rather have said a fraud of a monetary character.

*MR. GOSCHEN: That narrows the doctrine extremely. I thought it right to call the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the very wide doctrine he had laid down. I am sure the House will feel that it is extremely difficult for the Government to discriminate what kind of fraud, what kind of misconduct, ought to lead to the expulsion of a Member of this House. There might be many cases where a question would arise with regard to the action of political opponents, and I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will see that it would be an extremely delicate matter for the Government to determine whether in consequence of certain actions, certain declarations made by a Court, a Government ought at once to proceed. I am glad that attention has been called to the Question, because it is a matter equally interesting to all sections of the House. The doctrine of the right hon. Gentleman would carry us very far, and its application would be attended with considerable difficulties; but I accept the declaration of the right hon. Gentleman that he does not think this a matter in which the Executive Government is deserving of censure.

MR. GLADSTONE (Mid Lothian): A case of this kind is so important in its bearing as to the proceedings and character of the House that it is very likely to be made a subject of reference hereafter, and therefore it is desirable that we should understand with perfect clearness what is the ground upon which we take up our position. The First Lord of the Treasury made a reference to certain cases which were quite distinct from the case now immediately in question—certain other cases where it appeared that there was misconduct not less gross than that which appears to exist in the present instance. I believe that it was my own ill-fortune many years ago to grant the Chiltern Hundreds without any question in the House—without any possibility, I think, of refusing to grant it—to one gentleman, at least, who was afterwards the subject of a criminal sentence. But then there was no knowledge—though there may have been suspicion and misgiving—upon which it could have been possible to have alleged any ground for withholding the grant of the Chiltern Hundreds; and that appears to me to be the fundamental and the exclusive distinction we have to draw. Neither the First Lord of the and they would much rather go on with the business of the House at 12 o'clock, than have the meeting put off till two. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not press the Motion, as otherwise it will be my duty to divide the House against it.

Motion made, and Question put, "That this House will meet to-morrow at Two of the Clock."—(Mr. W. H. Smith.)

The House divided: — Ayes, 193; Noes, 112.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. Smith, Strand, Westminster): In rising to move, "That the Order for resuming the Adjourned Debate on the Queen's Speech, Motion for an Address, have precedence this day of Notices of Motion and other Orders of the Day," I wish to make an appeal to hon. Gentlemen who have given notice of Amendments to the Address. The House is aware that we have already reached the tenth day of discussion of the Address, and also that very serious and important business must be disposed of before the 18th or 19th of March, financial business of the current year, the matter being of such urgent importance to the House and the country that we ought to proceed to it as speedily as possible, and I would earnestly appeal to hon. Members to allow the debate on the Address to conclude this evening. I am aware there are suggestions of considerable importance in Motions which stand in the name of hon. Members, but I may remind them that during the course of the Session there will be, I fully hope, an opportunity for urging their views before the House and the country. The House is aware that the prolongation of the Debate on the Address has had the practical effect of depriving some hon. Members of their ordinary opportunities for bringing forward Motions and Bills in which they are interested. Under these circumstances I trust that hon. Members will themselves concur in the view I have heard expressed more than once that the debate on the Address should be limited, and that we should then proceed as rapidly as we can with the important business we have to dispose of. I trust

I may have the support of right hon. Gentlemen opposite in enforcing that view.

Motion made, and Question put.

MR. GLADSTONE (Mid Lothian): I find great satisfaction in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, for he conveyed to Members, as I understand, as an inducement to assent to his proposal, that they would have fitter opportunities to bring under the notice of the House those matters they desire to raise. I trust I am justified in inferring from that general intimation that the Government do not contemplate during the present Session any great invasion of the time appropriated to private Members. I certainly am one of those who are of opinion that the great length to which debates on the Address have been prolonged of late years is a serious impediment to the important business awaiting disposal. Of course, I do not speak of the Amendment of my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle, because that was a Motion of a very serious character, raising distinctly the question of the existence of the Government, such a question as it has always been usual to raise upon the Address. I refer to a custom which is growing up, that of making the Address the occasion for discussing subjects—of public importance undoubtedly—I do not say frivolous matters, but matters that might be more appropriately discussed under the ancient course of allowing Members a fair proportion of the time of the House. But I do not propose to enter into that now. At present we have before us the fact that, independent of the debate upon the Irish Amendment, we have had three nights of general debate, and are about to have a fourth without any interruption. Under these circumstances, and in view of the nature of the business that is to come on—Government and possibly other business of an urgent character—I certainly think the right hon. Gentleman has made a reasonable appeal, and one that we so far as we can, compatibly with what we deem to be our specific duty, will respond to, and bring about the close of the debate to-night. I have a few words to say on one of the subjects standing for discussion, but I will give a pledge that undoubtedly in what I then say I shall have a lively recollection of what I am now saying, for I am quite in sympathy with the wish of the right hon. Gentleman.

Motion agreed to.

BURIALS BILL.

On the Motion of Mr. Osborne Morgan, Bill to further to amend the Burial Laws, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Osborne Morgan, Mr. Channing, Mr. Handel Coesham, Mr. John Ellis, and Mr. Illingworth.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 146.]

LIFE AND PROPERTY PROTECTION BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Mattinson, Bill for the better protection by night of Life and Property, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Mattinson, Sir William Houldsworth, Mr. Whitley, Mr. Seager Hunt, Mr. James William Lowther, and Mr. Forrest Fulton.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 147.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HER MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

[ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [21st February.]—[See page 41.]

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green S.W.): I rise to move as an Amendment to the Address an expression of our regret that the Royal Speech contains no proposal for legislation to safeguard the long-accustomed right of public meeting in Trafalgar Square. Notwithstanding the appeal which has been addressed to the House, I think, considering in the first place that in the Royal Speech London questions are totally ignored, and in the second place having regard to the extreme gravity of the question my Amendment raises, I am justified in the course I am now taking. The House will probably remember that shortly after the opening of the Session of 1888 the hon. and learned Member for Hackney brought forward a Resolution proposing the appointment of a Committee to consider the provisions under which public meetings are held in London, and the limits of the right of interference with such meetings by the Executive. That Motion was opposed by the Government, and after a long discussion it was defeated. Now, the attitude of the Government towards this Motion, coupled with the brutal violence which the Government have been responsible for, employed on November 13 against non-offending citizens, left—and I think not unnaturally left—a rankling resentment in the minds of a very considerable portion of the people of London. There were some men, as there are some men now—and I regret it—who desired to fight the Government with their own weapons. They desired to retake the right which the Government had defrauded them of by force and violence, but there were others who were extremely anxious to try this question upon its merits in a Court of Law. Well now, what was the attitude of the Government in regard to the latter class of persons? There was only one case arising out of the Trafalgar Square incident which raised the right fairly on its merits, and that was the case of Mr. Saunders. The Government commenced a prosecution against that gentleman, but almost immediately dropped it. Then a civil action was commenced in the name of Mr. Saunders for assault, in order to obtain a decision on the merits of the question. Unfortunately, the formal notice, which by statute is required, was not given in time, and the authorities sheltered themselves under this legal technicality, and so, for the second time, the law-abiding portion of the people who desired to raise the question were defeated in their object. The second case arose on a summons heard at Bow Street, and the police obtained a conviction. Mr. Vaughan, the Magistrate, was requested to state a case for the decision of a Superior Court, and agreed to do so. After long delay the case was stated, but then it was found that the case, as stated, was utterly absurd with reference to the point we desired to raise. The case, as stated by Mr. Vaughan, amounted to this—that the Queen's Bench Division were asked, in fact, whether an illegal meeting held in Trafalgar Square was an illegal meeting? Well, we do not want to go to the Queen's Bench Division to decide that; we know that an illegal meeting in Trafalgar Square or anywhere else is illegal. There was on the part of the Government the strongest reluctance to come into Court on the merits of the case, a reluctance which generally, I think we may say, accompanies the consciousness of having a very bad case. But I do not desire to treat this question within the limits of a bare strict legal argument. It always seems to me that the House of Commons is not the place for a purely legal argument, but it must be obvious to the House that there are many rights which possibly one could not vindicate in a Court of Law, and yet rights, properly so-called, which a Government ought not to take away, which no wise Government would ever dream of taking away. How does the case stand in regard to Trafalgar Square? In the first place, I shall carefully avoid, as much as possible, the arguments which were gone over last year. But, at all events, we have this fact—that for nearly 40 years prior to November 13th, 1887, there had been the user of Trafalgar Square for the purpose of public meeting; nay, more, on one occasion, about 20 years ago, when there was a desire to hold a large public demonstration in Hyde Park, the organizers of the demonstration were told by the Government of the day that Trafalgar Square was the proper place in which to hold such a meeting. Last year the Home Secretary drew attention to the fact, and insisted upon it, that before November 13th there had been a series of daily meetings in the Square, with regard to which meetings I just want to say that if it is said that it would be unreasonable that mass meetings should be held every day in Trafalgar Square, and at any hour of any day, I quite agree with that. I think that it would be an unreasonable exercise of an undoubted right—an intolerant exercise of that right—because it would ignore the co-ordinate right of other persons, who dislike public meetings, and wish to use the Square for other purposes which are equally legitimate. But, whatever view you may take of the meetings that preceded that of November 13th, on what ground of law or reason can the Home Secretary defend the proclamation of the meeting of November 13th? The meetings before that day were called by one body of persons, and the meeting of November 13th was called by a totally different body of persons; and, although I said I should be anxious to avoid any strictly legal argument, I cannot refuse to allude to the Salvation Army decision,

Mr. Pickersgill

Beattie v. Gilbanks; and I respectfully submit to the House that the principle of that decision is distinctly against the proclamation of the meeting of November 13th. Besides, no connection has been proved between the organizers of that meeting and the organizers of the preceding meetings. That is the very essence of the case, because if any body of men are to be affected by the meetings of another body of men, then, I say, every liberty we possess is in danger. Just see how that would operate in practice. It only requires a small body of men to get up a disturbance at a public meeting in a public place on one day in order to justify the Government in proclaiming a meeting for a totally different purpose in the same place on a following day. Of course, those who organized the meeting would be responsible, but they cannot be affected by the incident of a meeting with which they had nothing whatever to do. Let me refer to the objections which have been urged to the holding of meetings in Trafalgar Square. It is said, in the first place, there is danger to property. Well, we all know it is an unfortunate fact that there is a large criminal class in London which always finds its harvest on every occasion when large masses of people are collected. The Home Secretary assents to that. Yes; but on the occasion of public illuminations, or on any occasion of a Royal procession, or when you want to pay a compliment to a Royal visitor, then you do everything in your power to collect the people in large masses, and the argument of danger to property, whatever it is worth, applies as much to such occasions as to those when citizens meet to discuss public questions. Then it is said the site is an inconvenient one for public meetings. Well, on that issue it is sufficient to point out that for 40 years it has been used for public meetings, which shows most clearly that it is a convenient site in the opinion of those who organize the meetings and attend them. I think the argument about convenience hardly lies in the mouths of those who are subject to the very grave suspicion of disliking public meetings altogether. Then it is said it is in the very heart of a great city, and an unsuitable place for public meetings. Now, I venture to submit that the heart of a great city is the proper place, and for this reason: when men have a grievance and desire to come together, they assemble not merely to encourage one another, but also to make their grievance known to the powers that are able to relieve them. Therefore, it follows that publicity is the very essence of a political demonstration. To make that publicity as great as possible is one of the most legitimate purposes of all public demonstrations, and there is no place more fitting for that purpose than the centre of a large population. Now, there was one incident of which great use was made in the debate last year by the Government and the supporters of the Government. They relied on the riot which occurred in the neighbourhood of Trafalgar Square in February, 1886; but is it to be said that because there has occurred a solitary isolated act of violence and crime that, therefore, the Government are justified in taking away a long-accustomed popular right? I venture to think, if that argument is to hold good, that every liberty we and our fathers ever enjoyed is scarcely worth 24 hours' purchase. What, then, is our claim? I have indicated that I do not think it is reasonable that meetings should day by day be held in Trafalgar Square, but what I do ask the Government to do is this: to recognize the right of meeting in the Square, and to submit proposals for the regulation of that right. It seems sensible that this right should be regulated in order that it may be preserved. I would impress on the Government that the present position cannot be maintained. It is intolerable that a long-accustomed right should be taken away or withheld by the mere edict of a Commissioner of Police. Apart from the importance of the immediate occasion, I say it constitutes a most mischievous and dangerous precedent. I ask that the Government shall, at least, put the matter on a legal basis. There are three courses open to the Government to put this matter on a legal basis. In the first place they might withdraw the Chief Commissioner's edict; they might bring in a Bill to prohibit all meetings in Trafalgar Square—I should give it, I need hardly say, all the opposition in my power, but at all events it would be strictly and technically a legal proceeding—or they might bring in a Bill recognizing the right of meeting in the Square, and providing suitable regulations under which that right should be exercised.

This last course I ask the Government to take. It is impossible, I think, to dissociate altogether this action from the changed attitude of the authorities in London towards public meetings in general. That there has been such a change is absolutely indisputable. No one who has any acquaintance with London, and takes an interest in public life, and who compares the attitude of the police towards public meetings to-day with the attitude of the police towards public meetings before the advent of the present Government, can doubt the evidence of a mischievous and alarming change. The Home Secretary says there has been no change in the general direction, given to the Metropolitan Police. I must, of course, and I do, accept the statement of the right hon. Gentleman. But I might perhaps, be permitted to point out to him that, when you are dealing with so delicate a question as the right of public meeting, even admitting that the general regulations in their letter remain the same, still the spirit in which they are administered and carried out may make the difference between a reasonable freedom and an intolerable tyranny. It was only the other day that I had occasion to call attention to a case which occurred in my own constituency. A member of the County Council for London, a gentleman for whom the esteem of his locality was sufficiently testified by the overwhelming majority of votes which he obtained in the recent election—Mr. Branch—is waited upon by a constable. It is said that the constable discharged his duty in a courteous manner. I dare say he did; I do not blame him; but I censure the system for which the right hon. Gentleman is responsible, and which compels a constable of the Metropolitan Police to do something which gives grave offence to a man occupying a high position in London. The right hon. Gentleman told me that the police were sent to the meeting for the purposes of protection. Protection! Why, the meeting was a small meeting in a club, to which, indeed, the public were invited. It was not even an open-air meeting, which would have given some colour to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman. It is a public meeting held on private premises, addressed by a gentleman of high position, who is waited upon by a constable in the first place; and, in the second place, half-a-dozen policemen are sent to crowd around the door, or in the neighbourhood of the meeting place. I say that indicates a marked change in the relations which once existed between the people of London and the Metropolitan Police. I desire to make an earnest appeal to the Government. I do not think that the present position is at all a tolerable position. We have had violence, and we have had bloodshed, mainly—I will not say entirely—on the part of the police. Now that sort of thing will inevitably cause rebellion. I have shown you what a rankling sense of resentment exists in the mind of a very considerable number of the people of London, and I am afraid that there will be trouble. I do, therefore, earnestly ask the Government to at least put the matter on a legal basis, and free us, at all events, from the disgrace of being deprived of what many of us believe to be a right by the edict of the Police Commissioner. If there should be violence and bloodshed, to which we have not been accustomed in the streets of London, then I must say that a terrible responsibility will rest upon the Government, in the first place because they have by every kind of artful contrivance succeeded in eluding a decision upon the merits of the case in a Court of Law, and in the second place because they have obstinately refused a settlement which would have given reasonable satisfaction to all parties. I beg, Sir, to move the Amendment of which I have given notice.

MR. STUART seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of Paragraph 11 to insert the words, "But we humbly express our regret that no proposals are made in Your Majesty's Gracious Speech to safeguard the long accustomed right of public meeting in Trafalgar Square."

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. MURDOCH (Reading): The hon. Member has brought forward this Amendment to the Address, and I cannot help thinking that in doing so he has shown by his speech that there is no necessity for it. On a previous occasion when this subject was discussed, the House had the advantage of hearing the opinions of some of the most eminent lawyers of the day as to the legal point of the question. Other speakers attempted to show that the meetings in Trafalgar Square were not only a cause of much interruption of business, but were also a source of trouble and danger. I cannot say that those points have been touched upon by the hon. Member so as to in any way reverse the decision at which the House arrived on the occasion to which I have referred. I would point out that Trafalgar Square is very much altered in character from what it was a few years ago. In the petition which was laid before this House, signed by persons of all grades and positions, it was pointed out that during the last few years Trafalgar Square had become one of the main arteries of the Metropolis, a point at which traffic converged from north, south, east, and west, and that any interruption of that traffic would cause most serious inconvenience. It has also been pointed out, although the point has been made very light of by the hon. Member, that the riot which took place on a certain date opened the eyes of a good many people to the danger which arose from those meetings. I am not going to blame those who convened the meetings. I am perfectly certain that those gentlemen, when they convened the meeting in Trafalgar Square, had no idea that any danger would result from it; but events proved most clearly that those who gathered the people together had no control whatever over them, and that in itself shows that these meetings are a source of considerable danger to life and property in the neighbourhood of Trafalgar Square. It is a very different thing from holding a meeting in a place or passing through a place with permission to hold a meeting in Trafalgar Square, and occasionally having language used which is calculated to inflame those who hear it, and which, perhaps, the promoters are very sorry for afterwards. The case of the Lord Mayor's Show is a very different thing; it occupies only a certain time in passing; the police have the conduct of it, and they take care that no interruption shall take place except what cannot be avoided. If I recollect aright, there is no necessity for the introduction of a Bill, because it has been clearly shown that the regulation of Trafalgar Square rests with the Home Secretary, and, under his direction, with the Metropolitan Police. The mere fact of the hon. Member mentioning such a Bill—although he says he would oppose it by every means in his power—shows that there is lurking in his mind the possibility that Trafalgar Square may not have attached to it the right of public meeting for which he contends. He says that Trafalgar Square, being in the heart of a great city, is a suitable place of meeting. Well, within a mile is Hyde Park, where any number of meetings may be held without danger to life, limb, or property. Another point to which I want to draw attention is that the petition presented to the House was numerously signed by working men living in the neighbourhood. They were perfectly well aware how they were damaged by the meetings; and I am perfectly convinced that if the hon. Member polled his constituency he would find that the respectable and steady portion of the working classes are against any such meetings, while “professional” men, who attend all such meetings and processions, are in favour of them, not caring much what injury results to their fellow-men.

*SIR C. RUSSELL: I have the honour to represent a community largely composed of the working classes, and I have discussed this matter with them at more than one meeting. There was a strong feeling on the subject, though I admit there were degrees and shades of opinion on it. There is a section who desire to have the right of holding any meeting with or without notice upon any subject, at any time of the day, and on every day in the week. I do not think that is a very large class; but there is a largely preponderating class in my constituency who seriously complain that the accustomed right of public meeting in Trafalgar Square exercised for 40 years has been unconstitutionally invaded, not by the action of Parliament, but by the will of a police officer in high authority. The tendency of the argument I have addressed to more than one meeting was this—believing as I do that the interference of the Commissioner of Police was not authorized by any statute, I had urged upon the Government either to withdraw the interference, or that they should deal with the subject, as I have pressed upon the Home Secretary before, by legislative enactment. What are the facts of the case? It is truly said that for 40 years there has been this accustomed right of public meeting. I do not wish to be misunderstood. I do not assert that it is a legal right in itself in the same sense as a private legal right which is enforceable by action at law, but I do say it is a Constitutional right on the part of the community in the midst of which this vacant space exists, and which cannot be properly described as a thoroughfare at all, but is distinctly an open space as the Act describes it, capable of being appropriately used for some meetings—certainly for meetings of moderate dimensions. The test of a Constitutional right of this kind is whether it is a crime to hold orderly and peaceable meetings in Trafalgar Square. I ask this question with a view to obtaining an answer. If it be an offence, what is the Statute creating the offence, and what is the penalty annexed to the offence? If the allegation is that it is an offence, and if that is the advice the Home Secretary has given will the Home Secretary assist in raising in a Court of Law purely and simply that question? Is it a legal offence to hold an orderly and peaceable meeting in Trafalgar Square. With one exception nothing that could be called a serious disturbance has ever taken place as far as I am aware in connection with meetings in Trafalgar Square. I do not doubt that these meetings, or some of them, have been a cause of considerable inconvenience to some or many of the people living in the neighbourhood, but I want to know what great congregation of the people in public meeting could take place anywhere, or what great function in which a multitude of the people take part can be performed without causing inconvenience to some section of the community, but inconveniences which that section of the community must bear as they are caused by the exercise of a great Constitutional and important public right? The hon. Member for Reading has said fairly enough that the disturbance which took place was not one which could in any way be in contemplation of those who convened the meeting in February, 1886. A disorderly fringe became attached to the meeting itself, and it was a disorderly see-tion which became mischievous. Why? For the simple reason that the police, whose proper function was to be in attendance upon and to safeguard such meetings instead of being in Pall Mall in the rear of the gathering, where they were directed to take their position, were in the Mall. And then came the meeting in November which was convened after notice to the Home Secretary, and after a discussion with him on the part of a different set of persons who were responsible for having called and peaceably conducted many prior meetings in the same place. It was then that those extraordinary communications took place with the Home Secretary, showing that he was not then viewing the question in the same way as now, when, in answer this evening to the hon. Member for Camborne (Mr. Conybeare), he said there was clear statutory authority for what the police did in this matter. It is a noticeable fact that when the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, taking, as I believe, a serious and also a right view of the view of the matter, declared that it was no part of the intention of the Government to interfere with what he called a bona fide public meeting.

*THE HOME SECRETARY: I have contradicted that statement two or three times in the House.

*SIR C. RUSSELL: I did not recollect that the right hon. Gentleman had contradicted it, and I am sorry he has done so, because I thought the sentiment was one for which he might take credit; but now, on the contrary, I understand that the Home Secretary meant to say that the Government do claim the right to interfere with a bona fide political meeting, peaceable and orderly, if held in Trafalgar Square. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will presently explain what it was he did mean. Well, then came the prosecution at the Old Bailey, and, but for the verdict of the jury which determined that the meeting proposed to be held in November, and which was held, was an illegal meeting, I submit that the Government would be without a rag of justification for their conduct in the matter. I have not the materials before me on which to express an opinion on the right or wrong of that verdict. One is accustomed to accept the verdicts of juries as being founded on facts, unless there is some reason to suppose that something has prejudiced and distorted their judgment. But what does it amount to? It amounts to this only, that in the case of a particular meeting the Executive were justified in interfering to prevent it, on the ground that the circumstances under which it was proposed to be held it would be a source of alarm or terror to certain persons. Now, this would equally apply whatever meeting was held—it would equally apply to a meeting proposed to be held on enclosed private ground or in any other place whatever. Therefore I say it is apart from the question of customary user by the public of Trafalgar Square as a place of meeting, and what we complain of is this: that instead of limiting the interference which the verdict justified to the particular meeting, or to an illegal meeting the Government maintained and adopted the action of the Chief Commissioner of Police, who has issued a peremptory and perpetual mandate forbidding all meetings, of all kinds, irrespective of object or numbers, or whether they are orderly or not, in Trafalgar Square; and until he chooses to withdraw that mandate, he intends to prevent any meetings being held there. Now, I say that that is not law. The Proclamation of the Chief Commissioner is a notice and nothing more. It is authorized by no Statute, and cannot affect the character of any meeting. I speak with all deference to the opinions of those who differ from me honestly; and if there be on the Bench opposite learned Friends of mine who differ from this view, I think they will do me the justice of admitting—as I would do them the like justice—that I am stating here to-day what I stated in November last; and I say that what I state I believe is the law, and that if there is this difference it constitutes the greater reason and makes the argument all the stronger that the Government ought to lend themselves to the effort at raising and deciding this question directly, straightly, and simply. I ask the Government to recall the points I made in relation to the case of Saunders and the subsequent case before Mr. Vaughan. In the case of Saunders, who was formerly a Member of this House whilst that Gentleman was proceeding to address a meeting at Trafalgar Square, a policeman came to him and committed a technical assault by putting his hand on his collar, and then required him to follow him to the Bow Street Police Station, where a charge was entered against Mr. Saunders. On this, Mr. Saunders was bailed out, and afterwards, when he appeared to answer the charge, the Government were represented by one of the most able criminal lawyers of the day (my friend Mr. Poland). What did Mr. Poland do? He could not formulate a charge against Mr. Saunders—he did not attempt to formulate a charge against him; but he begged to withdraw the charge, and, in point of fact, his statement was that this Proclamation was a Proclamation of the Chief Commissioner of Police in error. I hear someone say it was not a summary case: then why did they not indict Mr. Saunders? Here was a grave question which affected the minds of a considerable number of the community, and the Government had the opportunity of raising the question, and what mattered it whether it was a summary offence or not? Mr. Saunders begged that the Government would indict him, but instead of doing that Mr. Poland practically asked that the charge might be struck out, and that Mr. Saunders might take his departure for the purpose of bringing an action against the policeman and the Chief Commissioner, under whose authority the policeman acted, for trespass. And what was the course that the Government took? I do not understand it, for I do not understand what the justification for it was. Mr. Saunders brought his action and claimed damages merely for the purpose of raising the question. The Government pleaded, among other defences, that the action was not brought timeously, and that the notice of action which the Statute required had not been given. I ask why the Government did not meet the case fairly? It would have been the means, in a legitimate and peaceful way, of helping to solve the question. But that is not all. A subsequent case arose, and Mr. Vaughan was required to state a case for the opinion of the Superior Court. I desire to speak of Mr. Vaughan, as I do of all Judges whose conduct I may have occasion to criticize, with all respect; but the case as stated by Mr. Vaughan, so far as raising the question was concerned, was an utter and absolute farce. The question which he propounded for the opinion of the Superior Court was whether a meeting, consisting of a large number of persons, assembled together in Trafalgar Square under such circumstances as to inspire terror, but in an alleged exercise of a legal right, was a legal meeting. It is enough to say that the form in which the case was stated amounted to a compendious statement of what constitutes an illegal meeting. The Home Secretary has said, in answer to my hon. Friend the member for Camborne (Mr. Conybeare), that the proclamation of the Commissioner still stood, and that there was express statutory authority for it. I would press the right hon. Gentleman to state before the debate closes what that statutory authority is. I am not aware of any statutory authority unless it be contained in the 2 and 3 Vict., c. 47, and particularly sections 52, 53, and 54. I want to know whether the Home Secretary was advised that under those or any other sections there was power given to the Chief Commissioner to forbid access to Trafalgar Square, and the presence of numbers of persons in Trafalgar Square; and I want to know whether the right hon. Gentleman claims the same powers in the Chief Commissioner as regards any other thoroughfare or any other open space in the Metropolis? If the right hon. Gentleman does not, on what distinction does he base the authority in the one case over the other? The right hon. Gentleman said something about obstructing or disturbing the thoroughfare. Let me test that. Was it not notorious to all who know the conformation of Trafalgar Square, that although there is to a certain extent a thoroughfare which is in no real sense a thoroughfare in the sense of leading conveniently or directly to or from certain definite points, yet within the crossing lines in Trafalgar Square there is an open space. Does the Home Secretary urge that, even assuming there was an obstruction of a thoroughfare, that that constituted an illegal meeting, or authorized the Chief Commissioner and the police to put it down by force on the ground that the persons attending the meeting were at the moment obstructing the thoroughfare? I do not desire to embarrass the Government on this question. I urge this consideration because of two things—first, that there has been, as I contend, an unjustifiable interference in an unjustifiable fashion with an accustomed right; and, secondly, that the continued interference with that right by the Chief Commissioner, who claims authority to interfere, not with particular meetings which may be illegal assemblies, but with all assemblies of persons, however peaceable, is, I believe, undoubtedly creating a bad feeling between the people and the police, and no good subject would desire to see that feeling continue.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I concur with the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down in deploring very much any interference with the working classes which may tend to produce a feeling of dissatisfaction with regard to the action of the Executive. I agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman that that is a matter very much to be deplored and, if possible, to be avoided; but it is not to be avoided by allowing what is wrong and unlawful. I am bound to say that those people are responsible for causing that feeling, as far as it deserves any attention at all, who, like the hon. Mover of the Amendment, din into the ears of the working classes that they have a right of meeting in these places. The hon. and learned Gentleman, with his great legal reputation as an accurate lawyer, has lent weight to that idea not by saying that this is a right which could be enforced in an action, but by talking about the accustomed right of meeting in Trafalgar Square or in any other place. I protest against the use of loose language such as that, seeing that the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman will be read with avidity by the working classes of the Metropolis to-morrow. The hon. and learned Gentleman knows very well that there is no such right as a right of public meeting in Trafalgar Square—not a right that can be enforced in a Court of Law, or by any machinery known to the law. What is the use of raising quibbling complaints about the case of Mr. Saunders. There might have been 20 opportunities of bringing an action if it were at all true to say that the public had a right, in any strict and proper sense, of meeting in the Square. If that they were so, anyone who obstructed a person in the exercise of that right would be liable to an action at the suit of the person obstructed, and nothing would be simpler than to bring an action in which the question of right could be raised. No lawyer can assert that there exists a right of meeting on the part of any of Her Majesty's subjects either in Trafalgar Square or in any other public thoroughfare. It is a right totally unknown to the law, and cannot be established by custom, however prolonged. The fact is that the spirit of forbearance, which, happily, always characterizes the action of the authorities in this country, has winked at the use of Trafalgar Square for public meetings so long as it was not dangerous. If those meetings had continued peaceable and orderly, the present Government, like those which preceded it, would not have thought of interfering. In all probability the same acquiescence would have gone on. I ask hon. Gentlemen opposite to believe that, so far as the Government are concerned, they have every sympathy with public meetings. [An hon. MEMBER: Then why not allow the meetings?] Do hon. Members opposite for a moment suggest that any Executive Government could ignore the results of the experience of 1886? The acquiescence of which I have spoken has been twice most grossly abused. Will anyone stand up and say that it is tolerable that such scenes as those of February 1886 should be allowed to recur in London,—the richest, the most orderly, and the most law-abiding city in the world? Who was responsible for those scenes? Do not let it be supposed for a moment that I charge the originators of the meetings in 1886 with direct and personal responsibility for what happened; but indirectly they were responsible, because they gave a plausible excuse and a decent occasion for the roughs of London to gather together, and then, when the meetings had taken place, to proceed in different directions from Trafalgar Square to plunder shops and commit other outrages. The organizers of the meetings, however good their intentions might have been, and however much they may have sincerely desired to avoid confusion and disorder, could not control large masses of people, and when once they were got together in a thoroughfare which was not a manoeuv-

ring ground the task of following them up and preventing disorder was very difficult. The lesson taught by the events of November, 1887, was equally fruitful, and must have been laid to heart by anybody who was responsible for the order of London. I do not want to go over the melancholy story again. The blame I have always taken to myself was that I waited too long. So reluctant was I to do anything which would seem to be an interference with the liberty of meeting that I believe I waited longer than I ought before taking action. The warnings, certainly, were very frequent. At last it became irresistibly clear that these meetings were dangerous to the public peace. It was only by enormous exertion that the police, from day to day were able to preserve the property—I was going to say the lives—but certainly the property, of the orderly inhabitants of this city. The strain upon the police force was something prodigious; and thousands of men had to watch day after day. The strain upon their temper was great; and this state of things also meant increased expense for the rate-payers. It was a state of things which was intolerable, and we should have neglected our first duty if we had not taken steps to prevent it from continuing. It is a fact that a number of people unacquainted with the law have been taught by those in authority to suppose that their rights were being infringed; and it was this which caused so much irritation and anger. Such anger would be justifiable if it were true that the people had rights which were being infringed. I think, therefore, that words such as I have referred to should be cautiously used by men of great authority, because they mislead the people. The hon. and learned Gentleman has asked me where is the statutable authority for the action of the Police Commissioner with regard to the proclamation of November 18. The statutable authority is that referred to in the notice itself—namely, the Metropolitan Police Acts, 2 and 3 Vic., c. 47 and 71.

*SIR C. RUSSELL: Read the section.

*MR. MATTHEWS: I read the section scores of times before the notice was issued; and I can only repeat that I still rely upon the advice given me, which I believe to be well founded, that the section does give the Chief Commissioner of Police ample power in order to prevent obstruction and tumult in Trafalgar Square. The objection constantly made on the other side is, "Why not give us the opportunity of raising this point in a Court of Law?" I repeat that it is in the power of anybody who chooses to assert this right of meeting, if he is obstructed to bring the matter before a Court of Law. If he is right, and is obstructed, there is nothing in the world to prevent him from bringing an action.

*SIR C. RUSSELL: Will the right hon. Gentleman state any place where the legal right to hold public meetings could be raised in the way he suggests?

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): Is the right hon. Gentleman inviting the people to hold further meetings?

*MR. MATTHEWS: What I say is this. Those who assert that there exists a legal right to meet can test the truth and validity of the matter by bringing an action. If they rely upon their right, and have confidence in it, they ought to prove it by bringing an action against anybody who obstructs them in the assertion of their right. I confess that I am quite content with the decisions already obtained. The law on the subject has been laid down by Mr. Justice Charles in the case of "The Queen against Cuninghame Graham," and by Mr. Justice Wills and Mr. Justice Grantham in the case "Ex parte Lewis." In these cases the Judges distinctly laid it down that there was no right of public meeting in Trafalgar Square.

*SIR C. RUSSELL: Is there any right anywhere in that sense?

*MR. MATTHEWS: Yes.

*SIR C. RUSSELL: Where?

*MR. MATTHEWS: There is a right of public meeting on any ground the consent of the owner of which can be obtained for the holding of the meeting. There is a right of public meeting in London in the parks. The inhabitants of London are in a position of singular advantage in this respect. They are the only community in England who have four places—one in the north, one in the south, one in the east, and one in the west—expressly provided for them by Parliament where they can meet with a legal right to hold a meeting. No other communities have such a right, and if they do hold meetings they have to rely upon that sort of acquiescence on the part of their fellow-citizens and of the authorities which existed for a long time in London before the disturbances of 1886 and 1887 rendered it impossible to remain neutral any longer. I believe that hon. Members below the Gangway opposite who represent Ireland will bear me out when I say that public meetings in that country are usually held on private land.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh): I rise to reply to the right hon. Gentleman.

*MR. MATTHEWS: It is scarcely worth while to pursue the subject.

MR. W. REDMOND: The right hon. Gentleman asked a question. [Cries of "Order!"]

*MR. MATTHEWS: I would press upon the attention of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite what the consequences of the converse proposition might be. The hon. and learned Gentleman did not assert, but he suggested by the language he used, that there might be such a thing as the right to hold a public meeting in a thoroughfare; and he spoke of the accustomed right of meeting. No doubt in Dod Street it has been the custom to hold public meetings on Sundays; and in certain streets in the Seven Dials small meetings have been held for years both on week days and Sundays. But can anybody with a grave face tell the House of Commons, let alone a Court of Law, that these meetings are held by any right? The truth is that this suggested right is a thing contradictory of and absolutely inconsistent with the purposes for which the thoroughfares were created. If they are to be monopolized by people standing about in crowds, the subjects of the Queen will not be able to pass through them; therefore I assert with some confidence that nowhere is there such a right of meeting in the thoroughfares as has been suggested, although London is singularly fortunate in having, through the care of Parliament, been provided with four places in which meetings can be held. I do—I must venture to appeal to hon. Gentlemen opposite not to goad their followers, who naturally do not know what the law is, into the idea that some wrong has been done to them in connection with the supposed right of meeting in Trafalgar Square. Is it reasonable, or is it good citizenship—I will put it even as high as that—to goad your followers into the idea that some right of theirs has been arbitrarily interfered with by the police or by the Government? On the contrary, I say that it is most unreasonable to so act in the face of the legal authorities which exist. The hon. and learned Member for Camborne asks what are those legal authorities? I should have thought that even his mind would by this time be penetrated with the knowledge of the decisions given on this subject by learned Judges. There is the summing up of Mr. Justice Charles in the case of Graham and Burns; there is also a decision in the case of "Ex parte Dillon Lewis," and surely before an hon. Member takes it upon himself to tell ignorant people that the Judges are wrong, it behoves him to get a decision from some other and better authority, and until he has done that it is his duty as a reasonable man to accept the law as it has been interpreted by the Judges. Complaint has been made because a perfectly legal course taken with Mr. Saunders' case prevented a decision being come to on the point. That was not my fault, for I expressed my desire that this very point as to the right of meeting in Trafalgar Square should be expressly raised in this case. I agree that the case stated by Mr. Vaughan does not, as it stands, raise the right of public meeting in the way which alone will satisfy hon. Members opposite; but, nevertheless, Mr. Vaughan expressly declared that "He was of opinion that there was and is no right on the part of the public to occupy Trafalgar Square for the purpose of holding meetings there."

I should have thought that so broad an expression of opinion on the part of Mr. Vaughan would, at any rate, have opened the door to getting of the Court to express some view on that subject had hon. Members opposite thought fit. I most distinctly claim on behalf of the police that under the Metropolitan Police Acts they have the right, whenever public disorder and obstruction in the streets are likely to be the consequence of a meeting, to prevent such meeting. If the Metropolitan Police Acts do not authorize the exercise of such power, they ought instantly to be amended so as to give the power. It would be intolerable, in a city containing five millions of inhabitants, if that were not the law and the legal authority of the Chief of the Police. But hon. Members say, "Our meetings are to be perfectly orderly and peaceable." Well, those are fair words and fair promises constantly made, and no doubt in good faith; but the experience of 1887 shows that those intentions and hopes were disappointed, and the results were such as, no doubt, the hon. Member did not contemplate but deplored.

MR. GRAHAM: The meeting would have been orderly, only you broke it up.

*MR. MATTHEWS: It does not do always to rely on good intentions, and I must claim on behalf of the police that the deplorable result was due to persons who took advantage of what the hon. Member was doing to create disorder. They may not have been his followers, or possibly his followers may have become too enthusiastic and warm to care about the consequences of their act. Experience has shown those responsible for public order in large towns that it is a dangerous thing to congregate large masses of people where, in consequence of the many streets around, they cannot easily be followed by the police, because, if not followed, they may do irreparable mischief, such as was committed in February, 1886. It is clear that if once it became known that a space in the vicinity of crowded and business parts of London is becoming a regular place of meeting, the vultures—the birds of prey of society—will flock there too. I apologize to the House for having occupied its time so long, but I wish to impress on hon. Gentlemen opposite that there have been no steps of hostility taken towards the promoters and organizers of public meetings; on the contrary, whenever a public meeting has been held in the parks, the authorities have done their utmost to protect those going to the meeting, even to the extent of seriously inconveniencing the street traffic. Orders have always been issued to the police ever since I have been at the Home Office—perhaps I have even carried it to excess—that they should do everything they can to facilitate the progress of a procession and open a way as easily as possible to the park, where the law allows meetings to be held. I appeal to those who have really the interests at heart, not merely of any section holding strong political opinions, but of the whole London public, not to encourage the idea that the streets of London ever can be a proper place for public meetings.

*MR. W. R. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I have listened with the utmost interest, and no little surprise, to the speech just delivered by the right hon. Gentleman. So far from being guilty, as the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary accuses us, of hounding on the people of the Metropolis to break the law, and of seeking to bring them into collision with the Government, we Radical Members who represent Metropolitan constituencies have in no small degree risked our own popularity by setting ourselves determinedly against action. But I accuse the right hon. Gentleman of having himself been the chief cause of the breaking of the peace in the Metropolis, while those for whom I speak have been the real champions of law and order in this matter, and the right hon. Gentleman ought to thank us, on behalf of the Government, for being its most valuable auxiliaries in the preservation of the peace. I and those who act with me are anxious that the question should be settled in a pacific manner. The Home Secretary seems by his language to be inviting us to enter the arena; but we are not going to fall into a trap by bringing ourselves into collision with the Government. Twenty-two or 23 years ago I happened to be one of the active participators in the efforts then being made to establish for the people the right of public meeting. I know the risks which at that time some of us ran, not merely of losing our liberty, but even our lives, because the Government of the day sent thousands of troops into the park who were prepared if occasion required it—and they even sought to establish the occasion—to fire upon the people. Well, if the same necessity existed to-day, some of us would be prepared to run the same risks. But we are anxious that the question should be settled in a peaceable manner. However, as I said before, we are not going to fall into the cunning and skilfully baited trap which some have prepared in order to bring us into collision with the police. No doubt the Government would be exceedingly obliged to us if we would do since the meeting convened by Ernest Jones on Kennington Common. The population of the Metropolis is 5,000,000, but the largest public meetings have seldom or ever attained 80,000 or 100,000 men. If the people of London met on the same scale as the citizens of Dublin the numbers would be 200,000 or 250,000; and if such a gathering took place I submit to Her Majesty's Government that it would be impossible to dragoon the people of London out of what they consider to be a popular right. It is not the deprivation of the right which rankled in the hearts of the people; it is the broken heads, the curses, the bad usage to which men, their wives, and even their children have been subjected, not only at the meeting to which special reference has been made, but in the long course of meetings held during the past 15 months. It is absolutely idle to deny that public meeting in the abstract has not been interfered with. I challenge the Home Secretary to justify himself and his police for the action they took on Sunday in violently dispersing a meeting on the Thames Embankment, and afterwards in Hyde Park. If that does not constitute an attack on the right of public meeting, I should like to know what does. There is an aspect of the question on which I should like to touch before I conclude. The hon. Gentleman who immediately preceded me (Mr. Cremer) took great credit to himself in having acted, together with his colleagues, in restraining the people of London during the last 18 months. He certainly did restrain; he acted as a drag upon the people; and a proposition that fell from him exceedingly amused me. He advanced the somewhat astonishing theory that the men who assembled on the Horse Guards Parade in no wise envied the wealth of their richer fellow-citizens. I suppose that, speaking as a working man, he considered that the wealth that he and his colleagues create should be for ever absolutely at the disposal of those classes to which he referred. But to return to the subject more directly before us, let me ask if hon. Members think that the action of the hon. and learned Member for Hackney (Sir C. Russell) was dictated out of pure goodness of heart and from a wish to uphold the right of public meeting that he has not hitherto shown much alacrity in defending? I rather think that certain meetings that have been recently held in the Metropolis, and especially a certain passage of arms between the hon. and learned Gentleman and myself, in which I have been able to rout the hon. and learned Gentleman, horse, foot, and artillery, is the cause which has brought him upon his legs in the House this afternoon. I remember the time when the hon. and learned Gentleman brought all the heavy artillery of his legal logic to bear against Mr. Hyndman, Mr. Champion, and others, who defended themselves, and when, by every artifice of the law, and with all the power of the Government of the day at his back, he sought to obtain a conviction against those men. Because a few panes of glass were broken and a few geese and turkeys were stolen by starving men on one occasion in 1886, when London, through the negligence of the Government, was undoubtedly in the possession of the mob for several hours, that afforded no just ground for suppressing the meeting in Trafalgar Square in which I had the honour to take part. I remember a certain speech made by the noble Lord the Member for West Birmingham. [Laughter.] I am reminded that my description "noble Lord" is a little premature; but the right Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain), after his return from his negotiation of an unsuccessful Fisheries Treaty, said that if such a meeting as that in Trafalgar Square had been held in America, it would have been dispersed vis et armis. No doubt that might be so, for in America the plutocrats are powerful. I had intended to address a most earnest appeal to the right hon. Gentleman for Mid Lothian had he remained in his place. I had intended to invite the right hon. Gentleman to stand up in the House and say a word for us on this London question. In a speech which that right hon. Gentleman made in Nottingham only six weeks before the meeting in Trafalgar Square, he said that if the English democracy did not take matters in regard to Ireland in hand the same state of affairs would arise here in London. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the same state of things did not arise in London November 13, and why it was that his

Mr. Cuninghame Graham

Michelstown gun was, so to speak, spiked? Why was all the eloquence which the right hon. Gentleman bestowed on the democracy nullified? Because the people of this country saw that he was not acting on principle, but from political bias. I do not wish to say one discourteous word of the right hon. Gentleman; but I think that the great popular cause which is at stake is far more important than the feelings of one man, however eminent he may be. Now, I have to justify myself against an attack which I characterize as cowardly. The Daily News to-day, in a leading article directed to certain meetings that have recently been held in the Metropolis, advised the people of London to confide themselves to the careful and cautious counsels given to them by their own Members rather than to follow the rash advice given them by such men as Messrs. Graham and Conybeare. [Laughter.] That may seem a legitimate subject of laughter, but I ask any hon. Member where he has heard of me giving advice that was either inflammatory or in the least intended to provoke a breach of the peace? I have, on the contrary, in season and out of season, stood forward to restrain them; and I will be no party to push unarmed men forward to be decimated, perhaps, by grape shot. Whatever Government are in power, if a collision occurs with the police, and people are again killed by the police, the plutocrats and aristocrats, who alone hold the power in this country, will bear them out in any acts of barbarity they may commit, and those who like myself stand up in the House of Commons and ask for vengeance for the blood that has been shed will be howled down by the one Party in the House and deserted by the other.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury E.): I am not going to arrogate to myself the enormous power over the working classes of the Metropolis which the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cuninghame Graham) does although I must say, that for a number of years I have received some exhibitions of their confidence. I think that if the hon. Member for North-West Lanarkshire wanted to be fair, he should have mentioned that one of the ablest speeches in defence of the right of public meeting in Trafalgar Square was made by the hon. and learned Member for South Hackney, over twelve months ago, when he brought forward a Motion on the subject. And personally I am glad to recognize the sincerity of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, although the last speaker has thought himself entitled to call it in question. But let me bring the discussion back to the Amendment before the House. I think the speech of the Home Secretary was one of the most unhappy that we could possibly have had delivered on this question. We have had learned Gentlemen differing this afternoon as to what is the proper construction of the Police Regulation Act, but, after all, we have to advance this question a stage beyond that point. The proposition laid down by the hon. Member for Bethnal Green requires to be answered by the representative of the Ministry who next speaks; you should declare by Statute that meetings in Trafalgar Square are either distinctly illegal or perfectly legal. We should then know where we are. If it should be decided that such meetings are not legal, the people of London could agitate to obtain a statutory right to meet in Trafalgar Square similar to that which they now enjoy in regard to Hyde Park. Now let me say that we cannot properly compare the meetings of 1886 with that of November, 1887, because there is a fundamental difference between them. The unfortunate circumstances which arose out of the meetings in 1886 arose after the speakers had begun to separate, in fact, after the meeting was supposed to be over. Then came that exodus from the Square, which would not have had the unfortunate consequences which attended it if the police had done their duty. But the conditions of 1887 were quite different; the people were not allowed to approach the Square for the purpose of holding their meeting, their processions were met a distance from the Square, at Bloomsbury on one side, at Westminster Bridge on the other. It was at a distance from the announced place of meeting that the police set upon the people, and an unfortunate collision, for which the police are responsible, took place. So you have no right to say that any riot was the outcome of the meeting called for November 13, 1887. You never allowed the people to assemble; you met the people's processions at considerable distance from the Square with a considerable force of police, and with undoubted military strategy, for which Sir Charles Warren can have all the credit he deserves; you dispersed bodies of unarmed citizens while proceeding to the exercise of their accustomed right, under leaders accustomed to address such meetings in the place proposed. I will not accuse the Home Secretary of equivocation; but there is something very much like equivocation in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. He seems to think that after a considerable period of user of the Square for meetings you can satisfy the people that the user is gone because the Chief Commissioner issued a proclamation or notice denying that right. But that will not satisfy the people. Suppose the whole of your argument is good, that Trafalgar Square is not a good place for meetings; for the sake of argument I yield all you demand upon that point; you must not suppose that the people are going to allow this privilege which they have used for a number of years to be taken away, simply on the ipse dixit of the Chief Commissioner of Police for the time being. If you want to take the privilege away, if your argument is good that the place is the most unsuitable in London for the purpose, then by all means follow out your opinion, but at the same time do have some little respect for something approaching Constitutionalism as we understand it in this country; take some other course than merely placarding the walls with the word of the Chief Commissioner for the time being. That mere action is enough to irritate any population, even supposing you are right in your opinion. I desire, in common with the other Liberal Metropolitan Members, to use whatever influence we have to induce the people to wait and fight out this question on Constitutional lines, but we have received no assistance in that endeavour from Her Majesty's Government. It is all very well for the Home Secretary to quibble over the case of Mr. Saunders. It was the best case we had, because the question of riot was in no way mixed up with it. In other and previous cases before the police courts, there were forcible attempts made to hold a meeting, but these arose entirely out of the case of Mr. Saunders, and therefore we thought it a good case upon which to raise the right of public meeting. Mr. Saunders entered the Square, began to speak, was arrested immediately, and went to the police station, and so arose a case favourable for a decision as to the legitimate right we claim of open-air public speaking in the Square. The Home Secretary says—"You can go to the Square, any of you who think we are wrong, and thereupon bring an action if you are interfered with." But how are we to raise such a case? I hope the Attorney General will address himself to this point. How are we who want the question settled peaceably, who wish to prevent anything like a collision between the authorities and the people—how are we to get a case upon which to challenge a judicial decision in the Courts? Suppose we call a meeting there tomorrow, immediately you take precautions to stop it, and if we have people around us whom we could not control, there would be a collision between them and the police; and then, again, the old question of riot and resisting the police comes forward. I do not profess to be a lawyer, and am looking at this as a layman merely. The Attorney General will admit, I think, that if you have the question of riot introduced, the point at once becomes complicated, and you cannot get that clear decision on the right of meeting which we desire to raise. I know of a case identically the same, in another part of the United Kingdom, when a friend of mine sought to raise the point we desire to raise, but I saw at once he had complicated his position by resisting the police in the execution of their duty; and, I suppose, the reason I escaped, was because I did not resist the police. I hope the Attorney General clearly understands we want this question settled in a peaceable manner; we are prepared to receive a judicial decision, but we are not prepared to take the people to Trafalgar Square, and allow you to use physical force against them, and then say that we had a lot of roughs and created disorder, when we induced a body of respectable persons to demonstrate their position. It is a disgrace to London to see the way in which such large bodies of police are marched to public meetings. I presided the other day at a meeting on Clerkenwell Green, and somebody present counted the number of police on the ground. I have spoken often on Clerkenwell Green, and so have many of my friends near me—it is not, perhaps, the sort of thing Members opposite are in the habit of doing—still, acting within our right, we have done it. It was a cold night, about a fortnight ago, and there were enough police present to make in themselves a large meeting. Since 1887 this practice of drafting off bodies of police to attend public meetings has been going on. I first noticed it at a meeting I attended at Wood Green, one of the first of a series of meetings held to make public protest against the Coercion Act, and there quite an army of police were present, surrounding the doors of the assembly room where the meeting was held. Since then we have become used to the practice in London, and I suppose it will continue until we get rid of the present Government, “a consummation devoutly to be wished.” That is the task we shall set ourselves, and the challenge taken up this evening will help us towards that desired end. Just a word in reference to the speech of the hon. Member for Reading. He spoke of a big petition signed largely by a number of workmen living in the neighbourhood of Trafalgar Square, and it would be instructive to hear where this large number of workmen live in the vicinity of Trafalgar Square. I will allow there are two blocks of model dwellings—though they are a considerable distance away—but elsewhere I do not know where you will find these working-class residents. I am not speaking of traders and persons of leisure. It seems to me very strange that to present this London petition recourse should be had to the hon. Member for the distant constituency of Reading, when hon. Members opposite are proud of reminding us that their Metropolitan representation is five times the strength of ours. Were there no colleagues of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury to present this Petition against holding meetings in Trafalgar Square signed by working men of that neighbourhood?

Possibly, if one of these hon. Members had done so, it would have provoked the expression of a strong counter feeling among his constituents. We have seen the defence of the Government action comes not from Metropolitan Conservative Members, but from the hon. Member for Reading. Is that because hon. Members knew there is a strong and determined feeling on the part of the superior minded working classes in the Metropolis to obtain back again for themselves the right of user of Trafalgar Square for public meetings? They know that large members of working men, while they are not prepared to place themselves in collision with the authorities, wish, by Constitutional means, to effect this purpose, and there is evidence that they will carry out their desire. The whole debate, so far as it has proceeded upon the other side, has been most discouraging to us; but if you think you will get rid of this question by simply telling us that certain clauses of the Police Regulation Act give the power of absorbing this use of the Square which has been enjoyed by the people for a long series of years, let me tell you, you entirely fail to satisfy us and a very large number of persons outside. We want to see, we hope to see, that question settled in a way satisfactory to everyone, and I am sure the only way of a reasonable compromise is that which we have offered again and again, that the right of meeting in the Square should be recognized, duly regulated, and under proper control, so that all who desire to legitimately use the Square for a meeting should have the opportunity of doing so. Even now, before this debate closes, it is not too late for Her Majesty's Government to say something of a conciliatory character on this question. I am sure it would be worth their while, even if they cannot agree with our offer. They might offer something which would be considered a little more conciliatory than anything we have had from them up to the present. The allusions to meetings in “Dod Street” and in “Seven Dials” have no relation to the case. Those are thoroughfares, and no one can for a moment say that “Seven Dials,” where Temperance speakers and street preachers have set up their little stands, comes within the category of open spaces, and is the sort of place to hold a big meeting. In Trafalgar Square you have quite different circumstances: it is an open space. Technically, it is a thoroughfare, but practically it is not so, and it is fully suited for the object for which it has been used in times gone by, and for which it will have to be used again. Her Majesty's Government must be prepared to hear of this Trafalgar Square question over and over again, so long as they keep their present position. We are determined, even if we lose the right of meeting there, that that right shall not be taken away from the people on a warrant or notice issued by the Chief Commissioner of Police for the time being. We are determined not to lose the right; and I ask the Government if they are disposed to offer us the opportunity of a settlement by the discussion of a Bill, or in a Constitutional manner? We shall continue to admonish the people to be patient, we shall educate the people—though they scarcely require that—to wait patiently for the time when the Government will have to give the opportunity for the expression of that displeasure at the Government's action in regard to Trafalgar Square, which the people will not hesitate to express.

An hon. MEMBER called attention to the fact that there were not 40 Members present. The House was counted, and 40 Members were found to be present.

*MR. HOWELL: It was not my intention to take part in this debate, and I do not think I should have done so, but for the amazing speeches of the Home Secretary and the hon. Member for Lanarkshire (Mr. C. Graham). I feel that my position in regard to this question is a somewhat peculiar one, and I am, therefore, compelled to trespass for a few moments upon the time of the House. In the first place, I defy any Member of the Government or any hon. Member on the Ministerial side of the House to point to anything in my past political career which can justify the assertion that I have ever promoted meetings in the open air which have led to disturbance or have been likely to cause disorder. But I have been concerned in some of the largest open air meetings which ever took place in this country, and they have been altogether free from anything like annoyance, riot, or disturbance. So far as the meetings in Trafalgar Square are concerned, I may inform hon. Members opposite that they have been witnessed with approval by most of the residents from the balconies and windows of their houses. I am by no means anxious that there should be any disturbance in Trafalgar Square at this moment—not that I am anxious that there ever should be, but I am specially anxious that under existing circumstances no disturbance should take place there. The speeches of the Home Secretary and the hon. Member for Lanarkshire seemed to me distinctly to invite a meeting in Trafalgar Square, in order that it may be put down.

*MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I do not think that the hon. Member is fairly construing my remarks. I think my remarks were calculated to invite people not to assemble in Trafalgar Square.

*MR. HOWELL: I was obliged to put my own construction upon the words of the hon. Gentleman, and I considered that the whole tone of the speech invited a meeting, especially when it is taken in connection with that of the Home Secretary. I must say that the Home Secretary has taken up a peculiar position for a lawyer to take—namely, that the citizens of this country have no rights except those which are given to them by Statute. I do not profess to be a Constitutional lawyer, nor do I profess to be a lawyer at all; but I have dipped into some law books in my time, and I have endeavoured to find out what the rights and duties of a citizen are. It is a somewhat complicated subject; but, as far as I have been able to find out, I believe that a citizen is entitled to do whatever he is not prohibited from doing, either by Common Law or by Statute. The majority of the rights we enjoy as citizens are not rights which are laid down either by Statute Law or by Common Law, but are—although the phrase is often sneered at—the natural rights of every citizen. I shall be very much astonished if the Attorney General supports the statement of the Home Secretary that user does not give a right of meeting in a particular place. The right of meeting in Trafalgar Square goes back certainly 40 years. A meeting there was proclaimed by a Conservative Government in 1866, but that proclamation was not enforced, and was practically withdrawn, as the proclamation was abandoned and the meeting was held. Under those circumstances, the working men were justified in believing they had a right to meet in Trafalgar Square; and, that being so, they ought to have been dealt with tenderly. Both the Home Office and Scotland Yard ought to have been careful how they disturbed such meetings. The position of the working men is strengthened by the fact mentioned by the hon. Member for Haggerston, that the meetings which preceded the one which was interfered with by the police were got up with money supplied by liberal-minded Members of the Conservative Party, who seem to have supplied both of the sections with money on that occasion. The natural consequence was disturbance and riot, and then came proclamations forbidding the holding of what had hitherto been regarded as perfectly legal, lawful, and peaceable meetings. Perhaps I may say that, although my name has been connected with the meeting which took place, in which Trafalgar Square was referred to the other night, and although I have been identified with meetings of the working classes in the Metropolis for more than 30 years, yet I never, under any circumstances, sanctioned by my presence or by my voice a meeting on a Sunday. Therefore I did not approve of the meeting which took place on that fatal Sunday; but I maintain that those men who went there, believing that they were acting legally, ought not to have been treated with violence by the right hon. Gentleman opposite who says he is as anxious as we are to protect the right of public meeting in the Metropolis. As regards the present position of the question, it is a difficult and complicated one. We have endeavoured to advise the peaceable working men of London not to attempt under the existing circumstances to hold a meeting in Trafalgar Square, lest there should be a conflict with the police. Yet we have been classed by the right hon. Gentleman with those who have hounded the people on to such meetings.

MR. MATTHEWS: No.

*MR. HOWELL: That was certainly the impression left on my mind. The Metropolitan Members have all prayed their friends to keep quiet under existing circumstances. We know that there are persons who hound the people to go into Trafalgar Square and hold meetings, and the only reason why a great demonstration is not called there is that they have not the pluck to go by themselves, but wait until some Metropolitan Liberal Member will head them. As far as we are concerned, however, we do not intend to place ourselves in the position of leading a mob to Trafalgar Square; we say, let those who want such an assemblage, or a conflict with the police, head such a procession; for my own part I wash my hands of it. But I must say that, if the Home Secretary's words meant anything at all, they were an invitation to the people to go to Trafalgar Square.

THE HOME SECRETARY: The hon. Member must have misunderstood me. What my words were intended to convey was, that it is open to anyone who wishes to bring an action to do so.

*MR. HOWELL: I suppose I must be somewhat obtuse, for I am unable to see the difference between the position the right hon. Gentleman now takes up and that which he assumed a short time ago. I would ask how is it possible, under the circumstances, to bring an action? The only course we can conceive has been taken. The police block the Square, and will not allow anyone to go through; so that the only way in which persons can get into the Square to hold a meeting is by hustling the police, in which case they would be accused of attacking them; so that, instead of the question being one as to the right of public meeting, it becomes a mere charge of assaulting the police. I know the matter is a somewhat difficult one, and am anxious that by something said, either in or out of this House, some course may be taken that will enable us to try the right of public meeting, without coming into unnecessary collision with the police or the military authorities. It seems to me that some easy solution of the question might be found. The right hon. Gentleman paid a compliment to the working men in saying they were not anxious, to promote disorder, and anyone knowing the history of the movement in London will thoroughly endorse that statement. I think that the Government might put this question at rest, either by framing regulations to be observed in regard to meetings in Trafalgar Square, or by bringing in a Bill on the subject. It seems to me that the Police Acts that have been referred to have been looked up after the occasion, as we never knew them to be relied upon before; and certainly they were not the Acts cited by the Home Secretary in the first instance. The first contention put forward was that Trafalgar Square was the private property of the Crown; but I suppose the Home Secretary could not well reconcile that with the attitude of the right hon. Gentleman sitting on the same Bench with him. When the question of the semi-disorderly meetings which preceded the suppressed meeting arose, and there was some fear of a conflict, the First Commissioner of Works was asked a Question in this House, and in reply to that question, he said he had not the power to interfere, and then added that if he had the power he had not the will. This was practically giving to the working classes of London, and to the "fringe" spoken of by the Home Secretary, an invitation to make Trafalgar Square a kind of home. That invitation did not come from the Liberal Members: on the contrary, it was deprecated by them, just as they would deprecate anything tending to bring the people and the police into collision. But since the Government will not accept the suggestion of my hon. Friend the Member for Haggerston (Mr. Cremer), and will do nothing to facilitate a settlement of this question in a Court of Law, they are, I maintain, in duty bound, as the upholders of law and order, to bring in a measure dealing with the subject. I would, before concluding, accentuate the remarks of my hon. Friend as to the attitude taken in 1886, believing that it deserves to be accentuated, because it arose in this way. We were told we had a right of meeting in Hyde Park and some of the other parks of the Metropolis, and we certainly now possess the right; but we had to fight for it continuously until the concession was obtained. Prior to this, however, we were told by the then Conservative Government that we had no right of meeting in the parks, though we had the right of meeting in Trafalgar Square. Under all these circumstances, and in view of all these contradictory statements by Members of Conservative Governments, we say it is the bounden duty of the present Government, before some great catastrophe takes place, to endeavour, and that promptly, to settle this important question.

*MR. CONYBEARE: I must say that I do not share the opinions of some of my hon. Friends on this side of the House as to the attitude the Government have taken on this question. I am not disappointed at being met by a simple non possumus on the part of the Government; it is exactly what I expected; and, had they taken any other line, there would have been grounds on my part for surprise. I congratulate the Radicals of the Metropolis on the success of their recent action in having procured a whole evening for the discussion of this important subject. It is less than a week since a convention or conference of the Radical Clubs of the Metropolis met to consider their future action on this matter. We had there the Metropolitan Members represented by the hon. Member for Bethnal Green (Mr. Pickersgill), the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. O. V. Morgan), and the hon. and learned Member for Hackney (Sir C. Russell), who has spoken with such force to-night, and has put to the Home Secretary questions which he cannot answer; and the result has been that we have brought this question into the front rank, and at the same time have stimulated into a more active frame of mind the representatives of Liberalism and Radicalism in the Metropolis. The question is not whether Trafalgar Square is the most convenient place of meeting; it is as to what are the Constitutional rights of the citizens of London; and the Government may rest assured that, as previous Tory Home Secretaries have been signally defeated on this question, so, likewise, will they be, whether in a Court of Law or elsewhere. The last time this question was brought prominently forward was when Hyde Park was won for the right of public meeting on the part of the people. It is not quite accurate to say, as some have said, that it was won by the passing of the Parks Act. If I recollect aright, the Parks Act was not passed until some years later, 1872. The fight was really won when our forefathers tore down the railings of Hyde Park. [Mr. J. ROWLANDS: Your forefathers are now in the House.] Yes. I am glad to think so, and I hope they will stand by us now when we try to assert the right of free speech, though we cannot by any possibility do it in the same fashion, because Trafalgar Square could easily, being a comparatively small space, be occupied by police and soldiery, and rendered impregnable against unarmed men. I, for one—and I think I have a right to protest against the slanders which have been showered upon me—have never counselled the people of the Metropolis to rush upon the batons of the police in Trafalgar Square. I have taken an active part certainly, but not a violently active part in certain meetings held on Saturday afternoons, last summer, and in connection with one of which a case came before the magistrates. And I have deemed it my duty to come forward in assertion of the right of free speech and free public meeting, both in this House and elsewhere; and I defy the Daily News, or any other paper, or any other person or politician, to charge me with having incited the crowd in London to violent attacks upon the police, or to throw themselves upon the bludgeons of the police in Trafalgar Square. I took part in the Conference to which I have already referred; but, far from sharing the views which some were prepared to advocate in that Convention, I gave advice of an opposite character, and it was upon my suggestion that the hon. Members for the Metropolis brought the matter forward this evening in the way in which they have done. [A laugh.] Hon. Members may sneer, but I decline to be bound by a merely geographical interpretation of my Parliamentary duties. Now, the Home Secretary has made a series of comments which are not warranted by the facts as they exist. He has, with a degree of assurance which would be surprising in anyone else, charged us with being afraid to try the issue involved in this case. It is a little too bad that the right hon. Gentleman, having commenced his speech with a criticism of that kind, should wind up by comparing honest artisans and mechanics of the Metropolis to vultures and birds of prey, and that he should use other insulting language with respect to them. With regard to the legal aspect of the question, the right hon. Gentleman says there have been some 20 opportunities when we might have tried the question. There have not been 20, but there have been a certain number, of every one of which we have availed ourselves, and that in spite of repeated obstacles, which I charge the Government with having deliberately thrown in our way, and through which we have not yet succeeded in getting this question tried upon its merits. We have been thwarted, so to speak, by the most miserable and pettifogging quibbles which could possibly be suggested by a third or fifth-rate lawyer. I ventured to ask the Home Secretary his authority for still continuing the illegal proclamation of Sir Charles Warren, and he replied it consisted of the decisions of Justices Charles, Wills, and Grantham. But those judgments were directed, not to the legality of the proclamation, nor even to the question whether there is any right of meeting in Trafalgar Square; and what we desire is that the case should be tried upon its merits, and not upon any bye-issue. Let us see what those cases were. In the first, the decision of Mr. Justice Charles was given in the case of the Queen against Mr. Cuninghame-Graham, arising out of the fatal meeting on the 13th November, and which will cause the day to be known in history as "Bloody Sunday." I contend that if the police had not been there, and there had been no illegal attempt to disperse a perfectly orderly and peaceable meeting, there would have been no disturbance. And the disturbance thus illegally occasioned by the Government prejudiced the whole issue, for the charge against my hon. Friend (Mr. Graham) on that occasion was that he had participated in an unlawful assembly, and on that charge he was sentenced, being acquitted on [the charge of riot. But even were our right to meet in the Square admitted by all, that same charge might have arisen in the event of a disturbance, from whatever cause, taking place; and, therefore, supposing Mr. Justice Charles, in summing up on the question whether, owing to the disturbance, my hon. Friend had taken part in an unlawful assembly, had said anything about the question of the right of public meeting in Trafalgar Square, it would have been a mere obiter dictum, and would not have had the slightest weight as a judicial decision, and the Home Secretary must know that quite as well as myself. I maintain that there is no more right to interfere with a meeting of working men in Trafalgar Square than there is to interfere with a meeting at any club, unless a dangerous disturbance arises, and then in both cases it might become the duty of the police to interfere. I come now to the Judgment of Mr. Justice Wills and Mr. Justice Grantham. In that case my friend Mr. Dillon Lewis had the courage to come forward in defence of the public rights. And I think every citizen owes him a debt of gratitude for the unselfish devotion with which he has fought this question. The Home Secretary has told us that in that case the Judges decided that there was no right to hold a meeting in Trafalgar Square. That is not so. That question was not raised and argued on its merits—at any rate, no binding decision was given upon it, for in their Judgment the Judges distinctly state, "We abstain from pronouncing a Judgment on the right of public meeting, which we think it is not for us to decide." Therefore, whatever opinion they may have expressed in that case, it was, as in the case of Mr. Cuninghame Graham, a mere obiter dictum, which is not entitled to be considered as a judicial decision. The charge preferred by Mr. Lewis was a charge of conspiracy against the police and the Home Secretary to prevent the people from exercising their just and acknowledged rights. The precise charge was that of conspiring by unlawful violence and unlawful means to prevent Her Majesty's subjects from exercising their lawful rights; to injure and annoy the people, and to deprive them of their just rights, thereby endangering the public peace. And I think the following facts upon which Mr. Dillon Lewis framed his charge will, in the opinion of most people, amply justify his action. I am reading from the sworn information of James Parker, of 51, Southampton Street, Camberwell, who states that "A body of police—some 12 or 16 of the N. Division stationed at the Obelisk, marched forward and placed themselves in front of us, and several others marched by the side of the processions, and attempted to push members of the processions out of position and to get into the procession. . . . It was about four o'clock, and the several processions which I and the other four officers hereinbefore mentioned were leading, were at the foot of the Surrey side of Westminster Bridge, when one of the police constables who had followed at the side of the processionists and had made himself conspicuous by pushing against them and trying to force himself into their ranks, said to the Police Constables near him, 'Now the b———'s will be sent back quicker than what they came.' When we arrived at the centre of the bridge a mounted patrol rode up from the Middlesex side and gave some orders to a policeman, who seemed to be in command of the police who were accompanying our processions, and the man who received the orders said to him in reply, 'Good God, are we to do that?' The Patrol replied, 'That's your orders.' The processions continued on until we arrived at the rests in Bridge Street, when the processions wheeled round between the two rests, and the head of the procession so faced the police, mounted and foot, that were drawn up, to the number of some 300 to 400, at the corner of, and stretching across, Parliament Street from one side to the other, with the obvious purpose of preventing any of the public passing up and through Parliament Street. I put my hand gently on the head of one of the horses for the purpose merely of ascertaining my legal right not to have the passage over a public highway barred to me, and asked to be allowed to pass through Parliament Street, whereupon I was immediately struck with their fists by two police constables, and thereupon immediately the whole of the police constables on foot drew their staves and commenced a violent and indiscriminate attack upon the members of the procession, beating them over their heads and bodies without provocation of the slightest kind. In particular, I saw one police constable strike a man named John Simpson over the shoulders with his truncheon, and kick him in the back as he was going away from him after being struck. Simpson had done nothing, and was walking quietly immediately in the next rank to me. Simultaneously with the assault on the people by the foot police, the mounted constables charged the processionists, knocking down and riding over them, and I saw one mounted policeman ride a woman down deliberately and ride over her. I and others assisted to pick her up, and she stated she had just been to St Thomas' Hospital to visit her husband, who was an in-patient there. The police also knocked down an old man, who told me he had been a soldier and had fought under Sir Charles Warren. I appealed to Superintendent Dunlop, who was in command there, to call his men off, and I would take the procession another way, and the head of the procession by my instructions moved towards Storey's Gate."

The circumstances are of so extraordinary a nature that one would scarcely imagine they could occur in a civilized country. One would imagine one was reading a description of the Peterloo massacre or some of the outrages which have disgraced the Government of Ireland at the present day. But the fact is, that I have been reading the sworn testimony of one of those who was present on this particular occasion in Parliament Street within a few hundred yards of this building. And I would ask the House particularly to notice that this was not a meeting that was being held in a disorderly fashion, or even in disobedience to an illegal police proclamation. It was a peaceable and perfectly legitimate procession, as to the regulation, but not the suppression, of which the Police Act contains specific provisions. Mr. Lewis applied for a warrant against Sir Charles Warren, the Home Secretary, and the Chief Commissioner of Works. The magistrate refused to grant the summons, and Mr. Lewis was compelled to go to a Superior Court and ask for a mandamus to compel the magistrate to grant the summons. The decision of Justices Wills and Grantham was not that there was no right of public meeting in Trafalgar Square. They declared that that question was not before them, and the only question they did decide was that the magistrate having exercised his jurisdiction, it was not competent for them to review it, however wrongly it might have been exercised. My contention, however, is that the decision of the Superior Court was wrong, and that the Judges had the right to interfere. For in refusing to grant a summons, the magistrate did not exercise his jurisdiction in such a manner as to oust the right of appeal. I hope that after this explanation we shall hear no more from the Home Secretary or from the Front Bench that the question at issue in that case was the question of the public right of meeting in Trafalgar Square, and that it was decided against us by the Judges. I may add to what I have said in this connection that if the magistrate—Mr. Vaughan—had granted the summons Mr. Lewis would have insisted, under the Vexatious Indictments Act, on being bound over to prosecute. In the case of Mr. Saunders, that gentleman went deliberately to Trafalgar Square, by a sort of arrangement with the police, and allowed himself to be technically assaulted in order that he might bring a specific case to trial. I hold in my hand a report of the proceedings before Sir James Ingham, the magistrate, who dismissed it, because, forsooth, Mr. Saunders, who used to be a Member of this House, did not use violence enough. Mr. Corrie Grant, the able advocate of Mr. Saunders, asked that the case might be dealt with in such a manner as to allow of an appeal, but Sir J. Ingham refused, on the ground that he had neither assaulted nor resisted the police. And this leads me to remark upon the ridiculous position to which the Government have brought the question, in their efforts to shirk a fair decision. Mr. Saunders was put out of Court, because he would not resist the police. In Borgia's case, we are ruled out of Court because he did. In Mr. Saunders' case the question of Sir C. Warren's authority for the issue of a Proclamation was argued. Now the Home Secretary in a reply which he gave to a Question which I put to him to-day, stated that the Chief Commissioner acted under the Police Act. It is to be regretted that the right hon. Gentleman does not make his official answers square with the views of the legal advisers of the Government, for I find that in the case of Mr. Saunders, Mr. Poland distinctly stated that these Proclamations do not come under the Police Act, but that they are notices under the Common Law. It is very strange if they are notices under the Common Law that the right hon. Gentleman should come down here and say that they are authorized by the Police Act. I would recommend the right hon. Gentleman to make himself better acquainted with the contents of the Police Act. I am not surprised that he refused to read the section of the Statute when he was challenged to do so by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Hackney (Sir O. Russell). That section 52 (of 2 and 3 Vic. c 47), merely provides that the Police may "make regulations for the route to be observed by all carts, carriages, horses, and persons, and for preventing obstruction of the streets and thoroughfares in all times of public processions," not a word about public meetings in open spaces, much less about proclaiming during the sweet will and pleasure of the Police Commissioner all meetings whatever. Now I come to the Borgia case, where the unfortunate young man Borgia had his coat torn off his back and was nearly throttled by the police for merely standing by the balustrade in the Square and remonstrating against the brutal violence with which one of these moral miracles in blue threw down a poor woman. It is, by the way, a fair comment upon the equitable administration of the law, that this poor fellow was treated by the police with ferocious violence, while Mr. Saunders and myself, though we were speaking and putting resolutions, were never touched by them. In this case, as is well known, the Government promised that a case should be stated so as fairly to raise the questions at issue. On the strength of their pledge, we undertook to hold no more meetings. We have honourably fulfilled our undertaking. The Government have, as usual, basely and dishonourably gone back upon their word; and, through the Treasury Solicitor and Mr. Poland, have got a case stated, which simply pre-judges the whole issue, and, as the Home Secretary has himself admitted, is simply useless for the purpose we have in view. In all these cases the Government, so far from assisting in bringing the question to an issue, have confronted us with every difficulty and obstacle that could be put in our way. We have done everything in our power to get the question tested by a competent legal tribunal, and we have been met by nothing but quibbling and pettifogging objections. And now the Home Secretary has the audacity to come and sneer at us for not having tried the case in a Court of law, because we knew we should fail. Such is the candour of the present Government. The Government may protest that they are in favour of public meetings in open spaces; but at the bottom of their hearts they are nothing of the kind, unless, indeed, the dames of the Primrose League choose to hold a meeting in Trafalgar Square to bolster up Coercion in Ireland, when, no doubt, the Government would do all in their power to protect them from contact with the people. The Home Secretary spun a long yarn, and went into elaborate arguments as to the right of meeting in a public thoroughfare. Now, none of us ever claimed an indisputable right of meeting in a public thoroughfare, or that we should block up Parliament Street and interfere with the ordinary course of business. What we claim is the right of meeting in open spaces, and it is that Constitutional right which the Government, in a despotic manner, are trying to deprive us of. We contend that our right to meet in open spaces is inalienable, inherent, and constitutional. Let me point out how we have been deprived of it. It is not that the Government have refused to allow a particular meeting to be held; we know perfectly well that the law permits magistrates to prevent a particular meeting, when it is believed it will cause danger to and alarm peaceable citizens. "But even then it has been expressly laid down by Chief Baron Pallis in O'Kelly v. Harvey," that "A magistrate is not justified in forcibly dispersing a meeting on the ground merely that he believes or has reasonable and probable grounds for believing that the meeting was held with an unlawful intent, unless the meeting be in itself unlawful; and a plea justifying an assault on the ground that it was committed by a magistrate in the dispersing of a meeting must either allege as a fact that the meeting was unlawful, or must state facts from which its unlawfulness can be inferred."

That was not however sufficient for the Government. They would not limit themselves to doing that, for they knew they could not always depend on a jury justifying their lawless attacks upon unoffending citizens. So they issued a general proclamation prohibiting all meetings that had been called, or might be called in the future. I challenge the Home Secretary and the Attorney General to point out anything in the Common Law which justifies the issue of a general proclamation of this kind. I say they have no right to deprive us of the right of public meeting, as such a proclamation enables them to do, from one end of the country to the other, for if it be lawful in Trafalgar Square, then they have equal authority to issue similar general proclamations in respect of any other open space. Then if the Common Law does not authorize this action, we are entitled to know if it is done under Statute Law. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary has not cited any Statute Law. He quoted 2 and 3 Vic., chap. 47, sec. 52, as his authority, but that only authorises the Chief Commissioner to prevent the obstruction of thoroughfares on the occasion of public processions, public rejoicings and illuminations. Now I wish to point out we are not contending that there is a legal right which you can point to in any particular Statute, although I believe if you refer to the Bill of Rights in the reign of William III., you will find the right of public meeting included. We however do not assert a mere right under Statute Law; we take our stand on a far higher principle, we say that we have a Constitutional right which has been sanctioned and emphasized not only by outside authority but by this House itself; indeed we say that the right is anterior to the existence of this House. For this House itself is but the product by evolution of the ancient Teutonic custom of meeting together in the open to discuss the public affairs of the Commune. I find in the Journals of the House, for November and December, 1641, a reference to this particular right, and it appears that the House itself supported the claim of the people to assemble in the open space outside the House, and discharged the constables from the duty imposed on them by the Government to disperse the people. What answer will the Attorney General be able to give on this point? There are many other authorities I could quote in support of my contention—among them the eminent jurist Storey and Lord Erskine. But I do not wish to trouble the House further. I submit that I have laid contentions before it against which the Home Secretary has not advanced and cannot advance a single argument. Now, we are anxious to have this matter settled, and I will, therefore, make this fair offer to the Government. Will you authorize me at the next meeting of the Radical Clubs to state that if we raise this question in a peaceable form by means of a technical assault you will engage that we shall have it fairly tried before a competent authority, and not be met by all manner of technical and pettifogging quibbles? I can only say that if you decline this offer we can only believe that the Government wish to shirk a fair and square decision by the Courts of the country upon the merits of the case, and if that be the case, though I should be sorry to appear in any way to use a threat, I know enough of the public feeling outside to be able to say without fear of proving a false prophet, that many hon. Members on the Ministerial side of the House who represent Metropolitan constituencies will have at the next Election cause to regret that the Government have taken up this attitude.

*MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I should not have taken part in the debate, but for the provocation given by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, who, in answer to the hon. and learned Member for Hackney, did not condescend to state on what particular Statute he relied as a warrant for the proclamation issued by the Chief Commissioner. Had he done so there would have been no necessity for continuing the debate. All we have heard from him is that the proclamation was issued under 2 and 8 Vic., cap. 47, and when he was challenged as to the particular section, he made no answer whatever.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: He said section 52.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: I am obliged to the Attorney General for giving us this information, but I wish to point out that that section does not contain one word which could authorize the proclamation which has been issued. I am endeavouring to put my point as clearly and as distinctly as possible. I have not the advantage which the right hon. Gentleman has of being a lawyer as well as a Member of this House, but I have the advantage of being guided by Statute Law. And I may point out that the proclamation which has been issued is not a proclamation forbidding some particular meeting, because it was likely to be attended by a breach of the peace; but it was a general proclamation forbidding all persons to go in upon the Square, a proclamation applying to all meetings for all time—meetings which had been called, as well as meetings which had not been called. The Section does not authorize the prohibition of any meeting under any circumstances whatever. These are the words—

“The Chief Commissioner may, from time to time, and as occasion shall require, make regulations for the route to be observed by all carts, carriage-horses and persons, and for the preventing of obstruction in the streets and thoroughfares within the Metropolis in all times of public processions, public rejoicing and illumination: also he shall give directions to the constables for keeping order and for preventing any obstruction of the thoroughfares.”

Now, this really means preventing obstruction of the thoroughfare in the immediate neighbourhood of Her Majesty's Palaces, public offices, high courts, parliament, courts of law and equity, police-courts, theatres, and other places of public resort, and I suggest that the only meaning is to give the Chief Commissioner of Police such power as he ought to have for reasonable purposes. He has no power to prevent public meetings at all. There is only a power to regulate traffic, so as to prevent obstruction so far as is consistent with permitting a thing lawful to happen. Now, in answer to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Hackney, the Home Secretary said the question of the right to issue this proclamation had been already decided. I venture to reply that it has never been decided; it has never been technically raised for decision; there has never been an opportunity of raising it, and the decision in the case of the Queen v. Graham was a decision solely on the question of unlawful assembly. There was another charge presented to the jury, but the jury found against that charge: which was one of riot, and I need not point out that there may be an unlawful assembly for a perfectly lawful purpose. The purpose of going into Trafalgar Square may have been, and indeed was, perfectly lawful, but the means taken to obtain the end desired amounted in the opinion of the jury to an unlawful assembly. Therefore, the decision that there had been an unlawful assembly in no way alters or affects the right of meeting in Trafalgar Square. The case of ex-parte Dillon Lewis is still farther from any decision as to the right to issue any such proclamation. It is abundantly clear that there is no power to prevent theatres being opened, although large crowds might assemble. All that is cast upon the police in connection with these crowds is the duty to regulate the traffic and the routes of carriages, and the direction in which pedestrians shall walk; and it never entered into human imagination until Chief Commissioner Warren issued his proclamation that anyone could do anything of this kind under this particular section. The Home Secretary, in answer to the challenge whether the Government had not permitted this question of right being tried out, said, it was perfectly open to anyone to bring an action for being obstructed in his rights—if such a right exist. I venture to say that no more ridiculous proposition was ever made. It is perfectly clear that I have a right to walk along any thoroughfare; but if it happen that I come into collision—not intentionally or in a criminal sense—with some other person exercising the same right, I have no right to bring an action against him because I have been obstructed in my right of passing along the thoroughfare. It is a most monstrous doctrine which the right hon. Gentleman has suggested. It is true that, in one sense, Trafalgar Square is a thoroughfare, because there are parts of it by which persons passing along might, somewhat inconveniently perhaps, go from one street to another. But it is not entirely a thoroughfare, because the position of the Nelson monument and its pedestal is such as to prevent thoroughfare and to form a space exceedingly convenient for large numbers of persons to assemble without causing any sort of obstruction. Indeed, the argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary goes the length of saying that there is no right of public meeting in this country at all. He says you have a right of public meeting in any place hired for the purpose; but let me point out that the general public have no such right, even if they pay for admission to it. The right hon. Gentleman's proposition goes to the length of preventing public meetings entirely in this country. When we wanted peaceably to try this right we were not allowed to do it, and now the right hon. Gentleman taunts us with resorting to force. It is unfortunately true that, in connection with these meetings, some men have used very rash language, which has been utilized by the Home Secretary for the purpose of preventing public meetings in Trafalgar Square altogether. If Trafalgar Square is not a proper place for holding meetings, then let the Government say so properly by statutory enactment, and let it be declared clearly. The right hon. Gentleman told us that the right of public meeting in the parks—and he especially mentioned Hyde Park—had been given us by Statute. I take leave to say I can find no such thing in any Statute. But the right hon. Gentleman will find—and I had an opportunity of arguing this point before Judges sitting on the Bench—and I had occasion to consider the point carefully when Mr. Odger and others were prosecuted—the right hon. Gentleman will, I say, find that the right of public meeting already exercised was admitted by Parliament to need some restriction, and as a consequence the right of public meeting was limited to certain parts of the parks; the right was regulated by statute law, but it was not created by it. I do not know what the Government's contention is as to the future of the right of meeting in Trafalgar Square. The inconvenience to trade about there, and to the inhabitants of the neighbourhood, may be fair ground for enacting something about the right of meeting there; but it is no ground for arbitrary proclamation; it is no ground for so using the police as to aggravate the people. The people of this Metropolis have been law-abiding. The meetings which have been held in Trafalgar Square have been, with a few exceptions, orderly meetings. Huge meetings have been held there, with only such inconvenience as will always arise from the assembly of large bodies of people. If you say Trafalgar Square is a place where, under no circumstances, large bodies of people ought to assemble, that is a fair proposition to put to Parliament for consideration; but that is very different to claiming the right of the Chief Commissioner to prohibit a meeting altogether at his mere whim and fancy.

*MR. PICTON (Leicester): Reference has been made to the 52nd section of the Metropolitan Police Amendment Act; but I venture to say that at the time that Act was passed no one concerned ever dreamt that the 52nd section could be put to the purposes to which it has been applied. I will show that, while many points in the Bill were objected to, no one ever supposed that the 52nd section could be applied as a means of interference with the liberties of the people. When the Bill was introduced, it was felt to be a very liberal measure. Captain Wood, we read in Hansard,

“was strongly opposed to the Bill, as it tended greatly to interfere with the powers of the police, and was in some respects of a Republican tendency.”

Upon the Report stage, Mr. Hume, who was then very active in Parliamentary life, objected to pay the expenses of the police out of the Consolidated Fund, and suggested that it should be an annual Vote like the Army and Navy. In that case Mr. Hume said that all discussions as to the conduct of the police could take place at the same time. This I mention to show the jealousy that was felt at the time as to the possibility of interference with popular liberty by the police. In the same month, July, 1839, while the Bill was in the Report stage, a terrible riot occurred in Birmingham, and during one of the discussions on the Bill Mr. T. Duncombe called attention to the riot, and read an extract from the morning papers as follows:—

“Men, women, and children were thrown down and trampled on while the police belaboured them right and left. Broken heads and arms, with other severe wounds, were the result. One man, who was returning from his work, had his teeth knocked out. The poor fellow exclaimed, ‘Am I in England!’ Several special constables came up at the time and expressed their horror at such proceedings.”

On account of what took place, several hon. Members urged strongly the necessity of the House being on its guard against the possibility of an abuse of the law. Mr. Hume saw in this occurrence an additional reason for an annual Vote, instead of a charge on the Consolidated Fund, and said that the House should have a Constitutional check over the police. Mr. William Williams said—

“The disturbance in Birmingham was created by the police. Now, under this Bill a person raising his arm merely to defend himself from a blow would be liable to imprisonment; and could it be supposed that the magistrates at Birmingham, under the present circumstances of excitement, would not non-suit in such a case?"

It will thus be seen that Members of the House of that time were on the watch against an abuse of police power, and yet, though a very large number of the clauses were keenly discussed, no one ever referred to Clause 52. Of course, they might expect that it would be made use of to prevent public meetings in time of excitement and danger. No one objected to that; but if they had thought that under the clause a proclamation could be put out indefinitely, or possibly for ever, preventing public meetings in well-known public places, I am sure someone would have criticized the clause. I heartily agree with the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) that the interpretation which finds such power in the clause is exceedingly forced, and is such a one as it requires a legal training to appreciate. I quite understand the desirability of coming to a "Division" as soon as possible, but at the same time the matter under discussion is one of such supreme importance to the peace and order of London in the future, that I must press on the Government the necessity of coming to some more reasonable conclusion in regard to it than they have yet done. Never in recent times, where any such question has been raised between the Government and the people, have the people come worst off in the end. I believe that the Government and the public owe a great deal to the Liberal Members for Metropolitan constituencies for the persistent and patient efforts which they have made at some sacrifice to themselves to prevent any conflict between the people and the police on this subject; but I doubt whether even those hon. Members have the power of preventing such a conflict, unless the people who believe that they have a right to meet in Trafalgar Square see some way of having it peaceably established.

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): Sir, I should not have attempted to infuse a little life into the very dry bones of this debate, if I had not been directly appealed to by hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway opposite. I cannot help feeling that that debate has been, to a great extent, but a re-echo of the much more animated debate which took place on the same subject last Session; and I confess myself unable to understand on what ground the question should have been raised in its present shape, or the previous discussion revived. I conceive that the position in regard to the matter has not changed, and that there is no good reason why we should reopen the question on which the House has expressed a decided opinion. I have been somewhat challenged by the hon. and learned Member for South Hackney (Sir C. Russell). I must say, however, there has been throughout this debate, and even in the able speech of the hon. and learned Member, a confusion between the right of public meeting and the right of free discussion. The House will remember the animated debate which we had on a previous occasion, as to whether Trafalgar Square is Crown property or open to the public. The whole discussion to-night has proceeded on the basis that, either by Act of Parliament, by custom, or in some other way, Trafalgar Square has become dedicated to the public. Now, I assert that if Trafalgar Square has become dedicated to the public for the purpose of the general public passing through and enjoying it, there is no legal right to occupy the Square for the purpose of public meetings. I stated in March last, in terms about which there can be no doubt, that there is no judgment or dictum to support the idea that there is a right to occupy any public thoroughfare for the purpose of a public meeting. There is no judgment which directly or incidentally recognizes any such right. This is not a question of the right of public meeting or of public discussion; it is simply a question of the place in which you are entitled to have discussion. The hon. and learned Member for Hackney has been obliged to admit that it is not a legal right that is claimed, but something that rests upon custom. Free right of access for passage negatives the right to occupy the whole space for a public meeting. The hon. and learned Member for Camborne (Mr. Conybeare) said that in the case of Mr. Saunders, Mr. Poland, who appeared for the police constables, did not rely upon the proclamation of the Commissioner, but relied upon the Common Law. But the hon. Member forgot that the notice was not that of the 18th of November, under the Metropolitan Police Act, but it was that of the 8th of November, issued with the sanction of the First Commissioner of Works, to which Mr. Poland's observations were directed. With all respect for the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh), who, I must say, always argues legal points as if he had been brought up to the law, in my opinion the power given to the police to prevent obstruction will apply when the cause of obstruction is a public meeting. I expressed this opinion last year, and I believe the majority of Members who heard the discussion on that occasion were of opinion that the Commissioner of Police did not exceed his authority in taking precautions that an obstruction was prevented. If the claim made is good in the case of Trafalgar Square, it will be equally good for Waterloo Place, the Thames Embankment, the front of Buckingham Palace, Belgrave Square, Regent Street, or Covent Garden Market. This so-called right is not a right known to the law at all. But, as the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary expressed it, acquiescence in an unlicensed user by a certain number of the public, in contravention of the public rights, may be permitted as long as no evil consequences are likely to follow; but when the Executive find that the result is to involve any section of the public in danger, or to tend to the public inconvenience, it is the duty of the Executive to step in and put an end to that which has been previously acquiesced in. Now, may I say that the only thing that has infused life into the debate has been the want of harmony among Members of the Opposition? I cannot join in attributing to the hon. and learned Member for Hackney the unworthy motive of desiring to reinstate himself in public favour. But still it is a little strange that the debate should have occurred just after some unfortunate discussion. Now, I think all will agree that we ought not to bring political discussion into the streets. As a practical question, regulation is futile; for we could not limit the numbers attending a meeting—indeed, the hon. Member for Lanark has spoken of the population of London warranting the gathering together of 200,000 or 250,000 persons. There must always be danger of a large mob getting out of hand, and where there is risk of danger prevention is ten thousand times better than cure. If there is any foundation for the suggestion that the riot of 1886 was promoted with the object of damaging the then Government, surely that Government might have instituted inquiry, if it was deemed necessary. Her Majesty's Government have endeavoured to do their duty, as previous Governments have done; and I believe that no substantial ground has been shown for raising the question again on this Amendment.

*MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): The Attorney General says that Trafalgar Square stands on all-fours with Covent Garden Market and the other places he mentioned. We do not think so. We conceive there is enough in the peculiarities of Trafalgar Square to mark it off for particular treatment in this matter. The Attorney General speaks of passing and re-passing, but it is ridiculous for anyone to imagine that meetings cannot be held in certain portions of Trafalgar Square without in any way materially hindering the passing and re-passing of the public. The Attorney General also uses the old argument of how many grains go to a heap, and says it is impossible to regulate the crowds who might assemble in the Square. If the hon. and learned Gentleman will read the Bill which I had the honour of bringing in last year, he will see that it is left to those guarding the public peace to remove persons who are endeavouring to attend a meeting beyond a certain prescribed space. Now, the Home Secretary made a very unwise statement considering the present state of public feeling. If the Home Secretary means that he is willing we or any person shall have the opportunity, by some means of collusion, if I may use the word, with the police, of raising the legal aspects of the question, well and good; we are ready to do that. But if he merely means that people, without any such arrangement or collusion, are to endeavour to hold such a meeting in the Square, then that means simply an invitation to create a riot. In the present state of public feeling, for any person to call a mass of people together to endeavour to carry out such a suggestion, to take up what seemed to be the challenge of the right hon. Gentleman, would be to bring the people into conflict with the police, and this is a course neither I or any other of the Liberal Members of London can advise. On the contrary, we have stood in the way of such a thing, because we do not see what good is to be gained by endeavouring to raise again the question of legality in such a manner in the present state of feeling among the people and at the Home Office because a test case, free from the complications of an unlawful meeting, could not be obtained. Our demand is a very simple one. In the name of a great number of very respectable men, we want, first, to have, if possible, some opportunity of a peaceable kind of obtaining a legal decision on the matter; in the second place, we want not so much that the right of meeting in Trafalgar Square shall be declared as that the right of the Commissioner of Police to prevent such meetings by perpetual decree shall be declared not to exist. That is the real question in the matter, but you go off into the right of public meeting, and that is not the real point. We deny that the Commissioner has this right, and declare he has acted illegally. I challenge the Government to face that point. You say, "Why do you not go to Trafalgar Square?" and some of the more energetic and less thoughtful among us would do so. We reply, "Simply because we do not desire to hurry the people of the Metropolis into violence and possible bloodshed." The Government and the Home Office have much to answer for in disturbing the peace, and not allowing this matter to be concluded. We do not wish to have our meetings interfered with by order of the police. Let them be prohibited by order of the House, or let them be permitted under proper regulations—we have nothing to reproach ourselves in making that proposition. The Attorney General says there is no ground for re-opening this question; and I say—and I speak, I believe, for the whole of the Metropolitan Members on this side—that we shall re-open it on every possible occasion, and shall continue to re-open it until we get the decision we are asking for. I am rather surprised—and I am sure it will be remarked—that no London Tory Member has spoken in this debate. We had the action of the Government supported by the hon. Member for Reading, but no Metropolitan Member has given them support. But I did not rise to prolong this discussion further, but to state distinctly what our position is. I can speak with the authority of all the London Liberal Members, and desire to point out that our action is taken upon the principle that has animated us all through—the desire that the people should not lose any cherished right we and they believe they have; and that no false rights—illegitimate rights if I may use the expression—shall be claimed or exercised by the Chief Commissioner of Police in the Metropolis; but that this matter shall be put by the Government, or, if they like it, by the initiation of a private Member of the House on some footing, so that the prohibition of these meetings by the Commissioner, by means of an universally applicable order, shall not be permitted henceforth; but that the right of meeting shall be recognized under proper regulations. We shall go to a Division on this matter, and we shall raise it again whenever we shall get an opportunity, and urge with all the force we can the same argument we have urged to night, and with, I hope, some endeavour on the part of the other side to meet those arguments a little better than they have to-night.

*MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): My hon. Friend has clearly stated my views, but I, in common with other Metropolitan Members, must express my deep regret at the attitude Her Majesty's Government have taken up on this matter. The Government does not seem to appreciate the fact that it is a most serious question to be dealt with immediately in a serious, practical way. The Home Secretary has taunted Liberal Members for London with having headed processions, and with having done many things that they really have not done; the fact being that it is due to those Members that further disaster has not arisen with regard to this matter. The Home Secretary refuses every proposal in the direction of peace, and all the comfort we get from him is practically a challenge to hold another meeting in order to obtain a legal decision. It is clear from to-night's discussion that lawyers disagree, and I, as a layman, say, considering the serious nature of the question to be dealt with, the Government should afford facilities for obtaining a judicial decision. In times past a former Tory Government told the people that Trafalgar Square was the proper place for them to hold public meetings, and I believe I am correct in saying that, in days gone by, the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury has himself addressed a meeting in Trafalgar Square. To-night we find legal opinion in conflict, and Her Majesty's Government refuse to advance one step towards arriving at an authoritative decision. I fear what may result from this indiscretion; but I hope the Government, on reflection, will see their way to some action which will allay the bad feeling that has been excited. I must express my regret that no London Tory Member has spoken. Surely they are as much interested as the Liberal Members are in the peace and order of the Metropolis. The Home Secretary has said the citizens of London are a law-abiding people, and so we wish them to remain. I am sorry our Conservative colleagues do not see their way to assist us by joining in the debate.

Question put, "That the proposed words be inserted."

The House divided:—Ayes 109; Noes 188: Majority 79.—(Div. List, No. 4.)

Main Question again proposed.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I could have wished that I had not been tied to time on the important subject with which I am about to deal. I should also have liked, had it been possible, to have moved my Amendment in its original form. As however, it was not allowed to stand, I wish to express my gratitude to you, Sir, for allowing me to raise, however imperfectly, a subject of such deep importance to many of our fellow-countrymen. I feel that at half-past 11 o'clock at night, with only half-an-hour before me, it is little use to expect to be able to lay my case before the House in the way I should have liked. To many, no doubt, the question of the condition of the working classes will appear a matter hardly worthy of discussion in the House of Commons, or hardly within the province of the House of Commons to discuss; but I am bound to express my strong disagreement with any such view. No one will deny that in the midst of the great wealth of this country there exists concurrently the deepest and most intense misery. It does not need any statement from me to prove to the House the existence of great distress amongst the working classes, distress rendered all the keener by the spectacle of the riches of many of our more favoured countrymen. The measures promised in the Queen's Speech have been referred to. Well, I have read the Queen's Speech, but I fail to find in it any promise of legislation on the subject of the condition of the working classes. If we are not to have legislation from the Government on this subject, how are we to have an opportunity of discussing these matters? Private Members have no chance in obtaining a place in the ballot for it. In the past private Members have always been able to raise questions of this sort, and I do not think anyone wishes the functions of private Members to be reduced to those fulfilled by an automatic cigarette machine at a railway station. There are functions other than that of trotting into the Lobby to vote at the command of a Whip or Party Leader. Under the circumstances I think I am justified in endeavouring, even at this late hour of the evening, to bring the question of the social condition of the working classes before the attention of the House. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby has said, in a speech which has become historic, that we are all now Socialists, but as a Member of the House of Commons I do not wish that all the discussions on these questions should be left entirely to Socialist lecturers at street corners. It seems to me that the House has a duty to perform in discussing these interior affairs of the kingdom, affairs relating to poor men by whose labour we are all sustained. In this matter the House has a function to perform as important as the discussion of the recent questions of Imperial policy, and of those questions which, though perhaps more glittering and more alluring, are not so near to the people's heart as that I am now dealing with. I see from the Queen's Speech that we are to spend this year a large sum of money upon national defences. I will merely express a wish with regard to that, that after we have defended the nation in an adequate manner, and built ironclads in order to pull them to pieces again and build others in the course of a very few years, some of these huge sums of money to be expended may wander in the direction of the poor. No doubt this question of national defences is one of supreme importance to the rich. It is also of importance to those who have a stake in the country—to your landed estate holders of £50,000 or £60,000 a year, and to your great monopolists, commercial and otherwise; but to those whose case I am anxious to bring before the House, I am at a loss to see what interest can attach to any national defence whatever. I wish to ask hon. Gentlemen who disagree with me in this matter whether the lot of the chain-maker of Cradley Heath or of the sweated toiler in the east of London, or of the Scottish Crofter, or of the iron-worker in some of our iron factories, could possibly be more miserable under the rule of the Prussians, or under the rule of the French, than it is now? I do not think that they require any National defences. It is because there are so many men and women in this country who have nothing at all to defend that I think we should have a discussion on their condition. I suppose it is useless to expect that anything practical will result from this debate, but still we might have an expression of sympathy from this House, to which these unfortunate people look in their despair—because it is a condition of despair that is arising amongst them. According to Karl Marx, the working classes are in a desperate condition all over Europe. Railway communication, the telegraph, and other modern developments have so drawn together the working classes of every country, that for the purposes of argument, they may be considered as one vast miserable suffering family. Although considerable advances have been made in some respects, notably on the political side of the question, life has of late become more intolerable to the working classes than it has been heretofore. Mines are worked at greater depths, furnaces have become hotter, and altogether more work is exacted or extorted from the labouring classes—they have, so to speak, to bear more pressure to the square inch than was expected of them fifty years ago. I am not greatly concerned to prove that there has not been an advance in the social condition of the working classes during the past fifty years. What I am more immediately concerned with is their condition to-day; and the first reason that I shall adduce in support of my case is this, the constant presence of large bodies of unemployed workmen in every industrial centre throughout Europe. Not only in Liverpool, Birmingham, Leeds, Glasgow, Manchester, Dundee, but in Rome and in Paris, and even in such towns as Tunbridge Wells. I hold such a phenomenon, arising at the same time in so many different countries, may fairly be regarded as an indication that the commercial system under which we now live is seriously threatened, and shows symptoms of collapse. It has been my unfortunate lot many times to speak of the unemployed in this House, and it has been my misfortune, moreover, never to have interested the House in their cause. No doubt the fault lay with myself; I do not accuse the House. I feel like one of the Governors of Mexico who, when Charles the Fifth asked him what he most felt when he undertook the office he held, replied, "The sense of my own unworthiness." It is no light task for any young Member of this House, standing almost alone as I stand, to come before this House and ask hon. Members to consider a question so vast in its importance and so far-reaching as this of the social condition of the working classes; but I claim to be as good a patriot as any of my colleagues, and I maintain that Great Britain has always been a pioneer on all these questions. I claim that we have made greater strides towards fairly grappling with this question than any other country in the world, not even excepting the United States of America. I am not so blinded by party feeling, or so embittered by opposition, as in any way to wish that the credit of solving or of grappling with these matters should rest with any one party. I want everyone who feels the distress existing around us to add his quota to this discussion. I fear I am too sanguine, but I must express the hope that we shall have some expression of opinion from those who have grown grey in the service of the House, and know what it is to watch the economic development of the working-classes and our social system during the last 30 or 40 years. I trust hon. Members who disagree with me will approach the question with no personal bias against myself, and, approaching the question in a fair spirit of inquiry, will lend me that assistance which I should be willing to lend them if our positions were reversed. Neither the Liberal nor the Conservative Party, so far as I have been able to see, have a policy upon this question, and, so far as I have been able to perceive, the future clearly belongs to those who have a policy. Well, it must be evident to everyone that we cannot look for trade to revive in the same proportion as it has existed for the past 25 or 30 years, and it is evident that in the near future we shall be confronted with this question of the unemployed. Though we are now passing through a slightly improved period of trade, that improved period has been unable to absorb all the workmen in our industrial centres who are out of work, and, reasoning from analogy, it does not seem to me that any improvement in trade will ever be able to absorb these people. It is, therefore, evident, that we shall be perpetually confronted with this question of the unemployed. This is not a factitious question; it is not the result of a conspiracy to represent a state of facts which does not exist. Any hon. Member can satisfy himself on this point by going to the Dock Gates in the East of London, and seeing the crowd of unemployed struggling to get work. Take another instance—the answers received to the most paltry advertisements. We cannot insert an advertisement for the most menial employment for man or woman in a daily newspaper without receiving replies from hundreds of applicants, each ready to undersell the others, each ready to undertake work on almost any terms so that they might get work, and might know that for one night at least they had a place to lay their heads. I have said that I should wish this country and the House to endeavour to find a remedy for this state of things; but, before touching upon the remedies, it is incumbent upon me to endeavour to show that distress does exist in many trades. Distress, I maintain, exists, first, from the severe competition amongst not only the men, but the masters; and, secondly, from the uncertainty of employment. Take the case of house painters employed in London. Their work is uncertain, and for a large part of the year they are bound to remain idle. They are employed by fits and starts, and frequently have to work so hurriedly as to break down their constitutions. The Amalgamated Society of Engineers have the same complaint to make with regard to their members. There are seven or eight millions of adult male workers in this country, and of these there are out of work more or less throughout the United Kingdom some five hundred thousand. In London alone there are some forty-five or fifty thousand men out of work; and these men, it must be remembered, are a constant danger to those who are in employment, as they may at any time come to their employers and endeavour to undersell them, and take the bread out of their mouths. It has been estimated that each workman in the country produces five times as much wealth for the nation as he receives, and if that is the case it is obvious that the hours of labour can be shortened so as to give employment to larger numbers of men, without depriving any individual of the full amount of his present earnings. It passes the ingenuity of man to produce any scheme which will make the poor richer without at the same time making the rich poorer, but it is quite clear that if a workman produces five times as much as he receives, his employer receives more than he is justly entitled to. I think we may claim, therefore, that the source to which we may look to relieve the necessities of the working classes and of the unemployed is the profit of the capitalists. It has been said, and many hon. Members have accepted the proposition on both sides of the House, that rent is that which remains after the cultivator has been paid, and if that proposition is accepted with regard to rent, I think it might fairly be said that profit is that which remains to the employer after the workman has obtained a fair subsistence. I know that no side can claim a monopoly on these questions; but hitherto they have not been fairly debated at all from either side, and too many people have rashly assumed that, by attacking them with a wish to solve them, we may not only solve them, but land the working classes in a far worse position than they occupy to-day. Well, I would wish to go into the question of the hours of labour. There are many figures which I propose to refer to when I have time, by which I hope to be enabled to prove my case. All these questions, if not discussed in this House, transfer themselves to the forum of the streets, where I, in common with the Attorney General and other hon. Gentlemen, entertain the strongest wish they should not be decided. It may personally occur to some hon. Gentlemen that, if my proposition be allowed, you cannot make the poor richer without at the same time making the rich poorer, you attack vested interests and aim a blow at the root of that commercial prosperity which has always been so dear to this country.

It being now Twelve of the clock, the debate, by the Rules of the House, stood adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 6th March, 1889.

The House met at Two of the clock.

FACTORY INSPECTORS.

MR. KNOWLES (Salford, W.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if there was any truth in the report that the Government propose to appoint forty-two additional Factory Inspectors?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. STUART-WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam): On behalf of my right hon. Friend I have to say that the report in question is absolutely without foundation. Provision has been made in this year's Estimates for the appointment of two additional Inspectors, who will not be attached to any particular district, but will be available where their services are required.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (QUEEN'S SPEECH, MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS).

Ordered, That the Order for resuming the Adjourned Debate on the Queen's Speech, Motion for an Address, have precedence this day of the other Orders of the Day.—(Mr. W. H. Smith.)

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

*MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanarkshire, N.W.): Sir, I submit most respectfully that no more important subject can ever come before this House than the question to which I drew attention last night—namely, the social condition of the working classes. I was endeavouring, when the debate stood adjourned, to show that the uncertainty of employment and the long hours of work are the causes of the distress which now exists among all sections of the working classes of this country, and that almost every trade in England works excessive hours. I was also endeavouring to prove that it is owing to these excessive hours of labour that the degradation which exists among all parts of the community is to be attributed. No self-improvement, moral or otherwise, is to be expected from a man who goes from bed to the workshop and from the workshop to bed again, and who passes his life in an unceasing round of toil more fitted for mill-horses than men. I propose to enumerate a few instances in support of my proposition that the hours of labour are excessive. In the first place, let me take the case of railway servants. The Railway Review of March 25, 1888, states that upon the Midland Railway Company, upon the Somerset and Dorset Line, there were in July, 1886, 100 engineers and firemen, 35 of whom had worked for 14 hours a day; 69, 15 hours; 27, 16 hours; 47, 17 hours; and 9 in which they had worked for 18 hours a day. In January, 1887, the same Company had in their employment 102 engineers and firemen, 119 of whom had worked for 13 hours a day; 184, 14 hours; 104, 15 hours; 64, 16 hours; 22, 17 hours; and 2, 18 hours per day. They had also in their employment 93 signalmen, and during the months of July, 1886, and January, 1887, there were 644 cases in which a man had worked for 17 hours a day. In view of the fact that the profits of the railway companies have been going up, and that the public, in a large degree, commit their safety to men who are employed for these fabulous number of hours; is it possible to say that social distress and pressure do not exist among men who are obliged to accept employment of this nature? I think it is quite time that the House of Commons should endeavour to do something to place these men on a footing in which they may be able to earn a subsistence for themselves, and support their wives and families without working for a number of hours which seems almost incredible to us who do no manual labour at all. From a Return furnished to Parliament on the motion of Lord De La Warr in reference to the same period — January 1886, and January 1887—I find that there were 6,561 cases of passenger guards who were employed for 13 hours a day; 4,646 for 14 hours; 2,210 for 15 hours; 840 for 16 hours; 356 for 17 hours, and 348 for 18 hours. I do not know whether any hon. Member would like to commit his safety to a railway guard who had been 18 hours on duty. Then, I would ask, may not that be fairly called a case of social distress among the working classes? I may say, generally, that the hours of employment of goods guards, drivers, and firemen are in the same ratio. Signalmen, however, seem greatly to exceed any other class of railway servants in the hours in which they are employed, for I find no less than 716 instances in which they were employed for 18 hours a day. When so many Members of this House are large owners of railway shares and railway directors, and when a percentage of their number directly represent the working classes. I must say that if these figures are correct—and I presume they are, seeing that they are contained in a Government Return.—there is a strong and most indisputable proof that the social condition of the working classes requires the immediate attention of this House, constituting as it does at this moment a grave social scandal. Upon the Cheshire Railway some passenger trains are worked for 17 hours a day, some of the men employed upon it working for only 8 hours on the following day, but it is a glaring fact that many engine drivers and firemen on the line are employed for 17 hours a day, goods trains for 16 hours, and in order to reduce the hours of work the men are taken off for one night per week. This, however, does not compensate them, nor lessen the danger of 16 hours' constant employment. These figures I give upon the authority of Mr. E. Harford, the Secretary of the Railway Company's servants, who, although he may be prejudiced in favour of the men he represents, is a man of strict honour and integrity, and nobody will dispute the accuracy of his statement. In regard to some goods trains which are only run for nine hours and 50 minutes, those hours are not considered sufficient for a day's work, and the men have to work a small special trip in addition. Upon some railways in the month of December last, one week's work was as follows: 14 hours for guards; 13½ hours for goods guards; and from 14 to 16½ hours for signalmen and foremen. I find that in the well-known salt works in Cheshire belonging to Messrs. Brunner the working hours are 12, and during the greater portion of the time the men are stewing over pots of chemicals in which the salt is manufactured. And yet the public prints inform us that the profits of this Company amount to no less than 50 per cent, and that the rate of wages is about 3½d. per hour for a day of 12 hours. You may talk about slavery; your philanthropic Cardinals may move the bowels of fashionable congregations about the slavery which exists in Central Africa, but I maintain that we have as great white British slavery in Cheshire as they have in any portion of Africa or the East. Let me turn for a moment to the profits made out of women not six miles from this House, by Messrs. Bryant and May. This case, through the heroic exertions of one woman, and a poor woman too, has been prominently brought before the country, and I find that the last declared dividend of Messrs. Bryant and May was 17 per cent. I do not assert this on my own responsibility, but I take it from the published share list of the company. I find that the average working day of the women employed by this company is 11 hours, and that those who make what is called good wages may earn from 7s. to 8s. 6d. per week. I want to know how it is that there has been no interest aroused in this House upon these questions, and that when we have had deputations from Messrs. Bryant and May's work-people and others, their representations have attracted so little attention? I attribute it to the fact that hon. Members in this House hold shares in these businesses, and that naturally they do not wish to exhibit sympathy with cases of this kind, because they make their own profits out of them. As a matter of fact, it is all a case of profit-mongering; but I assert, without fear of contradiction, that those who hold shares in the two businesses I have mentioned do so with their eyes fully open, and know quite well the conditions under which the employés work. Let me turn now to the omnibus and tramway servants in Liverpool and London; 12½, 14½, and even 16½ hours are not an uncommon working day to find among this class of men, and yet we are told that the dividends of some of these companies amount to 14½ and 15 per cent. There, again, I say that the hours of labour amount to a social scandal, and I believe it is a fact that the horses employed are better cared for in this Christian country than a Christian Englishman. There are hundreds and thousands of men who are willing to work but who cannot get work at any price whatever, owing to what I can only call the greed for profit exhibited by most of these companies. It would be invidious to go at length into the evidence now being given before a Committee in the House of Lords, but without referring to ex parte statements by Radicals or Socialists, or even philanthropists, I would quote the cut and dried testimony of Mr. Burnett, one of the Government Inspectors. Mr. Burnett, speaking of the nail and chainmakers of Cradley Heath in South Staffordshire and East Worcestershire, says that for 150 years it has been wretched in the extreme. Yet although it has been known for so long a period, no single effort has been made by Parliament to ameliorate it. The industries at which they work are a sort of survival of an older industry, and is carried on in domestic workshops rather than in a factory. Mr. Burnett reports that in the first house he visited he found a poor woman of 50 so thin and worn that she looked ten years older. She was making small rivets, of which, if she worked hard, she could make one hundredweight a week, for which she got 5s. 6d., but out of that sum she had to find coals and pay shop rent. She was burdened with a paralytic daughter, for whom the parish allowed her 2s. 6d. a week. At Spring-hall, in the centre of the nail trade, Mr. Burnett says there is a collection of rude shops, called by courtesy a factory, where men and women are closely packed. A man and his wife can turn out 15 cwt. per week, for which they get 1s. per cwt. When he visited this place Mr. Burnett found one woman, although the weather was cold, in a state of intense perspiration, while from an overcrowded pigsty outside the window came odours so foul that he was glad to make his escape from the shop. The man worked from six in the morning until ten at night; but the woman, being protected by Act of Parliament, left off at seven. How this woman must bless the Parliament which has prevented her from continuing at the anvil until nine o'clock at night.

An hon. MEMBER: What is the date of that Report?

*MR. C. GRAHAM: November 9th, 1888. Mr. Burnett speaks of the sanitary accommodation as being of the rudest description; the drinking water being taken, until within a few weeks ago, from a pump situated in the middle of a yard, into the well of which all the surface-sewage was supposed to drain. Yet the rents in this favoured district are high, ranging from 3s. to 4s. a week, not for houses in the ordinary sense of the word, but for little pigsties, the largest room of which is hardly as large as the Table upon the floor of this House. In the principal room the cooking, washing, and every domestic operation has to be carried out, while the kitchen communicates directly with the workshop, into which all the fumes generated by the constant use of inferior fuel find their way. I have other instances here of girls working long hours daily for wages of 4s. and 5s. a week, and I do submit that the condition of the working people in this particular part of the country is such as demands the immediate attention of the Government. I do not seek to place any heroic remedies before the House, all I have sought to do has been to draw the attention of hon. Members to hard facts gathered from the Report of a Government Inspector, and I may add that if hon. Members desire any confirmation they have only to go and listen to the evidence being given at this moment before the Lords Committee on Sweating. I think no hon. Gentleman will deny my proposition that the best way to civilize these people, to bring them into touch with humanity, to make them feel that they are units of our society, and to make them realize that somebody cares for them would be to endeavour to shorten their hours of labour, so that they may improve their minds, raise themselves in the social scale, and obtain the necessary spirit to enable them to combine and revolt against the present state of affairs. Nails, as you know, Sir, lend themselves to be knocked on the head, and these unfortunate people having had all the spirit crushed out of them as effectually as all gaseous matter is crushed out of the piece of iron by the process through which it passes when being converted into nails, have no thought of rebellion whatever; they even fail to avail themselves of the opportunity now afforded them of laying their case before the public, and they continue to bring new generations into the world to pass through a lot as miserable as their own. Now, I think that the first reform we can introduce is to shorten their hours of labour. The question will be asked—Can this be done without reducing their wages? I say it can be done. Much has been accomplished in the past to ameliorate the condition of the working classes? Why did we pass the Factory Acts? Was it because the people for whom we were legislating were women and children, or was it because they were weak and unable to protect themselves? Have any benefits been derived from the passing of these Factory Acts? Let hon. Members remember what before they were passed happened in the mines of Scotland—in Lanarkshire for instance. Do they forget how boys of tender years were harnessed like ponies to coal trucks, and all day long were running upon their hands and knees drawing these trucks for a paltry wage? Surely it is a matter for congratulation that such a state of affairs has passed away? Is it not a good thing that long hours have been done away with in many factories and workshops? Then ought we not—having seen the benefit of this legislation—to extend those benefits to other classes of workpeople whose condition can only be described as lamentable and as a social menace? It is a social menace, for when men have no property of their own to defend they are ever ready to attack that of other people. The present condition of these people cannot continue for ever, and I wish to see wise legislation on the part of this House. I wish to see an extension of the most precious boon men can give one another—namely, sympathy. It may be said that there is no demand on the part of the working classes for intervention with regard to the hours of labour. My reply is that it is our duty to stir up and form public opinion. I believe that not ten per cent of the working classes of this country are organized or belong to Trades Unions. I am not depreciating the value of the work accomplished by these Unions; I fully value the self-sacrifice of the promoters, but up to the present they have been unable to secure the shortening of the hours of labour, without which, in my opinion, Government cannot hope to deal with causes of social distress and with the presence of unemployed working men in our cities. It is said that there is no demand for a shorter working day. My reply is to point to the Bill, having that object which I have brought in at the instance of some thousands of Scotch miners. Remember that the working classes, owing to the expense of elections, are not able to send such representatives to the House as they desire, but I believe that when they do get that opportunity there will be an overwhelming expression of opinion in favour-of shortening the working day. I admit that the question of foreign competition might prove a most serious difficulty in the way of shorter hours of labour; but it would not be an insuperable obstacle. Where are the wages highest? In Germany, where the hours are long, or in England, where, as compared with Germany, they are short? It will be found that the wages are considerably higher in England. The better paid man who works the shorter number of hours is able to turn out a better article than the ill-paid man working long hours at starvation wages for a very small subsistence. I have an extract here from the Bureau of Labour Statistics for the State of Connecticut. Professor Hadley in it says that a good workman desires and needs short hours far more than a bad workman, for he will do better work in a shorter time. In Russia the working day is 12 hours, in Germany and France 11, and in England 9, yet the English workman does more in 9 hours than the Russian in 12. I have yet to learn that there is not sufficient ingenuity in this House to secure a simultaneous reduction of the hours of labour in all the industrial centres of Europe. Let us take another point showing that shorter hours bring increased wages in their wake. During the years from 1850 to 1885, in Germany, where the hours of labour were 75 a week, the weekly increase of wages was 6s. 3d.; in France with 72 hours, the increase was 6s. 9d., and in England, with 60 hours, the increase was 8s. 9d. These figures tend to prove indisputably that a reduction in the hours of labour does not inevitably carry with it as a necessary corollary a reduction of the rate of wages. Wages in the American Union are invariably higher in those States in which shorter hours of work prevail. In the State of Maine, with an average of 62½ hours per week, the average working wage is 28s. 2d.; in New Hampshire the hours number 66½, and the wage averages 29s. 10d.; in Connecticut, with 65 hours, the wages are 31s. 1½d., and in Massachusetts, with 60 hours, the average wage is 33s. 4d. I know that this is not an alluring subject; I regret it is not looked upon as one of general interest, but I submit, Mr. Speaker, it is the duty of the House to attend to the wants of—as Thomas Moore quaintly describes them—

“The poor carpenters, nailers, smiths, and drivers, who, for our behoof and for our profit, endure the rage of weather and suffer the confinement of the workshop and the mine.”

When these questions cease to interest the House, then the House itself should cease to exist. I am opposed to all monopoly; hitherto, in this House, I have practically had a monopoly of the question of the unemployed. Now, I wish to destroy that monopoly, and I feel confident that in the future it will secure increased attention at the hands of the House. I ask hon. Members, therefore, if it would not be easier to try and deal with the problem now, when all is peace and quiet, than to be forced later on to deal with it, at a time, perhaps, when a cycle of years of bad trade will have filled our parish yards with crowds of hunger-stricken men, demanding bread and work? Let me tell hon. Members that should such a day unfortunately come, and should one of them try to disperse the crowds of hungry men by force, it would be better that a millstone be hung round his neck, and that he be cast into the sea. As long as I have the honour of a seat in this House I shall continue to press this question, and if I succeed in awakening the public conscience on this matter I shall feel that I have my reward. I do want to see an end put to this pestilent lack of sympathy. Perhaps I personally attach too much importance to this matter; but let hon. Members remember that I came into this House, not from the merchant's office or the lawyer's court, but straight from the prairies of America, where want is unknown, so that the sight of such misery as exists in London was brought home to my mind with exceptional force. I ask the House, if it will do nothing else, to at least extend its sympathy to these people. They can give it cheaply, and it may serve to show those for whose benefit we are supposed to deliberate that their affairs sometimes occupy our attention.

MR. C. A. V. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I can only say, in supporting the Amendment of my hon. Friend, that whatever may be the result of the Division which will probably conclude this debate, the few hours which have been spent in discussing this important subject will not have been thrown away; because, even if the Government do not see their way to expressing much sympathy with us, and fail even to suggest a remedy for the distress to which we are giving expression, yet by the ventilation of the subject in the face of public opinion we may hope to have done some little good for the cause which we have at heart, for we may thereby hope to have aroused the public conscience. I may remark that this subject has for the last few years been constantly debated at Congresses and at meetings of scientific societies; but this is, I believe, the first time we have had a set debate upon it in this House. Now on this question the eminent statistician, Mr. Robert Giffen, speaks in the strongest terms, and his language should be taken seriously to heart. He says that no one can contemplate the present condition of the masses without desiring something like a revolution for the better. We are anxious to see a revolution for the better, and we are anxious to see it take the form of a peaceable and Constitutional revolution. We only ask those who scoff at us for insisting on the importance of this question to turn to the pages of history, and consider how the negligence of Rulers in past times has prevented such peaceable revolutions for the better, and has caused revolutions of a graver kind to be substituted for them. We fortunately, in this country, have never seen revolutions of the worst type, nor do we wish to; but human nature is human nature all the world over. We shall soon be celebrating the centenary of the French Revolution of 1789; is it not, then, a season when our minds may be usefully turned to the consideration of the causes of the distress of the people? Now, Mr. Speaker, the proposition which I desire to emphasize and to give some facts in proof of is, not that the people of this country are worse off than they have been in the past; for we may congratulate ourselves that partly owing to the Repeal of the Corn Laws and the enormous expansion of our national commerce since the year 1846, and especially in consequence of the passing of the Factory Acts and other measures, the condition of the people, so far as their wage-earning capacity is concerned, is probably better than in past times. But the fact which I wish to emphasize is, that while the wealth and luxuries of the higher classes in the country have increased, the wealth and comfort and the general physical and moral condition of those classes who are beneath them in the social scale, and upon whose labour the wealth of the upper classes depends, have not increased in anything like a proper ratio. We want to see established throughout the country the principle of a fair day's wage for a fair day's work. We want those by whose labour all classes of the community are enormously benefited to be themselves benefited in a fair ratio; and I contend that at the present time the workers of the country do not enjoy a fair share of the wealth which they are mainly instrumental in creating. In my own constituency the miners of Cornwall labour eight hours a day for what I call the paltry wage of less than £1 a week. The average pay in the Cornish tin mines is but 18s. a week, and you can positively find many instances in South Africa where even uneducated black men can earn with the greatest ease 10s., 15s., and even 20s. per week. There must be something wrong in our social condition in this country to keep our people slaving at these rates, when naked natives in South Africa can earn so much more relatively. We often hear references to the increase of imports and exports, but these figures should not be taken as a conclusive test of the improvement in the condition of the people. The increase is due mainly to the development of labour-saving machinery, by means of which the profits of the employer and the capitalist are enormously increased; and while large numbers of people are thrown out of employment by the change the wages of the workmen are lessened. As Professor Thorold Rogers says—

Until we succeed in discovering some way by which the profits of labour can be more equally divided between labourers and capitalists, we shall continue to press the urgency of this question. Again, the discovery of new fuel-saving appliances has brought about a great decrease in the cost of production, and a consequent increase in the profits. We contend that in almost all cases the enormous increase in the profits arising from this condition of things goes into the pockets of the capitalist, a very small proportion only going to improve the condition of the labourer. We must also recollect that there has been an enormous increase in the exports of various kinds of machinery, which tends to enable foreign countries to make goods which we hitherto manufactured. I do not complain of foreign competition, but I complain that these facts should be adduced as reasons why we should not lay such stress upon the necessity of improving the social condition of the people generally. I lay stress upon them for the purpose of showing that there is not a fair and equitable distribution of profits between employers and labourers, the latter of whom are the mainsprings of the wealth produced. I admit that the condition of the people in some respects at the present time may be said, when compared with that in olden times, to be considerably better; but if you will consider the facts you will see how far we are behind the ideal state of things we ought to set before ourselves as the only goal which, in a great and so-called civilized country, we ought to endeavour to reach. First of all, let me show the miserable character of the wages of our people. Mr. Mulhall, in his "Dictionary of Statistics," gives the yearly income of the different classes of the people in the country. In the year 1883 he estimates that there were belonging to the gentry class 222,000 families, with an income of £388,000,000, or an average of £1,500 per family; of the middle class there were 604,000 families, with an income of £241,000,000, or an average of nearly £400 per family; of the tradesmen class there were 1,220,000 families, with earnings amounting to £244,000,000, or an average of about £200 per family; and of the working class there were 4,629,000 families, with earnings amounting to £447,000,000, or an average of £96 per family. Now £96 is not a very large sum, even if it represented what every workman might hope to get in the year. It is, however, far from representing anything like what the vast number of our people get. What were the facts arrived at by a careful examination by the Mansion House Committee, which was appointed in March, 1885, to inquire into the causes of permanent distress in London? The Committee, referring to the North-side Docks—not to the wharves on either side—say in their Report—

"The number of casual labourers applying for work at these docks alone usually averages 2,500 to 3,000 daily. The total number of daily applicants for casual labour at all the docks may be roughly put at 20,000. According to the proportion of the above figures, there would be, therefore, from 7,000 to 8,000 men who, having no regular employment other than dock labour, daily apply, and apply in vain, for such work. A slight reduction (say 10 per cent) would have to be made on these figures, to allow for the possibility of some of the men applying at more than one dock on the same day. Regarding the smallness of wages, it is in evidence that the wages of the casual dock labourer do not exceed twelve shillings per week on the average of the year, and that the earnings of the unemployed, picked up by doing odd jobs, average four shillings and tenpence per week per man, this sum being eked out by wife and children's earnings, charitable relief, &c. Female labour is wretchedly paid. In shirt making (for export) and similar employment, a woman gets about ninepence to a shilling for a day's work of sixteen hours. There are hundreds of women who work for three farthings an hour, and find their own needles and cotton. The prices include—shirts, three-farthings each; flannel drawers for Chelsea Pensioners, one shilling and threepence a dozen; soldiers' leggings, two shillings a dozen; and lawn tennis aprons, elaborately frilled, fivepence halfpenny a dozen to the "sweater," the actual worker getting much less. In such kind of women's work, however, the whole profit does not, as is supposed, go to the "sweater," but finds its way in great measure into the pockets of the middlemen and retail dealers. The public, too, have often, in some degree, the benefit of these starvation wages."

Now, it will be said that these are unskilled labourers, and that we must take skilled labourers if we wish to make out our case. As a member of the School Board, I have to inquire into the cases in which fees are remitted. I have here a list of cases in which the fees have been remitted because the parents are out of work or have a very small amount of work to do. Now, these parents are not all unskilled labourers. There are bricklayers, printers, polishers, carriage-painters, silver-platers, harness-makers, and others. In making out our case, therefore, we have not to rely solely upon the position of unskilled labourers. But I suppose it is in the Black Country that we find the hardest work and the lowest wages. I have here a collection of chains, which show exactly what is to be made by the poor chainmaker. Here is an ordinary dog-chain [chain produced]. The man who made this chain was paid for his work 1d. I ask hon. Members, who, perhaps, are not familiar with the facts, and who, perhaps, have not had an opportunity of visiting the chainmaking district, how they would like to make this chain for the money? Some of these chains I have seen made by women. I ask hon. Gentlemen whether they think the wage I have mentioned is one upon which men can live in decency, not to say comfort? Here is a chain familiar to many hon. Gentlemen, being connected as it is with harness; it is called a back chain, and for making it a man receives 1½d. If engaged for a week of 60 hours in making these chains, a man can earn the munificent sum of 9s. This is a very weighty chain, and appears to be a complex piece of workmanship. I assert that the man who can make such a chain is no unskilled labourer. Another chain I have here is one for the making of which the workmen get 1d. It is called a halter chain. If a man works 60 hours upon the manufacture of these chains he can earn 6s. Here, again, you see, this is no mere ordinary chain, but one in which the links are twisted, and therefore not one easy to make. I am sure all reasonable men will agree that something ought to be done to improve the terrible condition of the chainmakers. The next feature of the work of the industrial masses which I desire to bring before the House is the precarious nature of their employment, and I think the facts I will now mention throw some light upon the statistics which are constantly placed before us when Government reporters and others go round and find that men are earning so much per week, and put it down as if it is the wage they receive every week in the year. I quote the following from a very competent authority, Mr. H. S. Foxwell, Professor of Economics at Cambridge, who, writing upon irregularity of employment and fluctuation of prices, says—

“The Rector of Gateshead, in a sermon recently preached before the University of Cambridge, speaks of steady, industrious men, nominally earning 20s. to 22s. per week, actually receiving, on the average, only 8s. or 9s. The London dock labourers, when in work, often earn £2 a week; but they are sometimes six weeks, or more, without work. They are described as living filthily, and as stating that they ‘would gladly exchange for £1 a week regular.’ Again, in an analysis of 273 cases made by my brother, Dr. Arthur Foxwell, in Manchester, he found that where the nominal wages varied from 14s. to 35s. a week in different occupations, the highest average earnings were those of the regularly employed Corporation labourers, whose nominal wages were 20s. Twelve joiners, nominally receiving 26s. 9d. a week, only averaged 13s. actual earnings; and four masons, nominally receiving 35s., only averaged 10s.”

And here is what the Rector of Gateshead said, preaching at Cambridge in May, 1885—

“The wages of artisans, as paraded in Statistical Reports and the columns of the Press, sound fairly adequate. We hear with complacency of 18s. or 20s. per week as the remuneration of unskilled labour in towns; but few, except those in constant contact with the poor, know how very precarious such wages often are—how for weeks and weeks a man, steady, industrious, willing to work, will often not average more than 8s. or 9s., and sometimes for long periods even nothing at all. Life is a sad and hopeless business when a man sits staring into an empty grate, weak and faint, after a weary, dispiriting search for work. No food for himself—and, worse, none for his hungry children; no means of buying any, for the home comforts gathered round him in time of regular employment have been pawned one by one. Is it any wonder that, flying from his wretched home, he should hover round the one bright, cheerful spot in the neighbourhood, the public-house at the corner, and gladly accept the invitation of the first companion who offers to treat him, and so allow himself to be dragged down deeper still?"

I would also commend to hon. Members a few of the concluding remarks of Mr. Foxwell—such as:

"The precarious nature of employment is a social evil of the first magnitude, which we can and must in some degree remove."

The statements I have made now presented to the House on the above authority are fully corroborated by the following, which will be found in the Report of the Industrial Conference which sat in 1885 under the presidency of Sir C. Dilke. Mr. Lloyd Jones then said—

"We have no stated allowance for lost time. This is so important a matter in connection with wages, that the sum deducted ought to be distinctly stated. Mr. Hey, one of the Secretaries of the Moulders' Union, has prepared an elaborate account from the books of his Society, and finds the time lost by their members to be 20 per cent, or one-fifth of the whole. This calculation, if carried out over the non-union workers, would be much increased, and this has to be added to depressions of trade, like that existing at present; and though generous efforts have usually been made to relieve the sufferings of those out of work, it is not going too far to say that not only savings, but wages yet unearned, have to be largely used to get rid of the indebtedness incurred at such times. Professor Leone Levi, in a recent article in the Times, brings the wages of the workers up to 523 millions sterling; but the calculation of Mr. Hey rubs out over 100 millions of this amount."

And the following statement by Mr. John Wilson (late a Member of this House) is remarkable, as well, for the evidence it gives of the spoliation of the miners by the royalty and rent-exacting landowners—

"It was said that in 1883, in the Cleveland District, £400,000 were paid in royalty rents to landlords. Workmen and capitalists were contending with each other—one for greater profits, the other for higher wages—but they might join to bring about a reduction or the abolition of royalty rents. If the £400,000 drawn last year were divided between capitalists and workmen, it would have gone far to prevent the distress now prevailing in Durham. He was Treasurer of the Durham Miners' Union, which week after week had been giving 8s. or 9s. to 600 or 700 men out of employment, who were thus, by the benevolence of men—fellow-workmen—kept off the rates. If this £400,000 had been divided between employers and workmen, in place of destitution there might be prosperity. What right had the landlord to the mineral?"

I am not now upon the question as to what we shall do to remove this condition of things, but it is the duty of us, as legislators, to take these facts into consideration. I, for one, will not believe that it is beyond the power of Parliament to devise some means to correct these great evils. In the next place, I would ask the House to consider what is the effect of the present state of things upon the poorer classes, physically and socially? And in this connection it is important to notice that, out of their pitifully small and precarious earnings, the poor have to pay an altogether disproportionate amount in rent of homes, which, both from a sanitary and also a moral point of view, are too often wholly unfit for human beings to dwell in; and, further, that for all the necessaries of life they have to pay higher prices for inferior goods than people more fortunately circumstanced. Thus, as to their dwellings, in the Report of the Royal Commission on the Housing of the Working Classes we find it stated that—

"A large class whose earnings are the lowest are the costermongers and hawkers, whose average appears to be not more than 10s. or 12s. a week. This represents continuous toil, and although the income is a most precarious one, yet it is not rendered so by days and seasons of idleness, as is the case in occupations about to be mentioned, but depends on the state of the market. Dock labourers follow such an uncertain employment that their average wage is said to be not more than 8s. or 9s. a week, and at the highest from 12s. to 18s. a week. Five-pence an hour is about the rate, but the supply of this unskilled labour is so much in excess of the demand, that they are not employed, upon the average, more than two days a week. The average of labourers' wages in Clerkenwell is about 16s. a week, and this means that there are many who earn less. Mr. Marchant Williams says—'From investigation of parts of Clerkenwell, St. Luke's, St. Giles's, Marylebone, and other quarters, I find that 88 per cent of the poor pay more than one-fifth of their income in rent: 46 per cent. from one-fourth to one-half; 42 per cent from one-fourth to one-fifth; and only 12 per cent less than one-fifth of their wages in rent. These figures are gathered from nearly 1,000 dwellings. Among them 3s. 10½d. is the average rent of one room let as a separate tenement, 6s. of two-roomed tenements, and 7s. 6½d. of three-roomed tenements. Rents in the congested districts of London are getting higher, and wages are not rising, and there is a prospect, therefore, of the disproportion between rent and wages growing still greater. Evidence shows that the witness just quoted has erred, if at all, on the side of moderation. In South St. Pancras, 4s. a week was paid for one room 10 feet by 7, at 10 Prospect Terrace; the same at 3, Derry Street; at 22, Wood Street, 5s. was paid for a single room, and if cheaper quarters were needed, an underground kitchen must be sought at a rent of 2s. 6d. a week. At 8, Stephen Street, Tottenham Court Road, 5s. a week was paid for a single room in great decay. In Chapel Row, and Wilmington Place, Clerkenwell, 3s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 5s. were rents for single rooms. In Spitalfields, the average rental for one room was from 4s. 6d. to 6s. a week. Most of these quotations are for unfurnished rooms. In Notting Hill, 4s. or 5s. a week per room was the rent of furnished rooms, and in the Mint 4s. 6d. for the same accommodation; the character of the furniture as a rule, in its wretchedness is beyond description. Instances might be multiplied from the Metropolitan evidence. Many of the tenements just cited are dwellings referred to as instances of extreme over-crowding."

These are not singular figures, nor figures relating solely to the Metropolis. I have here a report of a lecture upon "Life in One Room," by Dr. Russell, the Medical Officer of Health for the City of Glasgow. Some of Dr. Russell's remarks are deserving of the serious attention of hon. Members, because the conclusion they point to is that the congestion of our working population in great cities is tending greatly to the moral as well as physical deterioration of our race. In Glasgow much has been done to improve the dwellings of the poor and the general condition of the people; but Dr. Russell says—

"Of the inhabitants of Glasgow 25 (24·7) per cent live in houses of one apartment; 45 (44·7) per cent in houses of two apartments; 16 per cent (6·1) in houses of four apartments; and only 8 per cent in houses of 5 apartments and upwards."

And then he goes on to say—

"I am anxious to emphasize this difference by the accumulation of facts which can be expressed in cold figures. Figures are beyond the reach of sentiment, and if they are sensational it is only because of their terribly undisguised truthfulness. You must not think of the inmates of those small houses as families in the ordinary sense of the term. No less than 14 per cent of the one-roomed houses and 27 per cent of the two-roomed contain lodgers—strange men and women mixed up with husbands and wives and children within the four walls of small rooms. Nor must I permit you, in noting down the tame average of fully three inmates in each of these one-apartment houses, to remain ignorant of the fact that there are thousands of these houses which contain five, six, and seven inmates, and hundreds which are inhabited by from 8 up even to 13 per centage, though an accurate, are but a feeble mode of expression for such facts regarding men and women like ourselves. I have told you that in 1881 the population of Glasgow was 511,520 persons, and that of those 25 per cent lived in one room, and 45 per cent in two-roomed houses; but what does that mean? It means that 126,000 persons live in those one-roomed and 228,000 in those two-roomed houses."

Then Dr. Russell goes on to say—

"There you will find, year after year, a death rate of 38 per 1,000, while in the districts with larger houses it is only 16 or 17."

These are figures and facts which it is impossible for us to contradict, and which it is dangerous and almost criminal of us to neglect. Now, the questions of the earnings and the inadequacy of the homes of the poor are not by any means the only questions we have to take into consideration in dealing with the social condition of the people. The cost of living is another element in the problem which it would be idle for us to underrate. Mr. George R. Sims, one of the noblest of the many philanthropic men who have devoted their lives to doing something to improve the condition of the people, points out that the poor are obliged to purchase in small quantities, and therefore get the lowest value for the highest price. For coal, for instance, the poor pay 1d. for 7lbs., or 1½d. for 14lbs.—that is, at the rate of £1 7s. 6d for a ton, which is only worth 16s. or 17s.; and butterine is sold to the poor at 1s. 6d. per lb., while it is not worth more than 9d. or 10d. Tea is bought by the humbler classes at 1½d. or 2d. per oz., which means 2s. 8d. for a pound, which is only worth 1s. 4d. Now, I do not propose to trouble the House with figures relating to the pauperism in our midst; but I desire to point out how every pound of the income of this country is spent—what proportion goes to the Army and to the Navy, and what proportion is spent in the actual government of the country. Of every £ of income we find that the Customs and Excise Duties contribute 12s. 7½d. and that proportion of the taxation of the country is the one which falls most heavily upon the lower classes. Of every £ of Expenditure of the country we find that 16s. 1½d. goes for war, leaving only 3s. 10½d. in the £ for all other purposes. If we take the year 1881, we find that 35·08 per cent went in Interest on Debt resulting from past wars, 31·95 per cent in expenditure for war, and 32·97 per cent towards other purposes connected with the Government of the country. Or put it in another form. We can show that during the present century the total income of the country was 5,613 millions, of which 3,550 millions, or more than three-fifths, came from Customs and Excise Duties, including Post Office, Crown Lands, &c., and that four-fifths of the whole Expenditure, or 4,660 millions, went in expenses of war, war debts, and preparations for war. When we find facts such as these, and seeing that so great a proportion of the burden falls on the working classes, we have a right to contend that they should reap far greater benefit from the expenditure than they possibly can do now, and that it would be infinitely better to diminish and not to increase, as you are now proposing to do, the enormous sums expended on war and warlike preparations. If you must vote larger sums, let it be for the amelioration of the condition of our people. There is, in particular, one class of expenditure too little thought of in this country, and to which, if it were less grudgingly granted, we might look as providing one of the best remedies for many of the evils of which we complain. I refer to education. In England we spend only £6,685,000 on education, as compared with £28,900,000 on the Army and Navy, while in the United States they spend £16,600,000 on education, and only £9,400,000 on warlike preparations. Our contention is, that we should reverse our proportion of expenditure; that we should spend a great deal more on what tends really to the benefit of the people, the prosperity of the country, and cut down — very much more than I am afraid many of us are at present inclined to do — the terrible amount continually lavished, thrown away, and wasted in all manner of warlike expenditure. Before I resume my seat I should like to touch on another subject and in only a few words. I do not wish at all to elaborate the question of remedies to be devised. That is the duty of the Government. I am not here to maintain that there is any one special cause of the evil, and much less that there is any special panacea to be advocated for the present state of things. I know it is an exceedingly complicated social problem, and all I now ask is that the Government of the country should devote some attention to, should show some sympathy — if only by a casual reference in the Queen's Speech — with the sufferings of our people. Still, in one direction we may look for a remedy for one principal cause of the difficulties that surround us, the congestion of population in our great towns. Here we may for a remedy look to migration — not to emigration — of the unemployed labourers for the purpose of taking up and occupying land at present unoccupied or not tilled in different parts of the country. I know it will be said that it is useless to settle on our farm lands the unemployed, who are, for the most part, ignorant and unskilled labourers. But the persons who advance that objection are the very advocates of the deportation of these same ignorant and unskilled labourers to our Colonies, which, however, refused to be burdened with them. In the United Kingdom, including the Channel Islands, there are 80 millions of acres of land, and in 1880 there were only 48,335,000 and odd acres under cultivation, notwithstanding that at the same time the population was 34,862,000, or less than half the total number of acres. Now, in a rich country like this, where, without exaggeration, the population is in the proportion of one to every two acres, surely it is idle for anyone to get up and say the country is over-crowded, and that we must drive out and expatriate men from our midst and send them to other countries to assist with their skilled labour in developing the industries of those countries in competition with ourselves. We find, at the same time, that one-half of our food supplies comes from abroad. I do not dwell on the danger this presents if we should be engaged in a war with any great Continental nation—it is sufficiently obvious. But, if 40 millions of acres can produce food for half our people, we may fairly reason that if the whole of the 80 million acres, or the greater part, were under cultivation, you would not only be able to keep all your people in the country, without continually drafting numbers of them out of the country, but you would be able to be very much more independent, and produce, at any rate, a much larger supply of food to maintain them. But some people say, "This is impossible; the land remaining untilled is barren land, and will not repay cultivation." That is simply not true, and will never be true so long as there are millions of acres withdrawn from cultivation, merely to satisfy the sporting and predatory instincts of our land monopolist aristocracy. But taking only those lands which are, or are supposed to be, at present under cultivation, I may point out that at the present moment the produce of the land is not nearly what it might be. I can show that if a system of small holdings were introduced, which would mean placing on the land that is cultivable some hundreds of thousands of starving people who now go to make up the congestion of population in our large cities, you at once supply homes for the people and necessarily increase the output from the soil. For instance, if, as is estimated, the annual value of the agricultural produce of the three kingdoms is from £250,000,000 to £300,000,000, as it was when this pamphlet, from which I now quote, was published a year or two ago, and the number of acres under cultivation 47,000,000, then we find the annual yield to the acre is scarcely £6 10s. That being so, let us see what evidence there is that this can be increased. I take a few words from a speech delivered in 1885 by Lord Carrington, well known as a sound agricultural authority. He said—

"Around High Wycombe he had 800 allotment tenants, who occupied a tenth of an acre each, and who paid him the agricultural value of the land, plus the rates. The net produce of each allotment was £4—that is, £40 an acre. The most a farmer could make out of the same land under plough cultivation would be £7 an acre. So in these 80 acres under allotments £2,400 worth of extra food is produced, and altogether £3,200 worth of wholesome garden stuff is grown, the result of the spare time and labour of artisans which would otherwise probably have been wasted."

Commenting upon this the writer of this pamphlet says—

"Then surely it may be asked, if land can be made to produce food stuffs to the value of $40 an acre, under spade labour, and during the leisure hours of the mechanic, why cannot the farmer at least produce half of that amount—that is, $20 an acre—in lieu of the niggardly $7 per acre under plough cultivation?"

Why indeed? And with these facts before us it is almost a crime not, at any rate, to try the experiment of relieving the congestion and misery of our cities by migration, by establishing village communities in those rural districts which are now almost bare of a rustic population. If such an experiment were only partially successful, it would, we are satisfied, do much to relieve the miseries and social evils we have laid so much stress upon; and, at the same time, it would tend to the social elevation of the people, and remove a great danger which exists in the possibility of our food supplies being cut off, if we were at war with a Continental nation. It would be a more sensible way of meeting danger than by increasing our armaments. It is an utterly futile and absurd idea to suppose we can always keep pace with foreign armaments by lavishing more and more on warlike preparations and home defences. I say, too, on behalf of the peace champion, that we do not do charity; we do not do it to the poor to tress and misery; we ask for more justice and less charity. We ask that the absurd laws which now restrict the industries of the country and prevent the transfer of land should be done away with. These things can be done by legislative means. We ask you to lighten the burden of labour, and one and the most important means of doing this is to break down that monopoly in land which is at present the curse of the country. I do not wish to say a harsh or an offensive word, but I would remind hon. Members that we who have arrived at a position of social comfort and independence, some by our exertions, while others have never known a day's toil, may be regarded by men and women who toil for long hours day after day, month after month, for a paltry pittance insufficient for the necessities, much less the comforts of life, not unnaturally with bitter feelings as an idle class whom their labour supports; and I would urge the House on the score of humanity, if on no other grounds, to devote some serious attention to these matters, and to make one united effort to deal in a practical and not merely a speculative spirit with this great social problem, and endeavour to solve it in a way that shall conduce to the future greatness and prosperity of our common country.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): There was one remark from the hon. Member for North West Lanark (Mr. Cuninghame Graham) in his speech last night with which I entirely agree, as, I am sure, will every man in the House, that the question he has brought forward is one of great and pressing importance. But whether or not the opportunity the hon. Member has taken of bringing this subject before the House is a convenient opportunity, at the end of a long debate upon the Address to the Crown, for raising a question of such vast importance—interesting, as it is, to so many Members—is another matter. But, however, I do not desire to make any complaint at his having brought forward a subject in which, I know, he has long taken a very deep interest. I make no complaint even of the length to which the hon. Gentleman carried his observations, although his speech, taking the part delivered last night and the conclusion to-day, was not a short one. I make no complaint of that; but I think I am justified in drawing the attention of the House to the course which has been pursued, to the large demand upon the time of the House which the last speaker has made, both on this particular occasion, and also on a previous occasion upon the Amendment last night, when he favoured the House with a speech extending over an hour and a quarter. To-day he has again favoured the House with a speech overloaded with a mass of detail, and extending to an hour and ten minutes, while the hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well, and the House knows perfectly well, from the statement of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, and concurred in, I think, by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone), that the exigencies of Supply and other public business demanded that the Address should have been disposed of last night or to-day. Yet, knowing there were a large number of Members who rightly take an interest in such an important question, and knowing there are important subjects on the paper, upon which some Members of the House are anxious to say a few words, the hon. Gentleman thinks it right and consistent with his duty and the interest of the subject under discussion to take up more than an hour of a short day, and when the time remaining for other business can be counted by minutes rather than hours.

*MR. CONYBEARE: May I be allowed to explain—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

*MR. RITCHIE: I think the hon. Member has already occupied sufficient of the time of the House.

*MR. CONYBEARE: Not more than was wanted.

*MR. RITCHIE: I am not disposed to give way to the hon. Member.

*MR. CONYBEARE: Then do not make charges.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

*MR. CONYBEARE: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Gentleman is charging me with obstruction. It is monstrous.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

*MR. RITCHIE: Although I agree with the hon. Member for North West Lanark that the matter is one of great public importance, yet I was unable to agree with him when he specifically stated there was a want of sympathy on the part of the well-to-do classes with the class whose claims he was bringing before the House, and that in reference to questions of this kind there was a desperate lack of sympathy. Well, I do not wish to use strong language in reference to those remarks; but I entirely deny the suggestion, and absolutely repudiate the statement that there is any lack of sympathy on the part of Members of this House, or the well-to-do classes generally, with the sufferings of the poor, or the condition of the working classes. I do not believe that at any time or in any country in the world was there ever so large an expression of sympathy with the working classes and the poor than exists in this country at the present time. I do not believe that, going back for many years, it is possible to point to any country where more has been done, both by means of money and by means of personal help, than has been done, by the well-to-do classes in this country, to raise and improve the position and do the best they can for those not in so fortunate position in the world.

MR. GRAHAM: I said nothing of charity.

*MR. RITCHIE: The hon. Gentleman said the rich did not consider the condition of the poor with consideration, and then went on to say that more of the working classes were unemployed, that their lives were made more unendurable at the present time, and that more work was extracted from them than had ever been the case before.

MR. GRAHAM: Undoubtedly.

*MR. RITCHIE: Both propositions I emphatically deny.

MR. GRAHAM: Well, prove it.

*MR. RITCHIE: I say life has been made much more tolerable to the working classes of to-day than ever it has been before. I would point to such institutions as that which happily now exists in the East End of London—the People's Palace—which has been erected, to a large extent, by contributions from all classes, principally from the wealthy classes, when, day by day and night by night, men and women toil in every conceivable way in order to afford amusement, relaxation, and instruction to the working classes of the East End. That movement is spreading east, west, north, and south, and in a short time similar institutions will be established in every part of London erected for the sole purpose of raising the condition of the poor, and adding to their amusement, happiness, and comfort. I say it ill becomes anyone under such circumstances to endeavour to draw class distinctions between rich and poor, to endeavour to say to the people—because these statements go outside and reach those who, perhaps, are not so well informed as they might be—that there is an indisposition on the part of the class who are well-to-do to do anything to raise the condition of the poorer classes in the Metropolis or elsewhere. So much for the life of the poor being made intolerable. But it is not only in such ways that life is made more tolerable. Legislation administered by local authorities have been attended with most beneficial results, providing all kinds of comforts and conveniences for the people—parks, free libraries, museums, hospitals, baths, and wash-houses to improve the condition of the poorer classes. I was looking at a Return only to-day, which showed that in the year 1885-6 local authorities in England and Wales had, without counting borrowed money, out of the income of the year expended no less than £702,000 on those matters to which I have referred. Year by year the disposition is growing to do everything that can be done to ameliorate the condition of the poorer classes. The hon. Gentleman in the course of his speech said "working classes" and "unemployed" were convertible terms—

*MR. GRAHAM: Very nearly so.

*MR. RITCHIE: The hon. Gentleman says very nearly so. Well, I am quite sure they would very largely become so if the remedies he proposes or supports were adopted. I am quite sure that the results of such proposals as he has shadowed forth without absolutely advancing them, if such were put into operation, the result would not be more work or higher wages, but less work and lower wages for the working classes. While we all sympathize with the condition of many of the poorer population, while all desire to see more employed and at better wages, when we come to consider how this desire is to be accomplished, then we are met with suggestions of all kinds, many of which will not stand the test of examination, many of which, instead of bettering, would make worse the condition of the people. In his remarks last night the hon. Gentleman said there must be some kind of State regulation of labour.

*MR. GRAHAM: Undoubtedly.

*MR. RITCHIE: That is the doctrine of pure Socialism?

*MR. GRAHAM: Undoubtedly.

*MR. RITCHIE: Then we understand that the doctrine the hon. Member preaches is Socialism? He asks the House to adopt, as a means of raising the condition of the working classes, the tenets of pure unmitigated Socialism?

*MR. GRAHAM: Undoubtedly.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not?

*MR. RITCHIE: Because undoubtedly and rapidly the effect of this State aid would be to deprive individuals of that stimulus which now influences them to improve their condition. It would bring the good workman down to the level of the bad workman. The hon. Member shakes his head, but that is what Socialism would do.

*MR. GRAHAM: No.

*MR. RITCHIE: It would bring the thrifty, industrious, temperate workman down to the level of the thriftless, idle, drunken workman—that is what Socialism would do by removing individual effort. I presume the hon. Gentleman also adopts the other planks of the Socialistic platform? He would like to see all property equally distributed. Well, let me tell him, if he desires to do that, he will not have only to reckon with the richer classes, but the working classes too—the working classes who, in their millions, possess property in land, houses, savings banks, building societies, and friendly societies. These are the best of our working classes, and I venture to say they would be the first to repudiate the Socialistic doctrine the hon. Member desires to propound. I venture to think that the hon. Gentleman, in preaching that doctrine, will have an extremely small following in this country, however it may be elsewhere. He speaks of the difficulty of the working classes returning Representatives here. I am happy to recognize many Gentlemen in this House, some of them among the most respected Members of the House, who are essentially the Representatives of the working class.

*MR. GRAHAM: I said so.

An hon. MEMBER: Nine.

*MR. RITCHIE: There is not one of those hon. Gentlemen who would get up here and advocate the doctrines of Socialism on behalf of his constituents. I say, instead of such doctrines being of any benefit to the working classes, they would reduce the whole class to one dead level of uniformity, and do more harm than good. The hon. Member says the hours of labour should be shortened. He or his hon. Friend talked of the Factory Acts, and asked had they been of benefit? Unquestionably they have been of benefit, but we have never yet attempted in this country to deal in such a way with adult labour.

*MR. CONYBEARE: No reason why you never should.

*MR. RITCHIE: True; but the answer is that the great bulk of the working classes would object to such treatment.

*MR. CONYBEARE: How about the Trades Union Conference?

*Mr. RITCHIE: Because they know perfectly well they are able to take care of themselves. They have their own organizations, their own trades unions, and prefer to manage their own affairs and regulate their own hours of labour, and would decline to accept any regulation of their hours of labour by any Act or any Government. In saying this I am sure I shall be supported by the great bulk of the working class. The hon. Member quoted a few instances here and there of long hours of labour, and I am not prepared to say that men are not overworked; but I say that is no reason whatever why you should bring in a Bill applicable not only to those cases mentioned, but to all industries throughout the country, and which would in its operation be ruinous to half of them. One of the great evils of our own trade is foreign competition, said the hon. Member, and there I agree with him. But what does he propose to do? He proposes to still further tie our hands in competition with foreign countries. He said hours are longer in Germany, and that wages are higher here than in Germany. Well, I do not know what he desires to infer from that. The lesson I draw is this:—that if it be the fact that in Germany and France the people work longer hours for less wages, and if we find considerable difficulty in competing with them in trade, then, if you still further reduce our hours of labour and keep up the wages, our difficulties will be largely increased. Another probable result would be to drive capital out of the country altogether. The hon. Member, as others often do, speaks of England as if we were the only country in the world. Does the hon. Gentleman doubt for a moment that if restrictions such as these he speaks of were placed upon our manufacturers in this country—does he doubt that those manufacturers would take their capital to another country where such restrictions are not in force?

*Mr. GRAHAM: They would not take the workmen.

*Mr. RITCHIE: No; but they would take machinery and capital. The hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that this has already been done in several cases. To proceed in the course he proposes would still further tie the hands of capitalists, and there would be an increased emigration of capital from this country. Then what would be the condition of our working classes? Now, I do not doubt that in some cases there is much to be done. The hon. Member cited one case which has been more than once brought before the House—that of the Cradley nail and chainmakers—and the hon. Member for Camborne has put before us visible evidence of the work done by those employed in the Cradley Heath district. He has drawn a very painful picture from reliable sources, of the condition of things unhappily existing there. But he knows perfectly well that, so far as this particular question is concerned, it is at the present moment under investigation by the Lords' Committee appointed to examine the "sweating" system. He knows that the Government are anxious to give that Committee every assistance in their power not only with the view of getting at the actual facts, but also to give it every assistance with the view of providing remedies. If the hon. Member does not know, I can tell him that the Home Secretary has put at the disposal of that Committee an Inspector of the Home Office, who has been down to the district and investigated all the circumstances of the trade there, who has reported upon them, and is prepared to give every assistance in his power.

*Mr. GRAHAM: Allow me a word to justify myself. I do not charge neglect against the Government in reference to Cradley Heath. I know the Home Office sent an Inspector to report. I only alleged the case as evidence of the distress existing among the working-classes.

*Mr. RITCHIE: I never said the hon. Member made any charge, but he described Cradley Heath as one of the plague spots of the country, and what I wish to say is, we have done all we can to investigate the matter. We must now wait for the Report of the Committee before we can see to what extent evils exist, and what would be the proper means of providing a remedy. I admit that evils do exist; and it is not our fault if nothing has been done. So I say in reference to the sanitary conditions that, as I have told him, the Local Government Board were only anxious to move, but could not until we had some-representations which as yet I have not had.

*MR. CONYBEARE: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. I made a strong representation on the subject, accompanied by a memorial signed by residents in Cradley, and pressed it on the attention of the House last Session, though the right hon. Gentleman was not in his place.

*MR. RITCHIE: Yes, but we want a representation under the Public Health Act. It is not sufficient to make a statement in this House. We can only move within the lines of the Act.

MR. CONYBEARE: By a memorial?

*MR. RITCHIE: I stated distinctly last year if the Local Government Board received representations under the Public Health Act, we would at once take action. So far as I know no such representation has been made. The hon. Member for Lanark stated last night that our commercial system was in a state of collapse. But I do not agree with him. Undoubtedly there has been a period of stagnation existing for years past, but I am happy to think it is rapidly passing away. There is every indication that an improved condition of things exists now. If we look at the question of wages it will be seen that in all districts they are advancing, rapidly advancing, and have now reached the highest limit during the past ten years. Returns published in the Board of Trade Journal for February show on the reports of Trade Societies that of a total of 237,208 workmen only 7,390 are out of work a proportion of 3·1 per cent. In 1886 the proportion of unemployed was 11 per cent.; in 1887, 10·3 per cent.; in 1888, 7·8 per cent.

*MR. GRAHAM: These are members of Trade Societies?

*MR. RITCHIE: Yes. I am aware that those who make these returns refer to what is called skilled labour, but, as the hon. Gentleman knows, skilled labour almost invariably requires to be supplemented by unskilled labour, and it is impossible to suppose that the demand for skilled labour should thus have enormously increased within the past few years, without a corresponding increase in the demand for unskilled labour. But the prosperity of the working classes at the present time is shown in more ways than one. The capital in the Post Office and Trustees Savings' Banks has increased from £29,000,000 in 1873 to £104,000,000; the capital of the building societies, in which the working classes largely invest their savings, has increased from £20,000,000 in 1876 to £53,000,000 in 1886; and the capital of the provident societies from £6,000,000, with 508,000 members, to £11,000,000 with 841,000 members. These figures show the great increase that had been made in the prosperity of the working classes. No doubt there are a considerable number of unemployed, but these figures, I think, will show the House that the unemployed are not as numerous as they were, and that the savings of the people have been enormously increased. Of course, I am aware, not only that there exists, but that there always will exist, a considerable number of unemployed, many of whom are reduced very often to great straits. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cuninghame Graham) spoke of the dock labourers. Well, Sir, this is about one of the hardest chapters in the whole history of unemployed labour, and no one who has seen these unhappy people at the dock gates in the morning waiting in the hope of obtaining some casual work can fail to have been overwhelmed with sympathy for the sufferings they undergo; but it ought to be borne in mind that the refuse and dregs of the unemployed are collected at the docks. That is their last resort. Unfortunately, it must be admitted that large numbers of these unemployed are unemployed because, owing to weakness brought on by ill-health or intemperance, they are incapable of doing any kind of hard work. The fact must be faced that, even in the most prosperous times, there must be large numbers of persons unemployed, and reduced to the lowest depths of penury. Great efforts are, however, now being made on the part of philanthropic individuals to meet this distress, and there never has been a time when more people have been associated together in the poorer districts of London, and in different parts of the country, to do their best to alleviate this state of things. But I am glad to be able to say that, so far as the pauper returns are concerned, there also we have considerable cause for congratulation. The pauperism of England and Wales in 1888 was 728,000, or 25·4 per 1,000, but in November, 1887, the number was 740,000, or 26·2; so that within a year pauperism has decreased one per thousand. And it must be remembered that though these numbers seem large, about 600,000 are women and children. The condition of pauperism throughout England and Wales is now this, that at no time during the period over which the Returns extend—at no time during the past 30 years—has there been so little pauperism throughout the country as at present. A similar decrease of one per 1,000 has taken place in the Metropolis during the past year, and so far as that goes it shows that the poverty of the country is less now than a year ago, and that many people who otherwise would have come on the Poor Law are now obtaining employment where they did not obtain it before. Upon that point, I may say that I know that at one time there was a considerable amount of doubt as to whether or not the resources of the Metropolitan Boards of Guardians were sufficient to cope with the distress that existed, but that matter has been inquired into by a Committee whose Report sets the doubt at rest, and that Report also bears out the conclusions I have drawn from the pauper returns. I say, it may be concluded that so great a fall in the number of paupers is chiefly due to the improved condition of the working classes generally. The time at our disposal is so short that it has not been possible for me to ask the House to permit me to go into all the details advanced by hon. Gentlemen who preceded me. All I desire to say is that, so far as our information goes, the position of the working classes is considerably better now than for many years past; there is more employment and less distress, and we hope that state of things will continue. But I do not say that there is not great distress, and I do not say that there are not many matters which ought properly to receive the consideration of the Government on so important a question as this. But I must point out to the House and to hon. Gentlemen that at the present time there are no less than three Committees investigating various phases of this question—namely, the Sweating Committee, the Importation of Foreign Paupers Committee, and the Poor Law Committee. All these are investigating different points connected with the condition of the working classes and the unemployed in this country. It will be the duty of the Government to weigh well any reports and recommendations these Committees may make. But while that is so, and while there is still much that may be done in the way of remedial legislation, the proposals of the hon. Member who has moved the Amendment, so far from improving, would rather make matters worse. I give the hon. Member credit for the motive which has induced him to bring forward the Motion. We all sympathize with the object he has in view, but I ask the House to dissent from the Amendment. I trust the House will assist the Government in bringing the debate to a conclusion, so that our time may be given to the important business which is before us.

*MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck): Considering that the House has now been discussing Her Majesty's gracious Speech for nearly a fortnight, it is with great reluctance that I intervene in this debate for a few moments. I wish to say, however, that I do not consider that this is the most opportune moment for raising a question of such importance, and so far-reaching in all its issues as that we are now discussing. Speaking for myself, at the opening of Parliament I should be prepared to challenge, if necessary, the policy of the Government by a single Amendment, and if defeated on that Amendment I should allow the Address to pass. I think it is a very unsatisfactory state of things to be debating the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne for nearly a fortnight without making any satisfactory progress with the business of the country. No doubt it is extremely difficult for persons in the position which I have the honour to hold, representing as I do a working class constituency, to remain silent when questions such as that now under discussion are sprung upon the House. If we remain silent it may be assumed in certain quarters that we are out of sympathy with those whom we are sent here directly to represent. Well, Sir; I will yield to no man in the depth of the sympathy which I entertain towards the working classes, and the desire which

I feel to alleviate their position at every possible point. For more than 20 years now, the small influence that I have been able to wield has been given to improve the condition of my fellows, and I should be unfaithful to the trust that is reposed in me if I were not to express sympathy on every possible occasion with the class to whom I have the honour to belong. But, Sir, what we want is not a mere expression of sympathy from the Government. That, I am very glad to say, we have already received from the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, and I should not for one moment think that he was insincere in his expression of sympathy, either on his own part or the part of the Government. But we want something more than mere expressions of opinion. We want something tangible and definite which will tend to improve the condition of the working classes. I am not going to take up the time of the House with any attempt to prove a self-evident proposition. It will be admitted—even the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board has admitted in his speech this afternoon—that there is distress existing in various quarters of the kingdom—very great distress, especially in such a district as that to which he has referred—namely, Cradley Heath. I think it would be well for the Government to consider some scheme for improving the social condition of the people at Cradley Heath. The right Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith), speaking in the debate raised on the Crofters' Question, said the difficulty the Government had to face in proposing any remedial measures for the Scotch crofters lay in the fact that you have not to contend against, or fight with, economic difficulties, but are contending against the forces of nature—that you have a “less productive soil, a less genial climate than those other countries which compete with the Scottish crofter in disposing of the product of their labour.” But that state of things, I would point out, does not obtain in the Cradley Heath district. There you have not to fight against any forces of nature. The trade of Cradley Heath is practically a monopoly in that branch of industry. With the permission of the House I should like to read a single sentence from the Report which has been referred to this afternoon, in which it is said—

“That in reference to the chainmaking trade of Cradley Heath, instead of its being a declining industry, it continues to develop, and nothing has yet been done to materially supplant hand labour by machinery.”

So that in that case you have not to contend against the forces of nature. But I will not enlarge upon this, seeing that we shall have an opportunity of raising the subject again when the Report of the Lords Committee dealing with sweating is presented to Parliament. Reference has been made to the shortening of the hours of labour by some legislative interference. This is an extremely difficult question—a matter which will have to be very carefully handled when it is brought forward for discussion in this House. Reference has also been made to the action of trades unions. Well, I am frank enough to admit that I am a trades unionist and have been so for a number of years, but I think that the record of trades unionists in relation to the shortening of hours is a very creditable record. For many years I have endeavoured, in my humble way, to secure the reduction of the hours of labour, but I have sought to bring it about apart from any Parliamentary interference. My own conviction is—I express it as an opinion of my own, and pledge nobody else to it—that with proper organization amongst the working classes it is possible to bring about a proper reduction of the hours of labour. But I also admit the great difficulty you have to face in branches of industry where it is not possible for workmen to combine. Take, for example, the case of the London car drivers and conductors. These men go on duty at eight o'clock in the morning, and they do not leave duty until half-past twelve at night. Their work is from morning till night for seven days in the week. They are never an hour off duty during the whole of that time except from sickness. They have no means whatever of establishing an organization; and I can see that in such a case as this and even in the case of railway servants the question is a very difficult one, and that it is a fair question for the State to consider how far it can interfere to secure the men a half or a whole holiday in that what has occurred in connection with the Address on the present occasion is an evidence, which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian himself referred to in strong language, of the extreme inconvenience of attempting to deal with questions of great importance simply on Amendments to the Address. It is obvious that a sufficient and proper opportunity is not afforded by an attempt to graft on the Address Amendments dealing with these Questions—opportunities which they could have by discussing Amendments on substantive Motions or on Bills, and which they are now entirely deprived of. I trust opportunity will be found, so far as the Government is concerned, and there will be no hesitation whatever in giving full consideration to the very important question involved in the Amendment of the hon. Member.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman, now that the Debate on the Address is completed, can name a day for the discussion of the question of Perpetual Pensions for which I have been promised a day?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am under an obligation to the hon. Gentleman to name a day for that purpose, but he is aware that we are under statutory compulsion to proceed with Supply so as to obtain the supplies necessary for the purposes of the coming year, and voting the Supplementary Estimates before a given day in March, the 10th or 19th. We must ask the House to consider the financial provisions for the services of the country, and so soon as that is accomplished, I will endeavour to meet my obligation to the hon. Gentleman.

MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries): Are we to understand that the right hon. Gentleman will give facilities for the discussion of these matters, which have been excluded by the Closure, or are his remarks merely the expression of a benevolent wish?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It must be obvious that I cannot undertake to give facilities to hon. Gentlemen. If I were to begin at the commencement of the Session to undertake to give facilities for the discussion of questions of the greatest importance, I should find myself in the position either of inability to carry on the work and duties of the Government, or meeting the obligations which I had undertaken. The hon. and learned Member is aware that there are certain days at the disposal of private Members of this House, and there are certain Bills on the Paper which will give an opportunity for the discussion of Questions of this character, and certain Votes of the Estimates which will also afford an opportunity of which I have no doubt hon. Members will avail themselves.

DR. CLARK: It is a fact that there are 670 Members of this House, of whom 70 are Scotch Members, and what chance have 70 against 600, in a ballot, of raising the question of Home Rule for Scotland?

MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. Member is an exceedingly intelligent, ingenious, and active Member of Parliament, and if he will refer to the number of times he spoke last autumn Session, he will find that had the other 69 Scotch Members occupied the same amount of time, we must have been exclusively occupied with Scotch questions during the whole of the Autumn Session. I cannot, therefore, think that the hon. Member has any great grievance; but I can assure him that the interests of Scotland will have the fullest consideration so far as the Government are concerned.

MR. CONYBEARE: Mr. Speaker, comments have been made of the most invidious character by the President of the Local Government Board as to the length of time which, in the exercise of our duty, my hon. Friend (Mr. Graham) and I occupied in this House. The right hon. Gentleman had the assurance and audacity to bring a charge of obstruction against us, and it is only fair that I should say one or two words of defence against these charges. The right hon. Gentleman insinuated, at any rate, that we had been given to understand that the debate on the Address would come to a conclusion this afternoon. No such information came to my ears, and even if it had, it would not have affected my mind in the least. The right hon. Gentleman has just been talking about days occupied by private Members. Why, Mr. Speaker, we had two days the week before last on general subjects.

It being Six of the clock, Mr. Speaker adjourned the House without Question put.

Mr. W. H. Smith

Cork Improvement Act, 1852, any person interested in the accounts, either as a creditor or a ratepayer, may object to any part of the accounts, and the auditors may make such abatements as to them shall seem just, subject to an appeal to the Recorder by a certain number of the Council. It appears, therefore, that any ratepayer aggrieved by the expenditure referred to in the question may object thereto at the audit."

That is all the information which I have at present; but I have no doubt the matter will be further inquired into.

NAVAL DEFENCE.—QUESTION.

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN, in rising to ask what opportunity will be given to this House for considering the proposals which, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, are necessary for "an increase in the precautions which have hitherto been taken for the safety of our shores and our commerce," said: My Lords, I do not know that the Question which I rise to ask Her Majesty's Government may not be somewhat unusual; but, at the same time, it certainly is not singular, and, even if it be unusual, I venture to think that the circumstances that lead to it are also unusual. Your Lordships will well remember that there is a paragraph in the Speech from the Throne of very great—I might almost say supreme—importance; I mean that paragraph which alluded to the defensive condition of the Empire. In that paragraph Parliament was informed that, in view of the potential strength for offence of other European countries, the defensive strength of the Empire was insufficient. My Lords, I do not think it is possible to conceive an announcement of much greater importance than that. In some ways it is more important than Parliament had been told that an increase in Her Majesty's forces was necessary in view of the fact that a European war was imminent, and that our interests in the East were at stake.

the safety of our commerce, which is the blood and the life of the Empire, are not secure against the ordinary vicissitudes of war. And more than that even—that the defensive condition of the Empire is not such as can be considered satisfactory in view of our position and our circumstances even in a time of profound peace. My Lords, I apprehend that whatever the proposals of Her Majesty's Government are, they will be proposals of a permanent character; that is to say, I presume that the paragraph in the Queen's Speech announces that Her Majesty's Government have arrived at a new estimate of the defensive requirements of the Empire; and that, therefore, whatever the proposals may be, whether they affect the Army or Navy, or both, or whether they include the armament of the Coaling Stations, and so on, they will be of a permanent character. Now, it appears to me that in a case of that kind it will be a great misfortune if your Lordships' House have not ample opportunity of expressing its opinion. I do not know, of course, in what shape the proposals of Her Majesty's Government will be made in another place; but I should imagine that they will come before this House in one of two ways—either in the Appropriation Bill on the last day of the Session, which I need hardly say would give this House no opportunity whatever for discussing this matter, or they will come before the House in the shape of a Money Bill. Of course, the right of this House to deal with a Money Bill is not disputed; but your Lordships I am sure will agree with me that it is the universal practice of this House not to reject or amend Money Bills unless in matters of the most supreme and vital importance; and, therefore, I should be right in saying that this question of the defence of the Empire and of the adequacy or inadequacy of the proposals of the Government could not be discussed by this House in a proper manner on a Money Bill. I cannot of my own recollection go very far back, but I remember two cases somewhat similar to this. I remember when a Vote for six millions was asked for; and on that occasion the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Argyll) asked a Question somewhat similar to mine; that is to say, he asked a statement would be made should give us any information, however slight, on this serious and important question.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I understand the desire of my noble Friend, and I should be very glad to give him any information if I had any. But the only knowledge I have is that which is possessed by all your Lordships. It is not a subject upon which, in the absence of facts, I could allow myself to satisfy my noble Friend by speculation, and I can give him very little explanation of what has occurred. I can only say that, as far as I can judge, it belongs rather to the domain of domestic character than to that of political change.

IRELAND—PROCEEDINGS OF THE CORK TOWN COUNCIL.

THE DUKE OF ST. ALBANS, in rising to call attention to the payment of car hire, printing, and posting bills calling a meeting to protest against Mr. O'Brien's prison treatment, out of public rates, by the Cork Town Council on the 8th February, and to inquire whether such a proceeding was legal, and, if not, whether any means exist to prevent such an illegal expenditure of public money, and whether the Law Officers of the Crown are prepared to put the remedy in force, said: My Lords, I hope I may not be considered unduly pressing in drawing your Lordships' attention to this matter. I would have brought it forward at an earlier period of our proceedings, but that I fell into an error which may be excusable—namely, that I thought the matter to which the question refers would be rectified on the Government audit. It seems however, that the cities of Cork and Waterford and the town of Kilkenny are for some reason exempt from any legal or Government audit of their municipal accounts. True, an appeal is allowed to the Irish Court of Queen's Bench, but in the present state of Ireland it is obvious that no private individual would incur the odium and expense of such an appeal. I think, therefore, that in justice to the ratepayers and in the interests of those who wish that public bodies in Ireland should properly perform their duties, the Government may fairly be asked to express their opinion on this case, and to say whether there are any means in their power by which this illegal application of public rates can be rectified.

LORD FITZ GERALD: My Lords, The subject which has been brought to our attention by the noble Lord is very wide and very important, and deserves serious consideration. This act of the Cork Town Council, in applying the funds of the ratepayers to purposes for which they were not applicable, is an act done in open defiance and contempt of the law. The order made by the corporation was illegal, and the parties who made the order would be personally responsible for the money illegally applied. It is necessary that such practices should not be allowed to continue with impunity. Any ratepayer injured by the Act can go to the Court of Queen's Bench and ask for an order quashing the order of the Town Council by summary process, under the Municipal Corporation Act. But there are great difficulties in the way. The process is slow and expensive, and it is impossible to conceal the fact that the ratepayer who entered upon it would be subject to all the terrors of exclusive dealing. The Government has in every county in Ireland a Crown Prosecutor, and surely the Crown Prosecutor could, at the suit of any ratepayer, bring up the illegal order and have it quashed. If that is not done, the only alternative is for the Government to repeal the statutory powers by which the City of Cork, among others, is exempted from the Government audit. Then the Government Auditor can determine whether the expenditure is legal or not, and if it is held to be illegal, and he refuses to pass the accounts, the money would have to be refunded by those who had illegally expended it.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK): I have just been put in possession of the answer sent by the Local Government Board in Ireland to a request for the information necessary to give a reply to the Question of my noble Friend, and I think I cannot do better than read it—

“The Local Government Board have no information on the matter referred to. The Board have no power over the expenditure of the Cork Town Council, and the Corporation accounts are not audited by auditors of the Board, but by auditors appointed by the burgesses under Section 70 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1840. Under Section 23 of the Cork Improvement Act, 1852, any person interested in the accounts, either as a creditor or a ratepayer, may object to any part of the accounts, and the auditors may make such abatements as to them shall seem just, subject to an appeal to the Recorder by a certain number of the Council. It appears, therefore, that any ratepayer aggrieved by the expenditure referred to in the question may object thereto at the audit."

That is all the information which I have at present; but I have no doubt the matter will be further inquired into.

NAVAL DEFENCE.—QUESTION.

*THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN, in rising to ask what opportunity will be given to this House for considering the proposals which, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, are necessary for "an increase in the precautions which have hitherto been taken for the safety of our shores and our commerce," said: My Lords, I do not know that the Question which I rise to ask Her Majesty's Government may not be somewhat unusual; but, at the same time, it certainly is not singular, and, even if it be unusual, I venture to think that the circumstances that lead to it are also unusual. Your Lordships will well remember that there is a paragraph in the Speech from the Throne of very great—I might almost say supreme—importance; I mean that paragraph which alluded to the defensive condition of the Empire. In that paragraph Parliament was informed that, in view of the potential strength for offence of other European countries, the defensive strength of the Empire was insufficient. My Lords, I do not think it is possible to conceive an announcement of much greater importance than that. In some ways it is more important than if Parliament had been told that an increase in Her Majesty's forces was required either because war was imminent or to protect British interests in some distant portions of the globe; because what we are told is that our own shores, the integrity of these islands—the heart of the Empire—and the safety of our commerce, which is the blood and the life of the Empire, are not secure against the ordinary vicissitudes of war. And more than that even—that the defensive condition of the Empire is not such as can be considered satisfactory in view of our position and our circumstances even in a time of profound peace. My Lords, I apprehend that whatever the proposals of Her Majesty's Government are, they will be proposals of a permanent character; that is to say, I presume that the paragraph in the Queen's Speech announces that Her Majesty's Government have arrived at a new estimate of the defensive requirements of the Empire; and that, therefore, whatever the proposals may be, whether they affect the Army or Navy, or both, or whether they include the armament of the Coaling Stations, and so on, they will be of a permanent character. Now, it appears to me that in a case of that kind it will be a great misfortune if your Lordships' House have not ample opportunity of expressing its opinion. I do not know, of course, in what shape the proposals of Her Majesty's Government will be made in another place; but I should imagine that they will come before this House in one of two ways—either in the Appropriation Bill on the last day of the Session, which I need hardly say would give this House no opportunity whatever for discussing this matter, or they will come before the House in the shape of a Money Bill. Of course, the right of this House to deal with a Money Bill is not disputed; but your Lordships I am sure will agree with me that it is the universal practice of this House not to reject or amend Money Bills unless in matters of the most supreme and vital importance; and, therefore, I should be right in saying that this question of the defence of the Empire and of the adequacy or inadequacy of the proposals of the Government could not be discussed by this House in a proper manner on a Money Bill. I cannot of my own recollection go very far back, but I remember two cases somewhat similar to this. I remember when a Vote for six millions was asked for; and on that occasion the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Argyll) asked a Question somewhat similar to mine; that is to say, he asked whether a statement would be made by the Government in this House, or something to that effect. The then Prime Minister (Lord Beaconsfield) said that the ordinary and proper course was to wait until the statement had been made in the other House; and the result was, that when the Bill came up to this House there was no discussion upon it at all. I think the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) said at the time that after the Vote of the House of Commons he would advise this House not to discuss the Bill. But, my Lords, the case is not entirely on all fours with the present, because at that time the causes which made the Vote of six millions necessary were perfectly well known to Parliament and to the country. The situation which involved that Vote had been debated over and over again in this House, and there had been Ministerial statements made about it; and in consequence the Vote was merely the carrying into effect of decisions which had been come to by both Houses of Parliament. Then, my Lords, I remember also the occasion when a much larger Vote was asked for by Mr. Gladstone, the Vote for 11 millions. On that occasion the noble Earl (Lord Carnarvon) asked whether a statement would be made in this House before any statement was made in the other House of Parliament, and the noble Earl opposite (Lord Granville) replied that he would make a simultaneous statement, and that was the course which was adopted. But in that case also, my Lords, this House knew perfectly well the reasons why the Vote for 11 millions was asked for. We had had it debated; we knew all about the Penjdeh incident, and had had frequent debates about the operations in the Soudan; so that the House had practically expressed its opinion, and there was no very urgent necessity for any further debate or any further expression of opinion upon the Vote of Credit itself. But in the present case we are in almost complete ignorance as to the necessity for these additional precautions which are to be placed before Parliament, and we are in absolute ignorance as to what the proposals of the Government are to consist of. We have had no discussions—no full discussions at any rate—in this House as to the defensive condition of the Empire. I do not think that Parliament has any full information as to the Report of the Royal Commission that was appointed to inquire into the subject. I do not think we have any knowledge in this House of what has been done with the £2,900,000 that were voted for the defence of the Empire. Therefore, my Lords, it appears to me that on the present occasion there is great necessity for a full debate and understanding of this matter. I venture to say that this question of the defence of the Empire is one with which your Lordships' House is pre-eminently capable of dealing. It is often said that one of the great functions of this House is to deal with large Imperial questions. An immense number of Members of this House have served in Her Majesty's forces—a considerable number in the Army and a considerable number in the Navy. There is the noble Earl to whom I have already alluded (Lord Carnarvon) and other noble Lords who sat on the Commission, and a great many of your Lordships have on various occasions occupied places of great importance, that would render their opinion on a subject of this kind of the greatest value to the country. It would be a matter of regret for this House itself if it had not an opportunity of expressing its opinion on such a subject. That, perhaps, is comparatively a small matter, but it would be a matter for the very deepest regret if the country should be deprived of the advice and opinion of this House on a question about which it is so well qualified to judge. If I am mistaken in the notion that there will be no ample opportunity for this House to express an opinion, I can only apologize for taking up your Lordships' time, but I do not myself see how it can be done. I sincerely hope that some opportunity will be given us to discuss this question of the defence of the Empire, and the adequacy or inadequacy of the proposals that Her Majesty's Government intend to make, and that that opportunity will be given at such time and in such a manner that the opinion and decision of this House, whatever it may be, may have some practical effect upon the issue in hand. My Lords, I wish to guard myself by suggesting that I not only do not disapprove in the smallest degree of what Her Majesty's Government have said in the Queen's Speech; on the contrary, I approve of it. I think it is a matter on which the country may congratulate itself that Her Majesty's Government understand the situation, and that they have the courage to grapple with it, and have not hesitated to come forward and tell the people of this country that the defence of the Empire is inadequate, and to ask for money for the purpose of making it adequate, and I have not the faintest doubt in the world that the people of this country will back up Her Majesty's Government in anything that they do in that way, provided always that they feel sure that the proposals are sufficient, that the work is to be thoroughly done, and that the money voted is to be laid out to the best and greatest advantage. My Lords, as I said before, if I have troubled your Lordships unnecessarily in this matter, I am sorry for it, but at the same time, as I think it is only right that this House should have a proper opportunity of discharging and expressing its opinion on this point, I put the Question on the paper which I now beg to ask the noble Lord at the head of the Government.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I think my noble Friend, in reading the debates of the other House, has allowed himself to be affected by the language which naturally prevails there. We know that in the other House of Parliament Members are anxious to obtain opportunities for discussing various public questions, and the reason of that anxiety is that the time of the other House is all taken beforehand, either by the Government or by private Members. But I do not think that a noble Lord, even of the most despairing frame of mind, need be at all fearful that there will be want of opportunity for discussion owing to the scarcity of time here. There is abundance of leisure, and my noble Friend is certainly not a man of that timorous order that he would shrink from bringing forward any question in which he might feel an interest. My first answer, then, is that the time of the House is abundant; that the subject is eminently congenial to your Lordships; and there is no person fitter to make the opportunity than my noble Friend. But with respect to the other portion of the noble Lord's speech, I do not quite understand what he expected us to have done. He called attention to the passage which occurred in the Queen's Speech; but I wonder whether my noble Friend has noticed that the passage is addressed to the House of Commons, and that therefore it was quite natural that the House of Commons should first give it its consideration. My noble Friend complains that he does not know what we are going to do; but does he seriously expect me to give a small rehearsal of Lord George Hamilton's speech this evening? Does he really expect that I should make here the very statement which the First Lord is probably giving in the other House at this very moment? I think I must refer my noble Friend to the ordinary sources of information to-morrow morning, when he will receive ample information. With respect to the suggestion that there has not been any discussion in this House on the subject of the defences of the Empire, I think that the memory of my noble Friend must have betrayed him. I remember three nights last Session on which the subject occupied a very prominent position in our debates, and on one of them, when Lord Wolseley spoke, I do not remember ever seeing the House, either on the Benches or in the Galleries, so full as it was on that occasion. I am sure the subject was very fully debated on that occasion, and it received great attention from various Members of your Lordships' House. I do not in the least doubt that an opportunity can be found for my noble Friend, if he wants one, but I may add that I believe that the proposals of Lord George Hamilton will take the shape of a Bill, which will not be purely a Money Bill. That Bill will come up here, and, according to all Parliamentary precedent, will be subject to as much discussion and criticism, except on the mere point of money, as any measure which is introduced to this House.

House adjourned at Five o'clock,
till To-morrow, a quarter
past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 7th March, 1889.

COMMONS.

Ordered:—"That a Select Committee be appointed to consider every Report made by the Land Commissioners of England, certifying the expediency of any Provisional Order for the enclosure or regulation of a Common, and presented to the House during the last or present Sessions, before a Bill be brought in for the confirmation of such Order.

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power, in respect of each such Provisional Order, to inquire and Report to the House whether the same should be confirmed by Parliament: and, if so, whether with or without modification, and, in the event of their being of opinion that the same should not be confirmed, except subject to modifications, to report such modifications accordingly with a view to such Provisional Order being remitted to the Land Commissioners.

"That the Committee do consist of Twelve Members, Seven to be nominated by the House and Five by the Committee of Selection.

"That Sir Walter Barttelot, Mr. Bryce, Mr. Elton, Mr. Walter James, Mr. Story-Maskelyne, Mr. Richard Power, and Mr. Wroughton be Members of the said Committee.

"Power to send for persons, papers, and records.

"Five to be the quorum." —(Mr. Stuart-Wortley.)

QUESTIONS.

IRISH LACE.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY (London-derry) asked the Secretary to the Treasury whether repeated representations have lately been made by Convent Lace Schools and Schools of Art in Ireland as to the advantages of a regular continuance of Mr. Alan Cole's lectures and instructions upon designs for Irish lace; whether Mr. Cole has been, or will be, directed to renew his visits and lectures to those schools and convents in March and October of the present year; and, whether similar appeals have been made by convents and schools of art in Ireland for the renewal of Mrs. Power Lalor's inspection of the materials and methods of making the laces in Ireland?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I understand that some representations of the character referred to in the first paragraph of the hon. Member's Question have been received by the Irish Government, and I have seen testimony from other quarters as to the good work that has been effected by Mr. Alan Cole's visits. Some provision has been made for continuing these visits, but I am not aware that any dates have been fixed for them. The convenience of the Science and Art Department, to which Mr. Cole is attached, will have to be considered as well as the question of expense. So far as I know, no applications have been made by convents and schools of art for the renewal of Mrs. Power Lalor's inspection.

LAND TAX REVENUE.

COLONEL DAWNAY (York, N. R., Thirsk) asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is aware that it is usual for the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to hand over the balance, so long as it does not exceed £5, over and above the amount due to the Revenue for Land Tax to the collector, as a perquisite, in addition to the 3d. in the pound he is paid for collecting this tax; and, whether he will take steps in the future that the balance should be carried forward to meet future charges?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The power to make the allowance referred to is in the hands of the Land Tax Commissioners. I am precluded from making any alteration with regard to this allowance, as it is made by Statute (section 114 of 43 and 44 Vic., c. 17).

COLONEL DAWNAY: I beg to give notice that on the first opportunity I will call the attention of the House to this subject.

DERRY GAOL.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Rev. Daniel Stephens, an untried prisoner detained on remand in Derry Gaol, asked to have his dinner supplied from Roddy's Hotel on his arrival after his long journey from Falcarragh to Derry; whether the order was carried out by the hotel keeper, and the dinner duly received by a warder in the prison; whether the dinner was shortly afterwards returned by order of the Governor, or other superior official acting for him; and, whether he can state the grounds on which this refusal was based?

*THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The General Prisons Board report that it is the case that the Governor of Londonderry Prison refused to allow the dinner sent from the hotel named to be supplied on the occasion in question. The further supply of provisions from this hotel had been prohibited by the Visiting Committee in August last, in the case of the Rev. James McFadden, in consequence of there having been collusion between him and those sent with his meals from the hotel, whereby he was enabled to evade the Prison Rules in sending out surreptitiously communications from the Prison. The Governor in the exercise of his discretion extended the prohibition to this case.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Government approve of the action of the Governor, and whether they will give the hotel keeper any opportunity of rebutting the charge made against him, which I understand that the hotel keeper indignantly denies? I would also like to know what course will be pursued in similar cases hereafter?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no doubt that the Governor will exercise the discretion given to him.

MR. T. M. HEALY intimated that he would call attention to the matter upon the Estimates.

THE POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANKS.

MR. HUBBARD (Bucks, N.) asked the Postmaster General if his attention has been drawn to the following facts: that a man, 21 years old next birthday, can assure £10 at his death in the Post Office Savings Bank, by an annual premium of 4s. 2d., that the Prudential Assurance Company only offer to a man, 21 years old next birthday, £8 9s. at death, in return for a weekly premium of 1d.; that, despite the apparent advantage to insurers at this age, and at any age, of an insurance in the Post Office, only 5,859 contracts for £447,300, payable at death, "entered into by Her Majesty's Postmaster General," were in existence on December 31st, 1887, while the Prudential Assurance Company (Industrial Branch) acknowledged 6,904,000 policies for £64,200,000, as existing on December 31st, 1886; whether he will consider the best means of helping the saving public to avail themselves more of the larger benefits offered by Her Majesty's Government; and, whether, to assist them, he would re-issue a Departmental handbook on the lines of "The Post Office Aids to Thrift," published by Mr. Fawcett in 1881?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, University of Cambridge): Without making myself responsible for the accuracy of all the figures quoted by my hon. Friend, I would point out that the Post Office has brought its system of insurance and annuity into almost every village in the Kingdom, and has spared no means at its disposal of making known the advantages which it offers; and it rests with the public to avail itself of them. I can only hope that the attention which the hon. Member is now calling to the matter will promote the object which he has in view—an object with which I entirely sympathize. The Post Office handbook, incorporating the essential points contained in Mr. Fawcett's edition, entitled, "The Post Office Aids to Thrift," is published every six months, and may be obtained at any post office. I shall, however, be glad to consult the Treasury as to the practicability of circulating further information on this most important subject.

THE EDLINGHAM BURGLARY.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he proposes to make any further inquiry into the Edlingham burglary case; whether the prosecutors in the late trial of the policemen were instructed to produce all the evidence which could throw any light on the case; and, if so, why some important witnesses were not examined, especially the Reverend Mr. Perry and Mr. Percy, the principal actors in the proceedings by which the case was re-opened, and who were present ready and willing to give evidence; whether the money to give compensation to Murphy and Brannagan has been voted, or when, or in what shape, Parliament will be asked to vote it; and, whether, in case there is to be no further inquiry, he will, before asking for the money, produce to the House a Copy of the proceedings on the inquiry by an agent of his own, or other evidence, by which he was satisfied of the innocence of the two men, and of their right to compensation?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I have

carefully considered this intricate and difficult case, and I am unable to see that any further inquiry can be made which will throw more light upon it, or elicit any new facts. The Director of Public Prosecutions was requested to produce at the late trial all the evidence that could be given. It was necessarily left to the counsel conducting the prosecution what particular witnesses should be called. Mr. Perry and Mr. Percy were not called, because the statements made to them by Edgell or Richardson were not evidence against the constables then on trial; but they were subpoenaed by the prosecution in order to insure their attendance in case the defendants wished to examine them. Mr. Perry was called as a witness before the magistrate in the case against Edgell and Richardson, and there was then an opportunity of cross-examining him. The compensation lodged with trustees for Brannagan and Murphy has been paid from the Civil Contingencies Fund, and Parliament will be asked to vote it in the Supplementary Estimate for the repayment of advances from that fund. I do not propose to produce to the House a copy of the proceedings and report of the Treasury Solicitor. That is a document containing a great deal of confidential matter; and it is impossible for the House to form a judicial opinion upon a mass of evidence of an intricate character. But I may say that I did not act on that report, and took no step for the pardon of Brannagan and Murphy, or for compensating them, until Edgell and Richardson had not only confessed their guilt after warning that they would be punished, but had been sentenced to five years' penal servitude.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I want to know whether the counsel for the prosecution were instructed merely to produce such evidence as was likely to secure a conviction, or to produce all the evidence that would throw light on the case; and, if so, why the prosecution did not call Mr. Perry and Mr. Percy, and any evidence that might affect the credibility of Edgell and Richardson?

*MR. MATTHEWS: I have already stated that the prosecution was instructed to lay the whole of the case, both for and against the policemen, before the Court.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I beg to give notice that when the Vote for Compensation comes before the House, I will call attention to the unsatisfactory position of this matter, the extreme barbarity of the English law, and the great difficulty of eliciting the truth.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is it true that the prosecution was conducted by a new Conservative Member of this House?

*MR. MATTHEWS: The prosecution was entrusted to a gentleman who has a large practice before the tribunal by which it was tried. The choice was not in any way made by the Government, but by the Director of Public Prosecutions on his own responsibility.

SMALL ARMS—MAJOR HARSTON'S INVENTION.

CAPTAIN SELWYN (Cambridge, Wisbeach) asked the Secretary of State for War whether the estimated cost of converting the Martini-Henry into a repeating rifle is about 8s. at the Government Factory and 12s. 6d. by contract; and, whether, in view of the great economy which Major Harston's invention might produce, and in order to secure fair play to inventors, he will lay upon the Table of the House the Report of the Small Arms Committee on this invention?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The conversion of the Martini into a repeating rifle could be made in the Government factory at a cost of 16s. per arm. But it is represented to me that this invention, while remarkable for its ingenuity, is altogether unfit for service. The Reports of the Small Arms Committee are confidential documents, which, I am afraid, I cannot undertake to produce.

CAPTAIN SELWYN: Is the right hon. Gentleman able to say when this unfortunate officer is likely to receive payment for his invention?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The question of the payment of Major Harston is under consideration.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): Is the right hon. Gentleman prepared to fulfil the promise given to me by the Financial Secretary, that Members of this House should see the Report of the Small Arms Committee to the War Office?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I do not understand that my hon. Friend made such a promise. I certainly cannot undertake to produce a confidential document.

NAVAL GUNS.

MR. HANBURY asked the First Lord of the Admiralty at what dates the Howe, Camperdown, Anson, Undaunted, Australia, Immortalité, Narcissus, and Galatea, which would have been completed by 1st December, 1888, if their guns had been delivered (Parliamentary Paper, 20th December, 1888) were or could have been ready for their guns; when the guns in each case had been originally promised which are "now promised" for May and June of this whether the guns quoted in the Return as "now promised" for delivery to the Anson, Undaunted, and Immortalité in February, 1889, were so delivered; what other vessels are being delayed in completion by the non-delivery of their guns, or are ready and waiting for them; and whether the Admiralty has yet received from the War Office a clear statement of (1) how the money voted (say) during the last six years for naval ordnance has been expended; and (2) what supply of naval ordnance the War Office has in hand?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The four ships referred to in the first part of the Question are now ready for their guns. These are to be delivered on board by April 30 for the Victoria, the end of May for the Camperdown, by the end of June for the Sans Pareil and Howe. The Trafalgar will be ready for her guns by June next, which are to be delivered by the end of August. It is intended to re-arm the Thunderer this year and the Rupert next year; it is anticipated that the guns will be delivered by the time the ships are ready for them. With reference to the guns for the belted cruisers, those for the Undaunted and Immortalité are expected at the end of this month, those for the Australia at the end of May, and for the Narcissus at the end of June. Those for the Galatea and Aurora are expected in November, but there are at Chatham 9·2-inch guns of an earlier pattern which would be available in an emergency. The Medea and Medusa are now ready for their guns, which it is expected will be delivered by April 1 and May 15 respectively. It is anticipated that the guns for the Magicienne and Melpomene will be delivered by the time that the ships are ready for them. The Admiralty have not received from the War Office a complete statement of money spent for naval service, as the War Office state that it is impossible to furnish such a statement, no separate accounts having been kept of expenditure on naval ordnance stores as distinguished from those for land service. Separate store ledgers were, however, opened by the War Office, 1887-88, for naval ordnance, and a statement was last year furnished to the Admiralty by the War Office, showing the stock of naval ordnance stores, on April 1, 1888, made up partly of stores which the War Office transferred from the general existing stock to the naval service, and partly of stores which were expressly made or purchased for the Navy during the year 1887-8, when the separate accounts for the Navy were first started. The details of the division of the general existing stock between sea and land service as made by the War Office is now the subject of inquiry and consideration between the two Departments.

SAMOA.

MR. WILLIAM M'ARTHUR (Cornwall, Mid, St. Austell) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Government had any information as to a truce alleged to have been concluded between the German Consul and Mataafa, King of Samoa; whether they have any information as to the present place of detention of the ex-King Malietoa; and whether they have ever asked from the German Government any undertaking that he should be well treated while detained by them?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): We have no information of the conclusion of a truce between the German Consul in Samoa and the Chief Mataafa. We have heard that the ex-King Malietoa has been conveyed to the Marshall Islands. Her Majesty's Government have never asked the German Government that Malietoa should be well treated while detained by them. We have no reason to doubt his fair treatment, but we have no special right to interfere on his behalf. We have heard indirectly that while in Germany he received very handsome entertainment.

RATHDRUM PETTY SESSIONS.

MR. WILLIAM CORBET (Wicklow, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention had been drawn to a case, decided at Rathdrum Petty Sessions on Thursday last, which arose from some road scrapings claimed, on the one hand by a man named Edward Pierce, under the authority of the road contractor, and on the other by Mr. W. F. Littledale, J.P., of Whaley Abbey, county Wicklow, whose son instructed William Hamilton, an emergency man, to draw the stuff into the farmyard of a holding from which the tenant had been evicted; whether it is true that, when the dispute arose, Hamilton went back to his house, and returned with a revolver, which he, as sworn, presented at Pierce, threatening to blow his brains out; whether Constable Flood swore that Hamilton admitted using the threat; whether Mr. Macleod, R.M., commented on the audacity of the defendant Hamilton in drawing a revolver under the circumstances; and, whether it was true that the defendant was merely bound over in the sum of £10 to keep the peace?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I had no previous knowledge of this case, but have inquired into it, and learn that the dispute arose from the conflicting claims referred to in the Question. The question which the magistrates had to decide was whether Hamilton presented this revolver, loaded, at the complainant, whose name, I am informed, was Price, not Pierce. Had he done so this would have constituted an indictable offence. There was, however, no evidence to show that the revolver was loaded, and Hamilton's daughter contradicted the statement that it was aimed at Price. The R.M. condemned the production of arms under such circumstances. Hamilton was old and infirm, with a wooden leg. He was bound over to keep the peace, or in default one month's imprisonment.

MR. WILLIAM CORBET asked the right hon. Gentleman if there was any evidence that the revolver was not loaded?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR said he had given the hon. Member all the information in his possession.

ROMAN CATHOLIC SOLDIERS AT CLONMEL.

MR. THEOBALD (Essex, Romford), asked the Secretary of State for War if, on Sunday last, in the Roman Catholic Church at Clonmel, the officiating priest, Father Byrne, from the altar commanded the soldiers to remain in their seats consequent on their having received orders from Lieutenant Geoghegan to leave the building, thus commanding them by priestly influence to disobey the orders of their commanding officer; and also that, before the officer left the church, the priest publicly rebuked the said officer; and if Lieutenant Geoghegan has in consequence been placed under arrest?

MR. W. MACDONALD (Queen's County, Ossory): I rise to a point of order. I want to know whether, having regard to the strict censorship exercised in respect of Questions put by hon. Members on this side of the House, a Question ought to be allowed to appear on the paper which is neither grammatical nor intelligible?

*MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Member insinuates that partiality is shown as between one side and the other in regard to Questions he is entirely wrong, and there is no justification for such an insinuation. I am not aware of any difference being made, and I have not thought it necessary to exercise any censorship in regard to this particular question.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): On the same subject I wish to ask the Secretary of State for War, if he will communicate to the House the Report of the Commander-in-Chief in Ireland on the conduct of Lieutenant Geoghegan in a Catholic Church in Clonmel, on Sunday last, and state what has been the result?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The principle which has hitherto been acted upon in such matters was stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh, as follows, on March 29, 1881—

"There is no printed regulation on the subject, but it is manifest that officers in command of soldiers at church or chapel must be allowed to exercise some discretion as to permitting them to remain there when language is used in sermons to which soldiers would not be allowed to listen if spoken in public meeting."

I entirely adopt the principle so laid down. Applying it to the circumstances of the present case, I have read the language addressed to the congregation on the occasion in question in the Lenten Pastoral, and I am of opinion that it held up duly constituted authorities to contempt, and as such ought not to have been addressed to soldiers. The lieutenant in charge, in the exercise of his discretion, ordered the troops to withdraw. He stated further in evidence that in doing so he intended no disrespect either to the Roman Catholic Church or to the officiating priest. I cannot, therefore, condemn the exercise of the discretion vested in this officer.

MR. SEXTON: May I point out to the right hon. Gentleman that he has not answered my Question as to any Report on the subject by the Commander-in-Chief in Ireland.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I thought the hon. Gentleman knew quite well that Reports of this description are quite confidential, and are not communicated to the House.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I did not understand the right hon. Gentleman to state the facts of the case.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: That was not the question put to me.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Then I will ask the right hon. Gentleman to state himself what the facts of the case were, because the answer which he has given to us is a sort of argumentative statement upon a state of facts which is not before us. Will the right hon. Gentleman prefer to make a statement now or to-morrow?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: A statement of facts ought to be made with the utmost care in such a case, and I should prefer that notice should be given.

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman have any objection to lay on the Table a copy of the Lenten Pastoral which he says he has read, and which contains language that justified the order?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I will consider that question also, and will state to-morrow what course I will take.

THE WITNESSES BEFORE THE SPECIAL COMMISSION.

MR. LALOR (Queen's County, Leix) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if it be true that the Lord Lieutenant has granted a free pardon to Delany, one of the men convicted of the Phoenix Park murders, and who was lately examined before the Judicial Commission; and, if so, on what date was the pardon signed; if pardoned, why is Delany retained in London in charge of the Governor of Maryborough Gaol and two warders; at whose expense are the Governor and the two warders kept in London; is it a fact that Delany, while in Mountjoy Prison, was allowed to see his wife weekly, while at the same time he was allowed tobacco and other special privileges in the way of dietary, &c.; and from what fund did the cost of this exceptional treatment come?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is not true that Delany has been pardoned. He is in London by order of the Special Commission. The General Prisons Board report that there is no ground whatever for the allegation that he received any exceptional privilege or indulgence.

CANADIAN APPLES.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.) asked the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that the Customs authorities at Liverpool recently seized a large consignment of Canadian apples, addressed to Messrs. L. Connolly and Co., one of the principal firms of fruit brokers in Great Britain, and refused to deliver same even on the production of the bills of lading issued at Port Hope, Ontario, for shipment per Grand Trunk Railway and Portland Maine, and thence per steamer to the port of Liverpool, until the day following that on which the fruit was sold, and then only on condition that the brand "Canadian Apples" was obliterated from the packages, with consequent injury to the commercial value of the goods; and, whether he can say if it was under the Trades Mark Act, or what other Statute the Customs authorities acted in this matter; and, if so, whether, considering the perishable nature of the goods and the necessity for prompt delivery in this trade, he will make such arrangements as will prevent the recurrence of such loss and inconvenience in future?

MR. JACKSON: The consignment in question arrived on February 26, and was detained by the Customs officers at Liverpool under Sections 16 and 3 of the Merchandize Marks Act, 1887, and with reference to Sub-section 2 of Section 10 of that Act, the Board of Customs telegraphed permission to deliver the goods on obliteration of the marks, and the goods were released from detention on February 27. On the first instance, the collector received authority from the Board to allow delivery of future importations under similar circumstances without reference to them and without obliteration of the marks.

RAILWAY BYE-LAWS.

MR. COGHILL (Newcastle-under-Lyme) asked the President of the Board of Trade whether he has had his attention called to the fact that Railway Companies continue to publish amongst their bye-laws one to the effect that any passenger travelling without a ticket, or failing or refusing to show and deliver up his ticket to any duly authorized servant of the Company when required so to do, shall be required to pay the fare from the station whence the train originally started to the end of his journey; whether this bye-law was held by the Judges of the Common Pleas Division in the London and Brighton Railway Company v. Watson to be "unreasonable and void"; and, whether the Board of Trade will, from time to time, so revise the bye-laws of the Railway Companies as to prevent the insertion in them, as valid, of bye-laws which have been previously held to be invalid by the Judges of the Superior Courts of Law?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS-BEACH): Yes, Sir, I believe the law is as stated by the hon. Member. The matter has been under my attention, but the question of the revision of bye-laws is a very difficult one, and looking to the pressure thrown on the Department by the Railway and Canal Traffic Act of last year, I cannot definitely undertake to say when the matter will be dealt with, but I will promise that it shall not be lost sight of.

SUB-COMMISSION COURT AT DOWNPATRICK.

MR. PINKERTON (Galway) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if Mr. McElvaine, who acted as landlord's valuator at the Sub-Commission Court recently held at

Mr. Jackson

Downpatrick, is the gentleman appointed as Court valuer for County Down; and, if, in order that both sides should be represented, he will authorize the appointment of a tenant's valuer to assist the County Court Judge in the discharge of his arduous duties?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners inform me that they are not aware whether the County Court Judge of the County Down has referred any questions to Mr. McElvaine for report, pursuant to section 32 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887. The power of selection of such valuers rests with the County Court Judges, who, in making their appointments, act with a full sense of their responsibility in the matter.

THE RIFLE BRIGADE.

MR. HAYDEN (Leitrim, S.) asked the Secretary of State for War whether it is the intention to remove the place of training of the 8th Battalion of the Rifle Brigade from Carrick-on-Shannon, the head-quarters for many years; and, if so, whether he will give any reason for the change?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: This is a very small Militia battalion, and it is much below its established strength. It has, therefore, been decided, after very careful consideration, to disband it after its next training, and to absorb the County of Leitrim into the recruiting area of the 5th Battalion of the Connaught Rangers. It will train this year at Boyle, because that is the head-quarters of the latter regiment, which it is hoped that many of the Leitrim men will join.

POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS IN LEITRIM.

MR. HAYDEN asked the Postmaster General whether representations have been made to him on behalf of the inhabitants of Garadice, Glebe, Coromahon, Breskil, Lisloughy, Brunnreilly, and several other townlands situate between Newtowngore and Ballinamore, county Leitrim, showing the need for a post-office in the district; whether a large number of letters are daily left at a single house in the district; and whether there is any reason why the request of the inhabitants should not be acceded to?

MR. RAIKES: The facts are as stated by the hon. Member, and I have had pleasure in sanctioning a post office at Garadice.

SCOTCH LOCAL GOVERNMENT BILL.

MR. DUFF (Bantfshire) asked the Lord Advocate whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce the Local Government Bill for Scotland in time to enable the Commissioners of Supply to consider it at their statutory meeting on the 30th of April?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Buteshire) replied in the affirmative.

CAPPOQUIN PETTY SESSIONS.

MR. P. J. POWER (Waterford, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether cases entered for hearing at Cappoquin Petty Sessions on 24th January, and requiring the attendance of two magistrates, were adjourned to 7th February, as only one magistrate attended; whether, on 7th February, such cases were again adjourned to 21st February, as only one magistrate attended; whether, on 21st February, another adjournment again took place for the same reason; what prevented the Resident Magistrate attending Cappoquin Ordinary Petty Sessions on the days in question; and whether any steps can be taken to prevent the inconveniences to professional gentlemen and their clients that follow such adjournments?

THE NORTH DUBLIN UNION.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin County, N.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is a fact that the Bank of Ireland, as treasurer of the North Dublin Union, has refused to allow the North Dublin Board of Guardians to overdraw its account to the extent of £4,000, for a limited period, on the security of the rates, although that security has been practically admitted by the Local Government Board to be ample; whether the Munster and Leinster Bank has offered to make the required advance, free of interest, on condition of the Union account being transferred to it from the Bank of Ireland; whether the Guardians resolved to transfer their account to the Munster and Leinster Bank, and whether they have been prevented from acting on this resolution by the Local Government Board; whether there is any statutable provision against such a transfer of the account of the North Dublin Board as has been suggested; and, if not, why the Local Government Board insist on dealing exclusively with the Bank of Ireland; and, since the Local Government Board have prevented the North Dublin Board of Guardians from obtaining money on good terms from the Munster and Leinster Bank, what does the Government propose to do to enable the Board to carry on its work for the relief of the poor?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is the fact that the Bank of Ireland, as treasurer of the North Dublin Union, declined to advance to the Guardians of that Union so large a sum as £4,000, but the Bank offered to allow them to overdraw their account to the amount of £2,000, and this offer the Guardians accepted on the 16th of January last. From the Guardians' minutes of proceedings on the 23rd of January it appears that the Munster and Leinster Bank offered to lend £4,000, free of interest, for three months, or until such time as moneys would come in, provided that the account of the Union was changed to that Bank. The Guardians did adopt a resolution to the effect that their account be changed to the Munster and Leinster Bank, but the Local Government Board declined to sanction such transfer, on the ground that a treasurer who refused to advance large sums of money to the Guardians could not thereby be deemed to have failed to comply with the Board's general regulations defining his duties as an officer of the Union. Besides, the Bank of Ireland during past years frequently allowed the Guardians of the North Dublin Union to overdraw their account, and in the present instance lent them a sum of £2,000, so that it could not fairly be contended that the action of the Bank towards the Guardians had been illiberal. The treasurer of a union is appointed under the 24th article of the Board's general regulations, and his tenure of office is governed by the 39th article of the same Order, which provides that every officer appointed to or holding any office under the Order shall, subject to the provisions of Article 40, continue to hold the same until he die, or resign, or be removed by the Local Government Board. It is not the practice of the Board to allow a treasurer to be removed from office unless reasonable and sufficient grounds can be assigned for dispensing with his services; and the fact that a bank acts in that capacity does not alter the position which the treasurer of the Union occupies under the Order referred to. The Guardians have recently received £3,137 in lieu of rates on Government property, as well as a considerable amount in respect of rates collected, and it appears that last week they had a sum of £2,553 to their credit at the foot of their treasurer's account, so that they do not now want funds for the relief of the poor.

Mr. SEXTON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware of the fact that the Bank of Ireland did advance money to the Guardians of the Dublin Union until the Union agreed to transfer their account to the Munster Bank; and whether the course pursued by the Bank of Ireland has not thrown grave inconvenience upon the ratepayers?

*Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: That is a Question of which notice must be given.

WELSH COUNTY COUNCILS.

Mr. THOMAS ELLIS (Merionethshire) asked the President of the Board of Trade how many members of the County Councils of Merioneth, Denbigh, Flint, and Chester respectively, will be entitled to elect on the Dee Conservancy Board, and how many the County Councils of Merioneth, Montgomery, Carnarvon, and Cardigan respectively on the Dovey Conservancy Board?

*Sir M. HICKS-BEACH: The County Councils named by the hon. Member will respectively appoint the same number of members as the Quarter Sessions have hitherto been entitled to appoint, the powers of the Quarter Sessions in this respect having been transferred to the County Councils. The Clerks of the Peace could state what the numbers are.

Mr. THOMAS ELLIS: The Councils themselves do not know the number they are entitled to elect, and in some cases the clerks of the parishes themselves are unable to give the necessary information.

*Sir M. HICKS-BEACH: I think that the application in this matter should be made to the Clerk of the Peace.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

IRELAND—COLONEL SAUNDERSON.

Mr. SEXTON asked the Secretary of State for War whether he had yet received from the Member for North Armagh (Colonel Sanderson) the names of the leading men in the Army upon whose authority the hon. and gallant Gentleman declared, in a recent speech at Portadown, that, in a certain event, they would refuse to do their duty in maintenance of the law; and whether he would communicate the correspondence to the House?

Mr. E. STANHOPE: No, Sir; I have not, nor do I propose to call upon my hon. and gallant Friend to furnish me with the names of the officers in question. From the only report of my hon. and gallant Friend's speech that I have seen, it appears that his words were incorrectly quoted by the hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool. But, be that as it may, I do not conceive it to be my duty to ask for the names of officers who may, in private conversation, have made use of loose and hasty expressions with regard to a hypothetical case. It will be time enough for me to take notice of them when they are publicly used by the officers themselves.

Mr. SEXTON: Is the House to understand that an officer in the British Army is entitled to pledge himself to violate his oath if he does it in private conversation? Has the right hon. Gentleman received any report of the hon. and gallant Gentleman's speech which the hon. and gallant Gentleman admits to be correct?

Mr. E. STANHOPE: My answer to both these Questions is, no. I have seen the report in the Irish Times.

CULLINANE THE INFORMER.

Mr. J. R. COX (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, whether he will undertake that an officer of the Government, to be named by him, will serve a subpoena, on the part of the Irish Members, on Cullinane, the informer, to appear before the Special Commission?

*Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: It would be convenient that all requests for assistance in connection with the inquiry pending before the Royal Commission should be made in the regular manner by the solicitors of those concerned, and not by way of Question across the floor of the House. As a matter of fact, the Irish Government are unacquainted with Cullinane's whereabouts.

MR. COX: To whom is our solicitor to apply?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Solicitors have already applied to the Government. It must be done in the usual way, by writing to the Irish Government.

MR. COX: Has Caron left the country since the opening of the Commission?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think so.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Will the right hon. Gentleman agree that, in the same way as reports of the evidence of Major Le Caron, the informer of the Government, were given to Mr. Houston, the secretary of the Loyal and Patriotic League, the reports of Cullinane's evidence shall be given to Mr. Schnadhorst, the secretary of the National Liberal Federation?

The Question was not answered?

MR. SEXTON: Is Cullinane now outside the jurisdiction of the Courts of the Queen; has he left this country since the Commission commenced, and where did he obtain funds to enable him to go away?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not the slightest knowledge on the subject.

SUBURBAN BURGLARIES.

MR. BIGWOOD (Middlesex, Brentford): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been called to the increase of burglaries in the suburban districts; and if any and, if so, what further means can be taken to deter attempts of this description?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Commissioners of Police that there has been no increase in the number of burglaries in the suburban districts during the last four months; on the contrary, there have been fewer than in the corresponding periods of 1887 and 1888. The police are using their best efforts to check this class of crime; but its effectual prevention depends as much on the vigilance and care of the householders themselves as on the efforts of the police.

ARTILLERY RE-ORGANIZATION.

LORD HENRY BRUCE (Wilts, Chippenham): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he intends to give effect to the proposals of Lord Harris' Artillery Committee, four members of which, including the Chairman, recommended the separation of the mounted from the dismounted branches of the Royal Regiment of Artillery?

MR. E. STANHOPE: It is difficult to state our proposals on this subject in answer to a Question, but full information will be given when the Army Estimates are brought in.

IRELAND—FATHER STEPHENS.

MR. GILL (Louth, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Rev. D. Stephens, of Falmarragh, was arrested more than a week ago on a charge of conspiracy; and whether bail was refused; and, if so, why it was refused?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that the facts are substantially as stated in the Question. Bail was refused by the Magistrates, in the exercise of their discretion.

MR. GILL: But why did the Magistrates refuse Father Stephens the ordinary privileges?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know on what ground they acted.

PALLISER GUNS.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War how many guns have been converted on the Palliser system; and what is the approximate gross weight of shot or shell which have been cast on the Palliser system?

MR. E. STANHOPE: If the hon. and gallant Gentleman will move for a Return, I will grant it.

THE BARROW DRAINAGE.

MR. W. A. MACDONALD (Queen's County, Ossory): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, whether he has received the copy of a resolution passed by what is described as a large and representative meeting of the people of Portarlinton, disapproving of a scheme proposed by the Government for the drainage of the Barrow by means of embankments, and advocating the adoption of the plan embodied in the Report of Lord Castletown's Commission, which recommended the widening and deepening of the bed of the river and the removal of obstructions; and whether, after this expression of local opinion, the Government still intend to persevere with their scheme?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes; and the proposals of the Government will be communicated to the memorialists. The hon. Member may be able to get information from the engineer, Mr. Gamble.

OFFICIAL DOCUMENTS.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Mr. H. Evans, the writer of the article in the Contemporary Review on "The London County Council and the Police," is Mr. H. K. Evans, one of the first-class clerks in the Receivers' Office; and, if he is the same gentleman, does he come within the Rule made in 1879, by which officers attached to a Department were precluded from publishing works relating to the Department without permission, and had he obtained the necessary permission?

MR. MATTHEWS: Mr. H. Evans was formerly employed in the Receivers' Office, but retired in June last, and therefore he is no longer amenable to the rules.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: Had he access to the official documents and to the statistics used in this House on the Metropolitan Police Vote last year by my hon. Friend the Member for Shoreditch?

MR. MATTHEWS: He had access to no official documents.

THE AGHABOY POST OFFICE.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has yet filled the recently vacated office of Sub-Postmaster of Aghaboy, county Monaghan; and, whether he will consult local feeling in the matter, and defer making the appointment until he can have the advantage of the opinion of the majority of the people of the district as to the claims and fitness of the person most acceptable to them for the office to guide him in making the appointment?

Mr. W. A. Macdonald

MR. RAIKES: The vacancy for a Sub-Postmaster at Aghaboy has not yet been officially reported to me. I can, therefore, only assure the hon. Member that, when it is so reported, I shall select for appointment the candidate whom I may ascertain to be best qualified to perform the duties of the office to the satisfaction of the Department and the public generally.

IRELAND—THE SPECIAL COMMISSION —THE CONVICT NALLY.

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Mayo, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many visits have been made by any person or persons on behalf of the Times to P. W. Nally, during his detention at Millbank Prison, from 20th November, 1888, to this date; did one or more of the visits take place in the presence and in the hearing of a warder or warders; at what dates were the visits made; has the application of a friend of P. W. Nally's family for a visit been refused, on the ground that the prisoner had forfeited his right to a visit by misconduct; what misconduct is alleged against P. W. Nally, and in what prison; was it at Millbank; what is the date of the report against him; will visits from persons acting on behalf of the Times to P. W. Nally, and other similarly circumstanced prisoners, continue to be permitted, regardless of the wishes or without the consent of such prisoners; and, are such visits counted against the very limited number of visits due to the prisoners?

MR. MATTHEWS: The prisoner Nally has received one visit. It was in view of a warder, but not in his hearing. It took place on the 4th of February last. A visit has been refused on the ground that the Prisons Board in Ireland reported that Nally had forfeited by misconduct the right to receive a visit at present. This report was communicated from Dublin Castle to the Home Office on the 18th of January. The misconduct did not take place at Millbank, but in Ireland, and was reported to the Governor of Downpatrick Prison on the 27th of November last. Prisoners are not and will not be compelled to receive these visits if they object. Such visits are not counted against the ordinary visits due to a prisoner.

MR. SEXTON: I wish to know whether before the visit is made the prisoner is warned and has an opportunity of objecting?

MR. MATTHEWS: The practice is to announce the visit to the prisoner, who then has an opportunity of objection.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: Was there any conversation in the hearing of the warder?

MR. MATTHEWS: No, Sir; the practice in English prisons is to have the warder in sight, but not within hearing distance.

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Governor of Downpatrick Prison in any way whatever gave P. W. Nally, being a prisoner in his charge, reason to think that if he, P. W. Nally, would give evidence before the Special Commission in support of the Times case, he should soon be released from prison; and, has P. W. Nally been reported for misconduct during his detention at Downpatrick Prison; if so, what was the misconduct, and the date of the report?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The General Prisons Board report that the allegation in the first paragraph is absolutely without foundation. The prisoner was reported for misconduct, which consisted of shouting in a loud and disorderly manner, and calculated to create a disturbance on the 19th of November last, when being conveyed to the railway station at Downpatrick. The report was made by the officer of the escort on the 27th of the same month, after his return from London.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to give notice that on the Prison Votes I will call attention to the persecution of this particular prisoner because he refused to make himself an informer for the Times.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Prison Commissioners, before giving permission to the agent of the Times to visit P. W. Nally in Millbank, secured the assent of the Secretary of State in this particular case; and, whether it is the rule of the Prison Commissioners to allow every solicitor who may choose to apply to visit any prisoner in Millbank; if not, what principle governed their assent in this instance; and I should also like to know whether permission to visit Nally has been refused to everyone excepting the agent to the Times?

MR. MATTHEWS: The permission which was refused to Nally was to receive a private visit coming under the ordinary prison rules, which he was not entitled to receive. In answer to the Question on the Paper, I have to say the assent of the Secretary of State was not asked for the visit referred to. It is the practice of the Commissioners to satisfy themselves that the applicant is a solicitor, and that the application is made bond fide for some stated business in which the prisoner is concerned, before they give their assent. They acted in accordance with this practice in the instance referred to. Nally had been brought over from Ireland under an order of the Special Commission issued at the instance of Mr. Soames, and the object of the interview sought by Mr. Soames was to take his proof.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle): Are we not to understand that the rule that the prisoner is entitled to receive a visit from a solicitor in a matter in which he is concerned means "concerned in his own defence;" and in what sense was Nally concerned with the Commission and the Times?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have made inquiries to-day on that very point, and I am informed that the practice has not been confined to cases in which the solicitor interviewing the prisoner was acting in his defence. I think, however, it is a matter worthy of consideration. There is a good deal to be said on both sides—whether the privilege of a visit not in the hearing of a warder may not properly be confined to cases in which what passes between the prisoner and his visitor would be privileged from being in evidence in a Court of Law. Nally was concerned in this visit, inasmuch as he was under the orders of the Court to give evidence. The person calling a witness before a Court of Justice invariably obtains beforehand information of what the witness is about to say—in other words, he takes his proof.

MR. J. MORLEY: Is there any means of ascertaining whether it is true that the agent of the Times on his visit, produced a letter purporting to be written by Nally's brother?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have made inquiries on this subject, and the information given to me is that the warder saw no letter produced.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): At what date did the practice first commence of the Prison Commissioners allowing solicitors in a hostile position to foist themselves on prisoners without those prisoners' wish or assent?

MR. MATTHEWS: The right hon. Gentleman is importing into my answer what I never said. If the prisoner objects, he is not compelled to receive the visit.

SIR W. HARCOURT: What opportunity had this particular prisoner accorded to him of objecting?

MR. MATTHEWS: He had the opportunity afforded him by the announcement of the visit?

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask whether the announcement that the Times' case would close on Tuesday was known to the right hon. Gentleman before he made the announcement that the rule was to be changed; and whether that altered rule is to be applied to the "defence" of hon. Members of this House?

MR. MATTHEWS: I know nothing about the closing of the Times' case, and I have not made any announcement that the rule would be altered.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton): I should like to ask how the right hon. Gentleman himself construes the rule that any solicitor is entitled to visit a prisoner.

MR. MATTHEWS: There is no "rule" on the subject. I have said so more than once. It has been the practice of the Prison Commissioners for many years. That practice, although it is liable to abuse, does not appear to me to be in itself objectionable.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Will the right hon. Gentleman inquire if, when Nally was informed that the representative of the Times intended to visit him, he was also informed that he might, if he wished, refuse to see the visitor?

MR. MATTHEWS: Certainly.

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN: Will Nally be afforded an opportunity of proving that attempts were made to tamper with him by the Governor of Downpatrick Prison since it has been denied?

MR. MATTHEWS: When Nally appears before the Special Commission those questions can be put to him in cross-examination.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Attorney General whether he intends to call Nally?

The Question was not answered.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT—PROSECUTIONS IN LIMERICK.

MR. O'KEEFFE: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer the cost incurred by this country on account of recent prosecutions at Ballyneety and Castleconnell, County Limerick, under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, particularizing the expenditure, as follows: the amount paid to special magistrates and police at the meetings in the first instance; the amount paid to the Law Officers who advised the prosecutions; the amount paid to policemen who came to London to serve the summonses; the amount paid to Resident Magistrates, Crown Counsel, shorthand writers, police, soldiers, and cavalry who attended the Courts until convictions were obtained?

*MR. GOSCHEN: The information asked for would require a vast amount of labour before it could be prepared, even if it could possibly be prepared. Under the circumstances I cannot give the hon. Member the information.

MR. O'KEEFFE: Then I will refer to the matter on the Estimates.

THE BAYONET CONTRACT.

MR. KENRICK (Birmingham, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what progress had been made by Messrs. Wilkinson in the delivery of bayonets under their contract; whether the time specified for the completion of the contract for 150,000 bayonets was three years from the date of signing the same; and whether Government would insist on this condition being strictly observed?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I explained on the 6th of December last that Messrs. Wilkinson's work was retarded by changes of pattern and delay in the supply of gauges. They have already supplied 21,288 blades, and the condition which will be insisted on is that 1,000 sword bayonets, on the average, shall be supplied weekly.

DOVEY FISHERY BOARD.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS (Merionethshire): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to a resolution unanimously passed at a meeting of the Dovey Fishery Board in June last, in favour of amending the bye-laws so as to extend the time for net-fishing within the district of their jurisdiction by a fortnight; whether he is aware that, at the meeting of the Board held on the 22nd February, it was announced that Mr. Berrington, Chief Inspector of Fisheries, had, in an interview with the fishermen on 3rd January, expressed a decided opinion that the Board of Trade would not grant the extension of time, and that it was urged that, as the decision of the Board of Trade was almost a foregone conclusion, it would be throwing money away to go through the necessary forms of applying for sanction; and whether it is a fact that the Board of Trade is opposed to such an extension of time for net-fishing; and, if so, why?

*SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: In reply to the first paragraph in the Question, I have to say that my attention has not been called to any such resolution. Mr. Berrington would have no authority to express any opinion on the part of the Board of Trade, and assures me that he did not do so. Mr. Berrington was interviewed by some fishermen at Machynlleth Railway Station on the 3rd January last, and promised to report their views to his Department in the event of any bye-law being sent in for confirmation. In reply to questions he declined to say what view the Board of Trade might take, adding that the proposal would receive full consideration. In answer to one or two of the deputation he advised not being too sanguine of success, looking to the possibilities of opposition from various interests. The Board of Trade will be quite prepared to deal with any question upon its merits.

GRAND JURY PANELS.

MR. O'KEEFFE (Limerick): I beg to ask the Solicitor General for Ireland, having regard to the persistent exclusion of Roman Catholics and large land occupiers, duly qualified, from grand juries at present assizes in Ireland, as particularly exemplified by the constitution of the counties Clare and Limerick Grand Juries, if he will consider the advisability of devising a means to intimate to the High Sheriffs the Government's disapproval of such selections?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As I have already pointed out in answer to a former Question, the Government have no power whatever to interfere with the discharge by a High Sheriff of his duty in summoning a Grand Jury. If he is guilty of any illegality the matter can be brought before a Judge of Assize, who has power to fine him for any breach of duty. The Government have in no case the power.

LICENSING AUTHORITIES.

SIR WILLIAM HOULDSWORTH (Manchester, N.W.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if the Government has any intention this Session of introducing proposals for transferring the licensing of public-houses from a nominated to an elected body?

IRELAND—MR. J. FITZGIBBON.

MR. HAYDEN (Leitrim S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is the practice in Ireland, as has been stated to be the case in England, to accede to the application of a solicitor to see a prisoner even though no application should have been received from the prisoner himself; and, whether, if so, he will state the grounds on which the application of Mr. Farrell M'Dormell, solicitor, Roscommon, on the 22nd December last, to see his client, Mr. John Fitzgibbon, in Castlebar Prison, was refused, Mr. Fitzgibbon himself not having made any application, as he had no means of knowing anything about legal matters affecting him which were occurring during his imprisonment?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The General Prisons Board report that the practice in Ireland is that when a prisoner makes the application to see a solicitor on bona fide legal business the visit is permitted; also, if the prisoner's solicitor seeks to see the prisoner in regard tion given to me is that the warder saw no letter produced.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): At what date did the practice first commence of the Prison Commissioners allowing solicitors in a hostile position to foist themselves on prisoners without those prisoners' wish or assent?

MR. MATTHEWS: The right hon. Gentleman is importing into my answer what I never said. If the prisoner objects, he is not compelled to receive the visit.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): No, Sir.

IRELAND—MR. J. FITZGIBBON.

MR. HAYDEN (Leitrim S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is the practice in Ireland, as has been stated to be the case in England, to accede to the application of a solicitor to see a prisoner even though no application should have been received from the prisoner himself; and, whether, if so, he will state the grounds on which the application of Mr. Farrall M'Dormell, solicitor, Roscommon, on the 22nd December last, to see his client, Mr. John Fitzgibbon, in Castlebar Prison, was refused, Mr. Fitzgibbon himself not having made any application, as he had no means of knowing anything about legal matters affecting him which were occurring during his imprisonment?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The General Prisons Board report that the practice in Ireland is that when a prisoner makes the application to see a solicitor on bond fide legal business the visit is permitted; also, if the prisoner's solicitor seeks to see the prisoner in regard to bond fide pending legal proceedings for or against the prisoner the visit is permitted, provided the prisoner is willing to see the solicitor. In this case it was reported by the Governor that the prisoner Fitzgibbon was asked whether he wished to see Mr. Farrell M'Donnell, solicitor, on business. His reply was that he had "no legal business to transact with anyone," and the Governor reports that he informed the solicitor accordingly.

THE STORNOWAY TRIALS.

DR. M'DONALD (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to a recent criminal trial at Stornoway, against Mr. Donald MacRae, schoolmaster, of Balallan, and others, for the expulsion of intruders from a meeting of the Highland Land League, after notice had been given to the said intruders to retire; whether the Sheriff dismissed the complaint as unfounded, and characterized the alleged offence as unknown to the law of Scotland; whether the Procurator Fiscal, or his deputy, at whose instance the complaint was raised, are agents for Lady Matheson, the proprietrix of the island; whether, in view of the fact that the complaint was instituted either from ignorance of the law or otherwise, any notice has been taken of the conduct of the Procurator Fiscal or his deputy; and, whether, as the machinery of the Criminal Court has been improperly set in motion, it is intended to make any compensation or redress to Mr. MacRae and the other defendants?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I must ask the hon. Member to repeat the Question, as there has not been time to make the necessary inquiries.

HAMPTON COURT GARDENS.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND (Middlesex, Uxbridge): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works if it is a fact that Richard Holland, a man of good character, and appointed by the First Commissioner of Works as foreman in Hampton Court Gardens, has been deprived of the pension he was entitled to under the system in force when he entered the service 36 years ago; whether he is aware that Richard Holland after such long service, and relying on such pension, is now penniless and depending on public charity; what is the cause of the inequality which exists in still giving park and gate keepers pensions, whilst the foreman, who is their superior officer, and requires an amount of technical knowledge, is, from no fault of his own, deprived of one; and whether it is a fact that had Richard Holland retired a year ago he would have been entitled to a pension of at least £20 per annum; and, if so, whether he is prepared to take any and what steps to rectify a manifest injustice?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): The foremen in the Royal Parks have never been legally entitled to pensions, as they do not hold Civil Service certificates. In practice they have, as a rule, received pensions under the title of compassionate allowances; and, if Foreman Holland had retired before 1887 he might no doubt have been awarded such an allowance; but the power of the Treasury to grant these compassionate allowances was taken away by the Superannuation Act of 1887, and consequently Holland was awarded only a gratuity. Park and gate keepers are entitled to superannuation because they are appointed with Civil Service certificates.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND: Can the right hon. Gentleman do anything in this very sad case?

MR. PLUNKET: I am not officially aware of the circumstances, but I am afraid it is a case in which it would be very difficult to get over the Rules.

IRELAND—THE SPECIAL COMMISSION.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland can he give a Return of the names, rank, and pay of the Irish officials absent from duty in Ireland to attend the Special Commission, distinguishing the examined and the dates of the examinations from those not called, with the period and dates of their stay in London, and stating in each case if any steps were taken to ascertain approximately when such witnesses would be called, so that the public service might not be dislocated by a prolonged or unnecessary absence?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have more than once stated to the House that I do not think it advisable to print any such

Mr. A. J. Balfour

Return, at any rate until the labours of the Commission are concluded. I repeat that the Government of Ireland have done their very best to diminish the inconvenience caused by keeping the witnesses in London so long, in obedience to an order of the Court.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will ascertain by whose instructions Head Constable Preston visited in Millbank certain Irish prisoners; what were the dates and objects of his visits; was it at the request of the prisoners; and what duty was Preston doing in England?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Head Constable Preston visited Thomas Tracy in Millbank on December 5, 1888, and January 24, 1889. He did not visit any other prisoner. He did not visit Tracy by orders of anyone. He obtained an order to do so through Mr. Soames. The object of his visit was to ascertain by whom Tracy had been tampered with. It was at the request of the prisoner that he visited him. Head Constable Preston was not doing duty in England. He has been here on subpoena as a witness before the Special Commission.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Has the attention of the right hon. Gentleman been called to the fact that it was sworn by one informer that Head Constable Preston communicated with him in Canada and brought him to Mr. Soames's office in London?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not see what connection that has with the matter.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.): Is it alleged the witness was not tampered with?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I gather that the tampering has not been on the part of the police.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department was it by subpoena, or habeas corpus, or under the Prisons Act, that Irish prisoners were brought over to England for the Times Commission; and was Delaney produced in Court without a subpoena ad testificandum; and, if so, is there any power or precedent for a gaoler producing a prisoner in his custody on a mere subpoena addressed to a prisoner while that prisoner is, by reason of his imprisonment, debarred from obeying or incurring penalties for disobedience thereto?

MR. MATTHEWS: The Special Commission have issued summonses and addressed orders to the governors of Irish prisons to bring over to England prisoners confined in Irish prisons, for the purpose of giving evidence before the Commission. By 51 and 52 Vic., c. 35, s. 2, these summonses are equivalent to any form of process, capable of being issued in any action for enforcing the attendance of witnesses. Delaney was produced before the Special Commission under such a summons and order. I may refer the hon. Member to 44 Geo. III., c. 102.

IRELAND—IMPRISONMENT OF FATHER CLARKE.

MR. WILLIAM CORBET: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland is it true, as stated in the public Press, that the Rev. Father Clarke, of Avoca, now undergoing sentence of six weeks' imprisonment in Wexford Gaol for a speech made by him at a public meeting, has been put on bread and water for two terms of 24 hours each; and if he can state why such punishment has been inflicted on the reverend gentleman, and by what authority?

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether Rev. J. Clarke, C.C., now a prisoner in Wexford Gaol, has been ordered to pick oakum in his cell, and to associate with criminals at exercise, and has been sentenced by the prison officials to two terms of 24 hours each on bread and water; whether these proceedings are sanctioned by the Government; and whether it is determined that ecclesiastics, though not called upon to wear the prison clothes, are to be required to pick oakum and to associate with criminals?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The General Prisons Board report that the Rev. J. Clarke was, in accordance with the prison rules, assigned the task of picking oakum, but that neither he nor any other prisoner is permitted to associate with other convicted prisoners. He was ordered by the governor to be placed on punishment diet as indicated in the Question, by reason of his neglect to perform the task assigned. The proceedgrounds the Irish Prisons Board refused the application made on his behalf to have an interview with his solicitor without the presence of a warder, though officers of the Constabulary were allowed to visit him alone; whether directions have been given to the authorities at Millbank Prison to supply him with dinners, drink, and newspapers, same as were provided him in Belfast Gaol at the expense of the police authorities there; and, whether, considering the serious nature of the allegations made by Tracy as to threats and promises of reward held out to him by the police officers who visited him at Belfast, in the event of his refusing or consenting to swear as instructed at the Special Commission, he will grant an independent inquiry into all the circumstances in connection with these visits, and as to the communications made to him by the police at and since his removal from Oastlebar Gaol?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As to the first and third paragraphs I have not been able to get the information. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will address the Question in the second paragraph to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary.

MR. M'CARTAN: When will the right hon. Gentleman have the information?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I suppose tomorrow. It may be necessary to make local inquiry.

MR. MATTHEWS: No drink or newspapers are supplied to Tracy. He is on a scale of prison diet, prepared by the Prisons Board, corresponding as nearly as possible with the dietary of Irish prisons, which is more liberal than the English dietary.

MR. M'CARTAN: Is this in consequence of a certain statement made by him?

MR. MATTHEWS: No; it is not in consequence of anything he said or did. A dietary was introduced to assimilate the food to that given to Irish prisoners when in Irish prisons.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland how long Captain Plunkett and Mr. Stack have been in London during the sitting of the Parnell Commission; and whether he is in a position to state that none of the divisional or resident magistrates have communicated in Ireland or in England with witnesses to be called by the Times newspaper, and that such magistrates have held no communication with the agents and counsel for that newspaper, except in regard to the evidence to be given by themselves?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand that Captains Plunkett and Stack were detained in London for 54 and 60 days respectively. I have no grounds for thinking that any communications of the kind to which the right hon. Gentleman seems to object have been held by Irish magistrates. I conceive, however, that it would be the plain duty of any person, whether a magistrate or not, to do what he legitimately could to elucidate the truth concerning any question bearing on the investigation now going on before the Commission, about which he either had special knowledge or knew where to obtain such.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Do I understand the answer of the right hon. Gentleman to be that he is to communicate that knowledge to the Government or to the Times newspaper?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I laid down on Tuesday last the general principle which I thought ought to regulate the action of the Government in this matter. I have nothing to add to what I then said.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is in a position to state that none of the Royal Irish Constabulary have been employed to collect evidence, to see or to watch witnesses, or pay money to, or to take proofs of witnesses for the Times newspaper before the Parnell Commission; and whether he is in a position to state that none of the Irish Constabulary have been detained in London since the commencement of the Commission for any longer period than was necessary to give their evidence, and that they had been employed on no services connected with the case of the Times newspaper except such as were directly necessary for the giving of their own evidence upon their subpoenas?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand that the Royal Irish Constabulary have not been employed in collecting evidence except in relation to the evidence they were prepared to give before the Special Commission, nor have they paid money or taken proofs of witnesses. I believe they have, in certain cases, kept an eye on witnesses when there was ground for thinking that they might be molested or tampered with.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the last part of the Question.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that none of the Irish Constabulary have been detained for any longer time than was necessary, nor have they been employed on services connected with the Times newspaper. But I am not sure that that is quite correct. At any rate, they have undoubtedly kept some kind of watch upon witnesses.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I beg to give notice that I shall put a further Question, founded on specific instances sworn to before the Commission.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I should like to know whether constables have in no case taken proofs or got up evidence for the Times?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand that they have not taken proofs.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Has the right hon. Gentleman communicated with a constable named Irwin, or his superiors, or with Preston, and will he say how Preston came to be in communication with Coleman, and how Mr. Soames came to be in possession of Coleman's letters?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I never heard of Coleman.

IRON AND COPPER TELEGRAPH WIRES.

MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he still proposes to replace the present iron telegraph wires by copper wires; and, if so, when?

MR. RAIKES: So long as the difference in the price between copper and iron wire is so large, the Post Office, in erecting new wires, must make use of iron. There has been no intention of generally replacing iron wire by copper.

AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS ACT—THE LAMBCOTE TENANT RIGHT CASE.

MR. WALTER M'LAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): I beg to ask Mr. Attorney General whether his attention has been called to the Lambcote Grange Tenant Right Case, recently decided by Judge

Bristowe in the Doncaster County Court, under the Agricultural Holdings Act; whether the tenant, Mr. Fawcett, entered into possession in 1880, and paid the outgoing tenant £1,500 for the tenant right, in the usual way, according to the custom; whether he received an assurance from the landlord that there was no mortgage on the farm; whether, in 1887, he gave notice to leave the farm, and, on a valuation being made under the Agricultural Holdings Act, the sum assessed as due to Mr. Fawcett was £1,018; whether the farm proved to have been mortgaged in 1874, and the mortgagees stepped in, took possession of the farm, growing crops, manure, corn stacks, and everything belonging to the tenant, and turned him out without any compensation at all, either under the Agricultural Holdings Act or of any kind whatever; whether Judge Bristowe ultimately ruled that the mortgagees were acting within their rights, and that Mr. Fawcett had no claim to the tenant right he had bought owing to the mortgage being in existence before his tenancy began; whether both parties now admit that this ruling is quite in accordance with the law; and, whether, inasmuch as under these circumstances the security of a vast number of tenants under the Agricultural Holdings Act is practically destroyed, he will bring in a Bill to remedy this injustice, and render the tenants' just claims secure by making them a first charge on the land he occupies?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I have communicated with the learned County Court Judge. I believe that the facts are correctly stated in the hon. Member's Question, except as to the third paragraph, as to which I have no information. The fact therein referred to was not material to the case raised before the learned County Court Judge, as the sole question was whether a relation of landlord and tenant had been created between the tenant and the mortgagees, and the learned Judge, upon the evidence, held that it had not. I am informed that the petitioner, Mr. Fawcett, has been advised by eminent counsel that the decision of the learned Judge is right. I cannot undertake to bring in a Bill upon the matter, as the case depended upon its special facts, and the hardship upon the tenant was due to the circumstances under which he had entered upon the tenancy.

PUBLIC PROCEEDINGS IN WELSH.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS (Merionethshire): I beg to ask Mr. Attorney General whether he is aware that Coroners and Official Receivers in bankruptcy in Welsh-speaking districts carry on their proceedings in Welsh, notwithstanding the pain of forfeiture of office enacted in the Statute of Wales; and, whether he will introduce a Bill to repeal or modify the Section of the Statute thus rendered obsolete?

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER: I am not aware of what is the practice of Coroners, or Official Receivers in Bankruptcy, but upon the information before me I doubt whether there is any necessity for an amendment of the law in this matter.

MR. T. ELLIS: I desire to know whether members of representative bodies, or Coroners and other officials in Welsh speaking districts, cannot carry on proceedings in the language of the district, not merely as a matter of courtesy, but as a matter of right.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER: I think the hon. Gentleman had better put his Question on the paper.

MR. G. O. MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): Would not such persons so acting be liable to very severe penalties?

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER: I doubt whether any of these persons could become liable to a penalty.

MR. G. O. MORGAN: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the fact that the provisions of the 20th Section of the 27th Henry VIII., c. 26, that—

“No person or persons that used the Welsh speech or language shall have or enjoy any manor, office, or fees within the King's dominions upon pain of forfeiting the same offices and fees, unless he or they use and exercise the English speech or language,” are admittedly obsolete, he will take steps to have this antiquated enactment repealed?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think if the right hon. Gentleman will refer to 50 and 51 Vic., c. 59, he will find that the Section of 27th Henry VIII., c. 26, to which he takes exception, is already repealed.

Sir Richard Webster

IRELAND—THE SPECIAL COMMISSION.

*MR. SPEAKER called upon Mr. Summers, in whose name Question No. 61 stood.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I wish to postpone this Question.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER: Why? I think I can claim that the Question shall be put.

MR. SUMMERS: Then I put it.

[The Question was as follows:—To ask Mr. Attorney General whether he is correctly reported as having said, on 16th July, 1888, with reference to the case of O'Donnell v. Walter and another—

“I have received not the slightest communication from the Government of any sort or kind, direct or indirect, in order to assist me in the performance of my duties as counsel for the defendants;”

and, whether he is able to give the House a similar assurance with regard to the proceedings before the Parnell Commission Court?]

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER: The quotation of my words of the 16th of July last is, I think, correct. When I was instructed to act for the Times after the Commission Bill was passed, and from that date to the present, Mr. Soames has, from time to time at my request, applied to the officials both in Ireland and England for information as to specific facts and persons bearing upon the charges and allegations. Mr. Soames has communicated to me the result of such applications, which I have used for the purposes of the Commission. I desire to add that Mr. Soames, on the 14th of February, 1889, stated in examination-in-chief that he was prepared to give the Court every information as to the source from which and the way in which he had obtained the evidence laid before the Court, and that no question whatever was put to him in cross-examination by any of the learned counsel, excepting in connection with the unfortunate man Pigott.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is it not the case that when I attempted to cross-examine Mr. Soames on this point I was immediately stopped by the Court?

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER: I think the hon. and learned Gentleman was treated by the Court with great courtesy; but I recollect that when the hon. and learned Gentleman wished to ask a question, he was requested to state on what point of relevance he proposed to ask it, and, not being able to say, he did not put it.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg leave to say that my recollection does not accord with that of the hon. and learned Gentleman, and I was not treated with courtesy by the Court.

CIVIL ESTABLISHMENTS.

MR. JOHN KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the legislation referred to in Her Most Gracious Majesty's Speech in respect of the Report of the Royal Commission on Civil Establishments will cover the whole question of civil establishments or deal only with the question of superannuation?

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is now in a position to state when the legislation referred to in the Royal Speech in respect to the Report of the Royal Commission on Civil Establishments will be submitted to the House?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I hope to lay on the table very shortly a Bill dealing with that part of the report of the Royal Commission on Civil Establishments which relates to pensions, and I propose also shortly to lay on the table a Minute of the Treasury stating our views upon the questions of organization which have received the consideration of the Commissions.

IRELAND—CASEY AND KELLIHER.

MR. T. HARRINGTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is true that at the Killarney Petty Sessions, held on Tuesday, 26th February, two young men of the peasant class were sentenced by Mr. A. J. M'Dermot, R.M., and Captain Massey, R.M., to find bail each in £40 and two sureties of £20 each, or to be imprisoned for six months and kept to hard labour, for being among a group of persons who cheered for Mr. William O'Brien; whether these young men are now in prison and undergoing hard labour; whether there is any precedent for sentencing a prisoner to hard labour in default of bail; and whether it is true that, in the case of one of these prisoners at east, the policeman who brought the charge swore that he did not hear the accused cheer, but saw him among the crowd that had cheered?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Two men, named Casey and Kelliher, were tried under the ordinary law before a Bench of Magistrates on which, in addition to the two Resident Magistrates named in the Question, there were two other Magistrates belonging to the district. They were tried for booing and abusing the constabulary under circumstances which made the charge a serious one. They were bound to be of good behaviour for six months or in default to be imprisoned, though not with hard labour, as is alleged in the Question. One of them was at once bailed out; the other was bailed out on the 1st inst.

"PARNELLISM AND CRIME."

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, whom I can ask without offence, as to the circulation of false, foul, infamous libels contained in "Parnellism and Crime" through an agency I will not mention. [Cries of "Order, order," and interruption.] By way of personal explanation, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that these libels were on sale on the day after I asked my Question last week ["Order, order"], and I do not consider it a private and personal matter. ["Order, order."]

No answer was returned to the Question.

THE IMPRISONMENT OF DR. TANNER.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I wish to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, if it is true that Dr. Tanner, M.P., on the night of his arrest was obliged to sit in a chair all night, as no bed had been provided for him by the authorities at Scotland Yard?

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.): Before the right hon Gentleman answers that Question, perhaps he will be kind enough to inform the House whether every arrangement was not made at Scotland Yard for the comfort of Dr. Tanner, and whether he was not supplied with cigars, whisky and water, and other refreshments?

MR. MATTHEWS: There is no bed at Scotland Yard, and accordingly an armchair in the Inspector's room was placed at the disposal of the hon. Member for Mid-Cork. In the ordinary course the hon. Gentleman would have been lodged for the night in the cells in King Street Police Station; but the police authorities, with the intention of showing the hon. Member every consideration, brought him to Scotland Yard and administered as far as possible to his comfort. If my hon. and gallant Friend wishes particulars, Dr. Tanner was supplied with sandwiches, whisky, and cigars. I understand that Dr. Tanner acknowledged the courtesy which was shown him.

MR. W. REDMOND: Arising out of his answer, I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he agrees with the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh that whisky and cigars are a sufficient substitute for a bed?

THE MORPETH SHOOTING CASE.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I wish to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the following:—"Sheffield, March 4.—John Hardwick and a man named Coalman were sentenced to penal servitude in 1879 for shooting a farmer and his son near Morpeth. The real culprits confessed, and Hardwick and Coalman were released on a ticket-of-leave;" and why these men were not "pardoned?"

MR. MATTHEWS: I presume the hon. Member refers to the case of Hardwicke and Walford, who were released on licence in 1882. The then Secretary of State decided that while there was sufficient doubt as to the guilt of the prisoners to make it impossible to keep them in prison, it would not be right, in view of the extraordinary conflict of evidence in the case, to grant them a free pardon. This decision was reviewed and confirmed by the two succeeding Secretaries of State. I have also most carefully examined the whole of the facts, and find it impossible to come to any other conclusion than that arrived at by my three predecessors.

MR. W. REDMOND: Is it not the fact that the real culprit confessed, and if it is, why were these men not pardoned?

MR. MATTHEWS: The facts are not as the hon. Gentleman says.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I believe it would be convenient to the right hon. Gentleman and the House if he would state what are the views of the Government with regard to the future business of the House.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for giving me an opportunity of stating the course which we recommend for the conduct of business during the next fortnight. The right hon. Gentleman and the House are aware that we are under a necessity of obtaining Votes for the Army, Navy, and Civil Service, Supplementary Votes for the present year, and the excess Votes, in time to get a Bill passed the Houses of Parliament by the 28th or 29th of March. It is our intention, therefore, to ask the House to listen to the statements of the First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord G. Hamilton) and the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) with reference to the proposals of the Government for strengthening the Navy. I do not ask the House to come to any decision or to express any judgment at once on these proposals. It would not be reasonable or fair to ask the House to do so. It would be also unreasonable and unfair that the Government should ask the House to vote on the proposals until the Navy Estimates are considered. I would suggest, therefore, that when the statements have been made by my right hon. Friends, and questions in elucidation of their statements have been answered, it would be for the convenience of the House and the progress of business that we should at once report progress on the Resolution without taking any division until the Navy Estimates are considered. In that case we should propose to take the Supplementary Estimates to-night. On Monday next we shall ask the House to give us the first Vote for the Navy. On Monday week we shall ask for a Vote on Account, and take the Excess Votes, if there should be any, reported from the Committee on Public Accounts. Hon. Gentlemen are aware that we must have the Votes to which I have referred before the end of the financial year; otherwise we should have to ask the House for a Supplementary Vote. To-morrow I propose to ask the House to pass a Resolution with regard to the arrangements indicated last Session for providing practically two days in the week for the consideration of Supply. I trust that the House will accept that proposal as one intended to remedy some inconvenience.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I will not express any opinion on the last point, as I hope my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian will be here to-morrow, and say something upon it. I understand that the Vote on Account will be taken on Monday week.

MR. H. FOWLER: I would like to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been called to one item in the Supplementary Estimates, namely, the large increase on the Pension Vote. There is an addition upon the Vote of something like £8,000, and no names are given of persons who are to receive the extra grants. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not proceed with the Vote to-night.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy): I should like to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he is aware that the Supplementary Estimates were only circulated this morning, and whether, therefore, he thinks it fair to take them to-night?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. Gentleman is aware that it is not in our power to circulate them before the debate on the Address is ended. The information which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. H. H. Fowler) desires is never given, as I understand, on the Supplementary Estimates, but I shall be exceedingly happy to satisfy him on the subject.

MR. DUFF (Banffshire): Are we to understand that the right hon. Gentleman asks the House to give up the right of general discussion on going into the Estimates?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I did not ask the House to give up any right, but what I stated implied that the prolongation of the discussion on the Address has forced us into a corner, and as the hon. Gentleman himself is aware, there is no alternative but to ask the House to give us a Vote.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Does the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury notice that the Attorney General has put down on the paper a Bill of a most obnoxious character to a large part of the House—I refer to the Criminal Evidence Bill. Will he give us an assurance that, unless that Bill appears as a First Order on the Paper, there will be no attempt to snap a Second Reading? Will he promise that a measure of such importance will be made the First Order before being taken?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Ample notice will be given of the date on which it is intended to take the Second Reading of this Bill.

LORD C. BERESFORD (Marylebone, E): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury how many days the House will have between the date when the Government intend to lay the Navy Estimates before the House, and the time when the Government must get the money? Many hon. Members who feel strongly on certain questions have, on previous occasions, been obliged to curtail their observations, or not make them at all, through unwillingness to hamper the Government or prevent them from getting the money by a certain date. I wish to know if we are to have an opportunity of discussing the Wages Vote, on which I have two very important points to raise?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am afraid I cannot give many days for the discussion of the Wages Vote. Unless the money is obtained before the 18th or 19th of March, as the noble Lord is aware, the wages of the men will not be paid on the 1st of April. The prolongation of the Debate on the Address has left the Government no more time than stated to the House. If the House desires longer consideration for the Estimates before the end of the Financial year, the only result will be that we shall be compelled to ask for more of the time now belonging to Private Members, much as I wish to avoid such a request. But I assure my noble Friend that ample opportunity will be given to hon. Members to raise any question relating either to the Naval and Military Services or the Civil Service.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to give notice that on the Vote on Account I shall oppose it generally and particularly, having no sort of confidence in Her Majesty's present Government.

with good construction. Her Majesty's Government determined to adopt that principle, and our new shipbuilding programme is based upon it. Undoubtedly it is an advance—at least I think I may say it is a departure from the principle on which, or the methods by which preceding shipbuilding programmes have been calculated. It is frequently maintained in certain quarters that the Army and Navy expenditure of the country should be regulated by the opinions of experts whose services are at the disposal of the Government. That is a doctrine in which Her Majesty's Government cannot acquiesce. The Executive Government of this country are entrusted with the duty of managing the whole of the policy of the country, and one essential portion of the responsibility of the Executive Government is the making of the needful provision for our naval and military requirements. The responsibility of initiating increase of expenditure upon those services must rest upon the Government, and upon the Government alone. I do not believe it would be possible, and certainly it would be most improper for any Government to attempt to shirk that responsibility by endeavouring to shelter themselves behind the opinion of their professional advisers. But when the principle of future expenditure has been settled, it is clearly the duty of the Government to take the advice of their professional officers, in order that the increase of expenditure may be so formulated as to be of the utmost use in increasing the efficiency of the services to which it is to be appropriated. Therefore, so soon as we had settled the principle on which the shipbuilding policy was to be based directions were given to our naval advisers that they were to prepare, in accordance with the principles laid down, some scheme of shipbuilding. Since then a good deal has happened; but the scheme which was then drawn out on the foundation I have mentioned is in many respects practically the scheme which I am about to lay before the House. In the interval Her Majesty's Government have given their constant attention to this question and in many particulars, and in some important items, the scheme has been modified during the past six or eight months. And, Sir, before I leave this part of the subject I should like to acknowledge publicly the very great assistance which we have received from our naval advisers in the preparation and elaboration of the scheme I am about to unfold. The first and foremost of these advisers is Admiral Sir Arthur Hood, whose immense technical knowledge, calm judgment, and intuitive administrative capacity have not only in this instance, but ever since I had the honour to be associated with him, been of enormous benefit to the Naval Service. It is rather a curious coincidence that there was another body, quite independent of Her Majesty's Ministers, considering the principles upon which the shipbuilding programme should be based. Last year the House appointed a Select Committee, over which the right hon. Member for the Stirling Burghs has presided with his characteristic common sense, impartiality, and ability. That Committee was composed of men of every section of political opinion in this House. We differed on a good many matters, but there was a proposition to which that Committee gave a unanimous assent, and it was to this effect—that any new shipbuilding programme should be based upon a full survey and knowledge of the whole requirements of the Naval Service of the country. That decision, or rather that recommendation of the Select Committee, was arrived at some months after the decision of the Government, and it is a curious coincidence, because it shows that so far from this increase of naval expenditure which we advocate being necessarily associated, as some think it is, with the traditions, training, and predilections of the Tory Party, we have indisputable evidence to the contrary, a body of men specially appointed to consider questions of naval expenditure and temporarily dissociated from their political prejudices having arrived at identically the same conclusions as Her Majesty's Government. I should like to lay before the House some considerations which influenced us in arriving at the conclusion that an increase of naval strength was necessary. Our commerce has greatly increased during the past few years, and it will continue to increase, but the mere development of our commerce is not in my judgment a conclusive argument for a proportionate increase in naval expenditure. The examination of a few figures will show that the increase in tonnage is greatly due to the enlargement of the size of vessels rather than to an increase in their number. This increased tonnage therefore means increased strength and greater steaming power; and it therefore follows that every year a large proportion of our mercantile marine has become more and more capable of taking care of itself, and of evading hostile depredation. So much is this the case that the actual amount of new tonnage added to the English mercantile marine during the past ten years is very nearly equal to the total of the steam tonnage of the rest of the world. While submitting, therefore, the magnitude of the interests we have to protect is one factor in the calculation, that which should primarily govern us in considering the strength of naval establishments is the amount of force which is available to attack or injure our commercial interests. In Her Majesty's gracious Speech allusion is made to the fact that there has been in recent years unceasing expenditure on naval armaments by European nations. It is quite true that this is not altogether applicable to the last two or three years with regard to the leading Naval Powers of Europe; but, taking the last 15 years and dividing them into quinquennial periods, it is found that each five years show an increase on the previous five years. This is true of every European nation that has any considerable seaboard. It must always be remembered that naval expenditure differs in this respect from military expenditure—that the actual returns are not available so soon. If any one wants to examine into a Naval Budget, he must not merely have regard to the expenditure in any one particular year as conclusive proof that in that year no addition was made to that particular Navy; he must go behind this to the expenditure of some of the years before, and this will not infrequently disclose the fact that in a year when the expenditure has apparently fallen there has been the greatest increase of naval force, owing to ships, the expense of which has been met in previous years, being completed in this year. In this very year, when to the mere naval statistician the naval expenditure appeared to be lowered, there may have been the greatest augmentation of naval force. Now we have had one great advantage during the last few years in our shipbuilding policy; we have adjusted the work we have taken in hand with our finances, and we have been able to make most rapid progress with all the vessels we have had in hand. Foreign nations, however, have acted on another principle. They have allowed their shipbuilding programme to outrun the compass of their annual finance, and have not made the same progress we have. There is a great amount of incomplete work on which expenditure in the past has been incurred; therefore, in looking to the future we must take cognizance of not only prospective expenditure, but add that to the expenditure already incurred in reference to unfinished ships to estimate the addition made to the naval force of foreign countries. If we apply this test, we find that during the next five years there will be a large addition to the war fleets of Europe, especially in the matter of battle-ships. I had hoped some two years ago that the Nile and Trafalgar would be the last battle-ships laid down in this country. It then appeared as if there was to be a general cessation of armour-clad building, and that for reasons not far to seek, torpedo boats had come into use, and naval officers were inclined greatly to exaggerate the effect of the change. The result was that the second European Naval Power, France, practically suspended her armour-clad building, and other nations followed her example; but since then, owing in part to the development of quick firing guns, and partly to the invention of new explosives, a great impetus has been given to battle-ship building. Therefore, it is our duty, as we find our neighbours are pushing forward the building of this class of ships, to make similar efforts. We cannot fail to take cognizance of the fact. We may talk of our supremacy on the sea, but that supremacy is measured by the number of battle-ships we can put into line. In the observations I have made I am re-echoing the view expressed in the gracious Speech that our relations are friendly and cordial with all nations. Still, it requires no very deep student of history to know that there are certain sections of opinion and of influence in foreign countries which are unfriendly to this country, owing to jealousy of our prosperity and envy of our great colonial expansion, with our immunity from conscription and all its attendant evils and the like; and if any one of these influences, these cycles of opinion, happen temporarily to become predominant, we cannot ignore the fact that increased naval armaments may be available for our annoyance and injury. I have endeavoured during the past year to study the speeches of those who in previous years have held my position and that of Prime Minister, so as to ascertain what was the paramount idea underlying their utterances when they spoke of the standard of strength on which our naval establishment should be maintained. I think I am correct in saying that the leading idea has been that our establishment should be on such a scale that it should at least be equal to the naval strength of any two other countries. I notice that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers) has given expression to that view. The right hon. Gentleman was noted as an advocate of vigorous economy at the Admiralty, but he has stated that he felt certain that when he left the Admiralty the British fleet was equal to the combined naval forces of any two other countries. That may have been the case; but it must be borne in mind that at the time of which the right hon. Gentleman speaks there was only one considerable Naval Power in Europe, while the feature of the present situation is that there are now not one or two, but four or five nations which are spending largely on their naval armaments. When, then, there is this simultaneous development of naval force going on, it is quite clear that the strength of the combination of any two other countries must be regarded as considerably increased in the aggregate. This is a fact that we cannot ignore, and we must therefore either be content with a less measure of precaution than that which in past years was supposed to regulate our Naval Estimates, or we must be prepared to face an increased expenditure, or those Estimates I have always endeavoured to speak with reserve upon the question of what would be the effect of a naval war upon our commerce. I do not believe that ten cruisers or twenty cruisers would annihilate that commerce or cut off our food supplies; but, on the other hand, it is quite clear that any system of commerce and mercantile marine must be based on the security and price of freight, or, on the outbreak or danger of war, there might be a rude shock or a great disturbance to a branch of some trade, which might go altogether, leading to a total cessation of other branches of the same trade. No doubt, at the moment, it would be the apprehension of what might occur rather than the occurrences themselves, and it would be most necessary that there should, at the outbreak of a war, be a feeling of perfect confidence in our naval strength. I have sufficient confidence in the energy and capabilities of our merchant seamen, and believe that they would soon adjust themselves to the requirements of such conditions; but in order to sustain that confidence the supremacy of our Fleet is a necessary preliminary. This is a view that not only I, but naval officers, hold. The changes that have been effected in naval matters during the last few years have certainly increased the difficulty of maintaining a close blockade, and here the recent Naval Manœuvres have given us useful lessons. A military strategist, in conducting a campaign, requires information on two points—he wishes to know the amount of the force that can be brought against him, and he also wishes to know the uses to which it can be put. On land the number of military movements or combinations is limited by many conditions—the frontier of the territory—the geographical lie of the country, the course of rivers, the means of transport, even the conditions of weather; these and other matters must enter into his consideration, and impose limitations upon his movements. But this is not so in regard to naval combinations. A ship is self-supporting, carrying her own stores and commissariat, and without any warning can proceed to join any combination that may take place at any rendezvous in any part of the world. No amount of foresight or calculation can anticipate naval combinations and naval movements; therefore, it seems to me essential that, for the purpose of meeting such unexpected blows, we should have a considerable margin of reserve; and if this is to be utilized in the way I have indicated it must be equipped, and armed, and ready for sea at a few days' notice.

Lord George Hamilton

I venture to lay these arguments before the Committee, because I think they are worthy of attention, and are incontrovertible conclusions for the premises from which Her Majesty's Government started or which they accepted, that there should be no declination from the assumed standard of strength in the past. I am no alarmist, and much dislike the waste of public money, and in the controversies that have taken place during the last few years I have frequently combated exaggerated and sensational statements, for I have always considered it mean for a Government to take an advantage of an ephemeral phase of public excitement to incur unnecessary expenditure. Nothing is more foolish than to enforce demands for increased expenditure by arguments based on facts which will not stand discussion or the test of experience. But there seems to me to be no alternatives but those I have stated; we must either be content with a lower standard of precaution than in the past, or we must be prepared to face increased expenditure. Her Majesty's Government, in the present state of European politics, cannot recommend the former course; on the contrary, we shall use all our influence and authority to endeavour to induce the House of Commons to meet this necessity for increased naval expenditure. Having stated, therefore, the nature and scope of the scheme which I am about to propose, I should like to turn to some other conditions to which, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, that scheme should conform. We considered that it should be entire in itself, and adequate, not only to our immediate, but also to our future wants. We considered that every vessel should be an effective war vessel of the newest type and most approved design, and that every vessel, when once laid down, should be pushed on with all the rapidity compatible with sound construction, and that as these vessels approach completion preparations should be made for the necessary accumulation of men and stores and guns which would enable a ship to become an efficient fighting machine. To associate with that scheme of expenditure these business-like conditions necessitated a good deal of previous investigation and work. Upon that work we have been engaged for the past three years; and, although there may seem at first sight to be little connection between the proposals I now have to make and the work we have done, in reality that work is the foundation on which we base our scheme. We considered it to be essential that before we asked the House for additional money for naval purposes we should be able to show that the national shipbuilding yards were well administered, that the scandal of ships waiting for guns should not be repeated, and that the designs for new ships should be in accordance with the view of naval officers and naval scientists. Upon the questions of the administrations of the Dockyards, the supply of guns, and the preparations of designs I will therefore say a few words. In the comparison too frequently made between our Dockyards and private yards sufficient allowance is not made for the variety and multiplicity of those duties which the former have to perform, and from which private yards are free. Everything that relates to a great fleet of warships has to be done in the Dockyards. Almost all the officering, manning, victualling, storing, coaling, and lighting—these and many other services, which in a great commercial port are performed by various public and private agencies, are performed by the Dockyards. In addition to this, it is necessary to have a great accumulation of stores and men ready for action at a moment's notice. Moreover, we have so to arrange our machinery that every branch of it may be capable of great expansion in case of emergency. Naval mobilization is just the reverse of military mobilization. The former is decentralization and localization, while the latter is concentration and centralization. If we were unfortunate enough to get into any war, every man, every officer, every store, and every gun, as well as ammunition, would have to pass through the Dockyards in order to be put on board the ships commissioned in those Dockyards. Therefore, though it is necessary to keep a tight hand on these subsidiary and incidental services, it would be most unadvisable to cut them down beyond a certain limit, because in case of emergency it would be impossible to expand or extend them. In the past three years we have dissociated these incidental services the Admiralty, we may have to alter our decision as to the amount to be so expended; but, with that one reservation, we intend to put this amount of work out. For the purpose of building and completing the remaining 38 vessels and their armament there is £11,500,000. This sum, which is to be included in the ordinary Estimates, can be divided into two heads—£8,650,000 for construction of engines and hulls, and £2,850,000 for armament. We propose to lay down in the Dockyards this year 20 vessels, as follows:—Four battle-ships of the first class, one of the second class, three first-class cruisers, six second-class cruisers, and six torpedo gunboats. Adding these 20 to the 32 put out to contract, we have 52, leaving 18 out of the 70 still to be accounted for. They will be disposed as follows:—A second-class battle-ship will be laid down early in the financial year 1890-1, and the other vessels will take their places on the slips in the Dockyards as soon as they become vacant by the launch of the vessels laid down in the first year. The whole of the programme, including both Dockyard and contract work, is to be finished in four and a-half years from the date of the commencement of the first vessel. There is a naval and an administrative advantage in this distribution of work, to which I should like to call attention. Taking the programme as a whole, it consists of 70 ships, 10 of which are battle-ships and 60 cruisers of different types. A battle-ship takes very much longer to build than a cruiser—three and a-half or four years—and if they are to be finished within four and a-half years they must all be commenced in the first year. But a battle-ship when completed is not entirely efficient unless she has certain small vessels attached to her as scouts, and we consider that out of the 70 vessels 20 are the satellites of the battle-ships. The remaining 40 cruisers will be effective whether used in squadrons or individually. We propose to commence the construction of the whole of these this year, and thus make an immediate addition to the Navy of what it most requires. Later on, when an increase is made to our battle-ships, each battle-ship will be accompanied by two smaller vessels, and thus there will be no drain upon our force of independent cruisers. This enables us to carry out efficiently the whole of our shipbuilding programme, and it also enables us to give continuous employment in the Dockyards thus avoiding the great evils of sudden expansion of business. In order to absorb the amount represented by the sum of £11,500,000, we raise the Shipbuilding Vote in the ordinary Estimates by £615,000, and reduce the Ordnance Vote by £400,000, because we intend to purchase all the Ordnance for the contract ships out of the £10,000,000 which I have referred to. If the Shipbuilding Vote be kept at the level at which we propose to put it, and the Ordnance Vote at the same level, there will be sufficient to provide for the whole of this work, as well as for all the work we have in hand and to complete in the period of four and a-half years. The Committee will observe the extreme rapidity with which we propose to build these ships. In France a battle-ship takes nearly ten years to complete. In this country, previous to 1885, ironclads took six years and large cruisers four years. We propose to lay down 70 vessels, including ten battle-ships, in four and a-half years. It is in the interests of economy that we make this proposal.

LORD R. CHURCHILL: Are the 70 vessels to be the total shipbuilding production of four years, or in addition to the ordinary estimated production, whatever takes place?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: No; perhaps I may explain. When Lord Northbrook made his proposals there were a large number of ships in the Dockyards which were in process of building, and what he did was to increase the existing shipbuilding programme by making certain additions to it. I stated that on April 1, 1890, there would only be four ships in Her Majesty's Dockyards and under contract, independent of this programme, which would not be complete. These four ships would be in the last stage of construction. After this year, therefore, the whole of the Naval Estimates are available to carry out this part of the programme.

LORD R. CHURCHILL: On the four years' Estimate?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: On the four years' Estimate. Rapidity of construction means economy, because delay occasions twofold waste—not only does ship cost more in construction, but longer it is on the stocks the less is life as an effective ship, and, therefore, the less use you get out of it. In order to insure rapidity of construction the whole of these ships, contract as well as Dockyard ships, we propose put them in an Act of Parliament two Schedules, enacting that they shall be completed within the period I have mentioned—namely, by April, 1894. A special account will be kept of each of these vessels, and those accounts will be subject to the ordinary control of the Treasury and the Comptroller and Auditor General. In order that the Dockyards may not be subject to certain impediments which prevent the ships from being completed as rapidly as possible, we propose slightly to adjust the financial machinery in two essentials as regards excesses and balances of Votes. There is, perhaps, no practice, however laudable its pretensions, which results more in extravagance than the practice of surrendering to the Exchequer balances because the contractors have failed to deliver within a certain period. The liability remains, but the money goes back into the Exchequer, and goes to the reduction of the National Debt. It is practically a misappropriation of funds. The taxpayer is taxed one year for certain work, but because the contractor, through some unforeseen circumstances, is unable to deliver the work a day in advance of March 31, the money so raised goes back into the Exchequer, and next year the taxpayer is taxed again for the same purpose. That is not only unfair, but most prejudicial to economy. The unquestioned tendency in the Departments is to surrender as little as possible, and there are a number of devices by which attempts are made to reduce expenditure which would come into the next year by anticipating it, in order that in a subsequent year this deferred liability may be met without upsetting the departmental finance or the Estimates of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Therefore, the proposal we make is that balances in reference to shipbuilding should be retained. But we go further. There are certain articles and certain stores, such as armour plates and steel castings, which only a limited number of firms produce, and we must take these goods when we can get them. It is very likely that in dealing with transactions of this magnitude armour plates may be delivered sooner than anticipated, and heavy payments have to be made which would disorganize arrangements, and, therefore, provision is made for a temporary advance for the purpose of meeting any such payments, the advance being immediately repaid as soon as there was a surplus to the credit of the Department. We propose to allocate to new construction in the present financial year, 1889-90, £2,645,000; but only £1,360,000 is available for the new programme, the remainder goes to the completion of those ships still in hand. Next year, 1890-91, we propose to allocate £2,590,000 for new shipbuilding, and of that £2,340,000 will go to the new programme.

CAPTAIN PRICE (Devonport): Does that include contracts?

*LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: No. In 1891-2 we propose to allocate £2,560,000 to new construction, and the whole of that will go towards the new programme. Next year, 1892-3, we estimate that only £1,650,000 will be required, and in 1893-4, £740,000. These sums, in the aggregate, amount to £8,650,000. We propose in the same way to distribute the money necessary to arm these ships, and to make provision for it out of the ordinary Ordnance Vote. Adding that sum of £8,650,000 to the amount required for ordnance, which is £2,850,000, we get £11,500,000, which is the whole of the work we propose to put upon the Estimates. Therefore, summing up our scheme, it comprises the building of 70 vessels; it involves the expenditure of £10,000,000 out of the Special Fund, the nature of which my right hon. Friend will explain; and it involves an increase of £615,000 in the Shipbuilding Vote; but there will be a reduction of £400,000 in the Ordnance Vote, making a total increase of £215,000. I do not wish to anticipate the discussion on the ordinary Estimates, but there is certain work which we propose to take in hand, and which forms so essential a part of our shipbuilding policy that I must allude to it. There is a considerable number of our ironclads whose boilers are much worn. We propose to take all these vessels in hand and spread their repairs over a number of years, on this principle—that as few vessels as possible should be laid up at one time. Certain of these vessels are worth re-engining, others are worth re-arming, so that in certain cases these vessels, re-boilered, re-engined, and re-armed, will be more efficient and powerful than on the day they were first commissioned. The vessels we propose to take in hand are the Minatour, Achilles, Superb, Thunderer, Devastation, and Rupert—they will all be taken in hand this year. Next year we shall deal with the Hercules, Monarch, Sultan, and Invincible. We propose also to thoroughly refit the Nelson, Audacious, and Triumph.

LORD C. BERESFORD: This year?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: Yes, this year. That is included in the ordinary Shipbuilding Vote, which has been increased by £615,000. By taking these vessels in hand and repairing them we are enabled to do that which many sailors have long advocated. We shall be able to substitute in the next eight months four efficient and sea-going ironclads for the four hulks which now carry the flags of the Commanders-in-Chief at Sheerness, Portsmouth, Plymouth, and Queenstown. These vessels will have all their stores and all their coal on board, and they will be prepared at a moment's notice to go anywhere. This means a great addition to our reserves in the home waters. The only other increase in the ordinary Estimates worthy of note is in regard to the provision we make for improving the coal-ing facilities for our Fleet in the Channel. We also propose to dredge the Medway, so as to allow first-class ironclads with all their weights on board to pass down with the ordinary tide, which they cannot do now. We also propose to increase the Votes 1 and 2 by the sum of £275,000 for the purpose of adding 3,000 men besides those voted last year. These 3,000 men would comprise 1,100 marines, 1,000 stokers, and about 900 bluejackets. Including all these sums, they will show for the year commencing 1888-9 a total increase of £602,000 over the Naval Estimates of the preceding year. The Committee will naturally ask, does this increase on shipbuilding carry with it great progressive increases in future, so far as the expenditure on stores and men is concerned?—because I think it would be very unfair to get the Committee by a side wind to assent to an increase of one branch of expenditure without placing clearly before hon. Members the increase which that sanction entails in other branches of expenditure. On that point I can give satisfactory assurances to the Committee. We at present have sufficient men to man every available vessel, but when all these ships are completed we shall want a considerable additional number. While I think it most desirable to accumulate a large reserve of war vessels for an emergency, I do not think it would be reasonable to ask the Committee to vote all the money necessary to maintain sufficient men on the continuous service system to man all those vessels. A certain increase will be necessary, but that increase, spread over the next five years, will, I think, not amount to more than £250,000 in the aggregate. I propose, in conjunction with my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade, to turn attention to the development of the Naval Reserve. In the Naval Reserve you have most admirable material, and as our deficiencies are mainly under the heads of lieutenants and stokers, I have no doubt we shall be able to make some arrangements by which a very large proportion of those deficiencies can be supplied without a great addition to the Estimates. On the other hand, there will be a substantial contribution next year from Australia as an appropriation in aid; there would be, as the Committee will recollect, a decrease in the Shipbuilding Vote two or three years hence if the House were satisfied with the strength at which the Navy was maintained; and there would also be two or three years hence a considerable decrease in the Ordnance Votes. I am looking closely into the question of the reserves of ammunition. The proportion of reserves was fixed many years ago, when production was limited and slow. Now that production has rapidly increased, I do not think it advisable to keep large stores of perishable material. I hope I shall be able to make emergency contracts with the great firms who manufacture these articles, and, if so, we shall be able ultimately to accomplish a substantial reduction in our Ordnance Vote. Therefore, putting together all these decreases, and putting against them the only prospective increase, I think I may say our scheme carries with it, as it approaches completion, a reduction rather than an increase of expenditure. I hope the Committee will now allow me to say a word or two upon that part of our work upon which we have bestowed most trouble and anxiety—namely, the preparation of designs of the respective types. Now, in preparing those designs, we were all very much impressed with the great difference between the requirements of the British Navy and those of foreign navies. The great mass of European navies are kept in peace time within inland seas, such as the Baltic, the Black Sea, and the Mediterranean; with the exception of France, they have, outside Europe, few bases of operation. Now, vessels intended for short cruises require neither the sea-going qualities nor the coaling capacity which English ships must have. Therefore, if these qualities are to be obtained, our ships must be larger and larger; and if they are to be equal in armament and superior in speed, the coal-carrying capacity must necessarily be larger. The Committee will have noted the large dimensions of many of the ships we propose to build. We have ascertained that increase of size does not carry with it corresponding increase of expenditure; but it does carry with it a proportionate increase in the length of life of the vessel as an efficient fighting machine. We have, therefore, prepared our designs on that principle; and I will just very roughly state what they are. The torpedo-gun-boat will be a vessel of 735 tons, with a raised deck forward, a speed of 21 knots, as against a tonnage of 550 and a speed of 18 knots of its predecessor, the Rattlesnake. The Pandoras are an exact reproduction of the vessels building for the Australian Colonies, which have given satisfaction to all who have examined their design. The improved Medeas are an enlargement upon the original Medeas. Their speed is the same, 20 knots; their armament is somewhat heavier; but they are 35 feet longer, and have 600 tons greater displacement. The first-class cruisers are vessels of 7,350 tons, as against 4,050 tons of the original Mersey, on which they may be regarded as an improvement. Their speed is three knots greater—namely, 20 knots. Every one of the above types represents a design which has either given satisfaction or is an improvement upon a well-known and satisfactory ship. I propose to-morrow to lay on the Table a Paper giving full particulars of our whole procedure. In the meantime, I will roughly summarize this Paper. The Select Committee on the Navy Estimates last year suggested that as regards the distribution of armour of battleships outside opinion should be called in. I very soon found out that the outside opinion wanted was not that of designers, but of naval officers, and especially of gunnery officers. I am fortunate enough to have at the Admiralty four officers, three of whom have held the post of Director of Naval Ordnance, and one now ably discharges the duties of that office, and in these four gentlemen I believe I have more technical knowledge as to Ordnance than can be found in any Admiralty in the world. We discussed the subject at very considerable length—what should be the distinctive features and qualities of the new battle ships, and we had a considerable number of alternative designs prepared, with their weights, showing what could be done, because the difficulty is not what is put in, but what you leave out. These were all worked out. I was anxious to get the best outside naval opinion I could get; and, therefore, I sent the designs to the three Admirals appointed to report on the Naval Manœuvres and to the two Commanders-in-Chief. Afterwards we met at the Admiralty and had a full discussion on the subject, a report of which will be found in a Parliamentary Paper; and I am glad to say we were almost unanimous in the decision at which we arrived. Roughly speaking, the disposition of armament is that of the Admiral class, though the number of guns is considerably greater, while the disposition of armour much more resembles that of the Trafalgar or the Nile. They are vessels of great coal and steaming capacity, with a high freeboard and a speed of 17½ knots. I believe they will give almost universal satisfaction to the Service, while as regards seagoing qualities they will be capable of being sent to any part of the world and in any weather. Just before I sit down there is one other subject on which I should like to touch. Our scheme is naturally based on the nature of the work which in an emergency our Navy will have to do. The area to be covered and the duties to be performed are so great and various that I should like roughly to indicate to the Committee the distribution of that work and the means by which we hope to carry it out. Our first duty will be so to dispose of our Fleets that our coasts should be defended from invasion and our naval stations from bombardment, and this disposition should be carried out on wide and general lines for the protection of commerce. These duties must be exclusively performed by the regular ships of Her Majesty's Navy. The second branch of the subject is the protection of our commerce on certain trade routes. The great bulk of this work also must be done by the Navy, but the armed cruisers of the mercantile marine can be associated with the Navy in the discharge of that duty. I am sorry to see in quarters where I least expected them depreciatory observations made as to the inferiority of the merchant cruiser, on the ground that it would not be a match for a war vessel of the same size. Of course they are not a match for a war vessel of the same size; if they were there would be no object in having war cruisers. But they will be more than a match for any cruiser of the same character, and in all those movements of dogging the footsteps of a foreign cruiser embarrassing a foe, and keeping touch with a squadron that has broken blockade, they will be absolutely invaluable. I advocate the extension of the system on still higher grounds. The discipline of the mercantile marine is every year improving, and I believe it is very much to the advantage alike of the mercantile marine and of the Navy that they should be brought together, and I trust the House will always insist on that being one of the primary features of Admiralty policy. I turn now to the third question, on which there has been a great deal of agitation, and particularly in the neighbourhood of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley), namely, the question of local defence, and I will only deal with that portion of it which is known as the floating defence, because my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War will be able to give an explanation in regard to the land defences. Now, we asked the commercial ports to co-operate with us in the discharge of this duty, and they willingly complied. The primary duty of the Navy, in my judgment, is to prevent attacks being made upon the commercial ports. Their secondary duty is to co-operate with the land forces in the event of an attack. Now the gentlemen we asked to co-operate in that secondary duty attached to that co-operation conditions which would have fettered us in the discharge of our primary duty. They wished us to station certain war vessels at different ports and leave them there in time of war. We could not assent to such an arrangement, because if we made it in time of peace it would not be worth anything in time of war. There is some limit to the amount of money for naval purposes which Parliament can vote, and the more that money is locked up in vessels stationed at different ports of the coast, the less remains for the general defence of the country and the Empire. If our naval supremacy were seriously impaired no system of local defence, however efficient, would give protection to the country. On the other hand, if our supremacy is maintained, no serious attack will be made upon these ports. We were asked to provide material in the shape of ships and guns for those ports, which were to be manned by Naval Volunteers. Now, ships and guns cost a great deal of money, and being complicated machines they require a complete training on the part of the personnel before they can be properly handled, and in my judgment, it would be a sheer waste of money and power to spend large sums in supplying those ships to be manned by comparatively untrained men. The Volunteer system has worked well so far as the land forces are concerned; it has become a fairly effective Reserve at a small cost, but I cannot say quite the same of the Naval Volunteer system. I admire the self-sacrifice and the patriotism which animate the members of that force in going through the tests which the Admiralty imposes. But the great bulk of the Naval Volunteers are not seafaring men. They know little or nothing of gunnery; they have also to get their sea legs on and become seamen. It is impossible for any volunteer to sustain the strain and

test of such a training. I do not want to have any force which is merely a force upon paper and which has no assigned duties to perform in our system of national and naval defence; and at present our Naval Volunteers are not available for land purposes; they are not under the Secretary of State for War, and from their inability to go through the necessary training they are not available for sea purposes. I have a proposal to make, and take this opportunity of mentioning it. There is in all these commercial ports a considerable number of small vessels—tugs, passenger steamers, and others—which are quite strong enough to carry a modern gun of considerable size. These are manned by captains and men who know every inch of the coast and the water in the neighbourhood. You have there the very material you want in time of war. I am quite ready to consider a proposition if the ports would co-operate, by which the Admiralty would discuss with them the terms of a capitation grant for men and some assistance towards the hire of vessels which may be passed as efficient, the Admiralty supplying the inspection and instruction, and the guns and material. I believe in this way that we should get in each locality a good nucleus of small vessels—an effective and respectable flotilla manned by seafaring men. I make the suggestion, because I do not want to shut the door to any self-sacrificing patriotism developed in the Naval Volunteers; but I do want to get some better return for our money than we now get. Well now, Sir, I have completed my Statement and I have only one more word to say. The House, I think, will gather from the nature of the details, as well as from the principles which I have enunciated, that our scheme is the result of a somewhat slow and laborious investigation. We have been many months at work on this scheme. In one sense we had to embody all the requirements of the Navy. We had then so to adjust them and to spread them over a series of years that we might not make too great a demand on any particular class of article which is difficult of production and might arrest our progress and prevent our shipbuilding from proceeding with rapidity. We have turned this scheme over and over again, and looked at it from different points of view. We believe that if the House assents to our proposals and the provisions contained in this Bill founded on the resolution which will shortly be read from the Chair—we believe that we can complete this scheme at the cost we have given and in the given time. There is no branch of the Service or any want of the Service which, we believe, has been overlooked. Therefore our scheme must stand or fall as a whole. A portion of it cannot be cut out without affecting the efficiency of the scheme as an entire scheme. In asking the Committee to give impartial consideration to these proposals, I am afraid I shall appeal in vain to one portion of this House. There is a powerful section of public opinion in the country, ably represented in this House, which objects to all expenditure on the Army and Navy. I so far sympathize with the object of these hon. Gentlemen as to assure them that, if ever they can get Foreign Governments to adopt their principles, no body of men will rejoice more at their success than the Government for the time-being of Her Majesty. But until they do so succeed, they cannot expect that this country should be the only country to ignore the first instincts of self-preservation. The late Prime Minister on the first night of this Session somewhat cavilled at our definition of our scheme of increased expenditure as coming under the head of precaution rather than of warlike preparation. I think the word “precaution” is a just one, and is capable of being sustained. What do we ask this increase of naval force for? It is for the protection of home and domestic interests alone. Our commerce and our shipbuilding are among the oldest of the hereditary industries of this country. It is through them that many industries have been brought into existence and fostered, and it is by the maintenance of that commerce alone that that huge industrial system of employment, which exists in this country, can be sustained, and which alone enables 35 millions of people to live within these islands. Then, will this scheme lead to increased expenditure on the part of foreign nations? I think not. We do not attempt in any way to vie with foreign nations in the magnitude of their land forces. Our whole social and constitutional system and policy are utterly opposed to any such competition. But if, on the other hand, there should be any foreign nation which should wish to encroach upon us, or to invade our naval supremacy, we have so framed our scheme as to bring into world-wide prominence the incomparable power of this country and its enormous resources. The scheme which I have laid before the House is one which I do not think all the Dockyards of Europe would complete in the time we propose; and if there are any nations abroad who do wish to compete with us in naval armaments, the mere enunciation of this scheme will show to them the utter futility of their desire. I am aware that in one instance I stand at a great disadvantage, compared with my predecessor, Lord Northbrook, when he made similar proposals to Parliament. In that year, 1885, a great constitutional question had been settled, and the leaders of both parties of the State were then in conference, in order to give effect to that great change. Now a wide constitutional difference irreconcilably separates on one particular question the two great parties of the State. Still, I have noticed with great satisfaction that right hon. Gentlemen opposite, while admitting their differences with us so far as the methods of the internal government of the Empire are concerned, have over and over again asserted that if any external question should arise affecting either the safety or integrity of the Empire, all these differences would to a large extent be diminished if they did not vanish altogether. Therefore, while I do not ask right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite to in any way abandon their legitimate rights of criticism which their administrative knowledge and political position fully entitle them to make on a scheme of this great magnitude, I feel sure I can rely upon their approaching this question of national defence from a broad and patriotic standpoint, and that they will discuss our scheme upon its merits in a fair and impartial manner. It is in that sense I have endeavoured to explain the scheme, and it is in that sense, I trust, the discussion will be continued and the proposals of Her Majesty's Government considered.

Motion made and Question proposed :

"That it is expedient that a sum not exceeding £21,500,000 be granted for the purpose of building, arming, equipping, and completing for sea, vessels for Her Majesty's Navy; and that it is expedient that a sum not exceeding £10,000,000 be issued out of the Consolidated Fund in seven years ending the 31st of March, 1896; and that a sum not exceeding £11,500,000 be issued out of the moneys to be provided by Parliament for the Naval Service during the five financial years ending the 31st of March, 1894."

LORD R. CHURCHILL (Paddington, S.): Before the Chancellor of the Exchequer rises to speak, there are one or two Questions which I should like to address to him as representing the Government, and which it might be of material benefit to the Government should be answered categorically. I rise rather in the interests of the Government than of the House. I have no doubt it has been telegraphed all over Europe by this time, and that every General and Admiral of every foreign Power is informed that Great Britain is about to spend £21,000,000 on its Navy. That no doubt is an announcement which may cause some surprise, and in some foreign quarters some consternation. I also think it is an announcement calculated to startle the public mind of this country. But it is for the purpose of preventing the public mind from being over-startled, and of preventing Foreign Powers from being over alarmed, that I rise to make a few interrogatory remarks, addressed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty has spoken at great length; and the result of the speech and of all the noble sentiments which it contains, and the eloquent appeal which the noble Lord made to the patriotism of both sides of the House to spend money on the defences of the country—the result of it all is, and I think I can prove it, subject to the correction of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that for the next four years a sum rather under £1,000,000 is to be added to the Navy Estimates. I will explain to the Chancellor of the Exchequer what I mean. The noble Lord stated that he was going to ask the House to consent to an expenditure in the Dockyards in the next four years on shipbuilding and armaments of £11,500,000. The House will recollect that last year the vote for shipbuilding amounted to £4,250,000, so that, if the noble Lord had stated that he was going to ask the House to pledge itself to maintain the expenditure of last year on shipbuilding for the next four years, he would have committed the House to an expenditure of £17,000,000.

LORD G. HAMILTON: No.

LORD R. CHURCHILL: I am afraid that the noble Lord does not follow me. I say that if he had asked the House to pledge itself to spend for the next four years the same amount which it spent last year on shipbuilding, the amount which the House would have been committed to would have been £17,000,000.

LORD G. HAMILTON: No.

LORD R. CHURCHILL: I make these remarks for the purpose of eliciting information, and for the sake of correction, if necessary. The sum voted last year under the three heads of the Shipbuilding Vote was £4,250,000. Multiply that by four, and we get £17,000,000. But the noble Lord only proposes to spend upon the Shipbuilding Vote in the next four years £11,500,000. Therefore, as far as the Shipbuilding Vote is concerned, there is a reduction of expenditure made by the noble Lord of the difference between £11,500,000 and £17,000,000—that is to say, a difference of £5,500,000, and consequently a reduction of expenditure upon the Navy to that amount. But to the £11,500,000 we must add the £10,000,000 which the noble Lord proposes to commit the House to at once, making a total expenditure of £21,500,000 as against the £17,000,000, which the Estimates would have shown if the amount of the Shipbuilding Vote for last year had been maintained for four years. So that the actual difference between the expenditure entailed by the proposals of the noble Lord, and the expenditure that would have been entailed if the Estimates of last year had been maintained for four years, is a sum of £4,500,000. The noble Lord, I see, dissents from that view. Well, if it is not the case, it is not owing to any mistake in my figures; it must be owing to some inadequacy of explanation on the part of the First Lord of the Admiralty, which perhaps the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be able to set right. Therefore, I say the difference made by the noble Lord's proposal is a little over a million a year added to the Navy Estimates for the next four years. Against that must be set the appropriation in aid from Australia, and possibly some other appropriations, which will probably bring the sum to a little under £1,000,000 a year, as far as I gather from the speech of the First Lord of the Admiralty. Then, as I understand it, contracts are to be entered into by the Government to the extent of £10,000,000, and future Parliaments will not be able to get out of those contracts. As to the £11,500,000 which is to be expended in the Dockyards, it seems to me that it is quite unnecessary for the House to consider that at all. All the House has to consider out of it is the Shipbuilding Vote this year, and it is utterly impossible for the noble Lord to pledge the House to expend in the future £7,500,000 on shipbuilding. Even if it is done by Statute it has not the smallest binding effect on Parliament; and all discussion now on future expenditure on the Navy under the head of shipbuilding will be entirely supererogatory. I venture to submit to the noble Lord and to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that it would be a great waste of time. There seems to me to be nothing whatever in the scheme of the noble Lord propounded to-night—interesting though it was in parts—which ought not to have been said in the speech of the First Lord of the Admiralty on the Naval Estimates last year. I can see nothing whatever in what has been laid before the House which in any way differs from the usual annual statement, except that this year we are to have two long speeches instead of one. What I want to know from the Chancellor of the Exchequer is this. Is the resolution which has just been read a resolution which is to be embodied in legislation? Obviously if it is, we are committing the House to a series of stages on a matter which is practically beyond our power; we are trying to pledge the House to spend money this year, next year, and the year after, by which time another Parliament may have come into existence, and which may not agree to it. What is the practical use of passing a Bill through its Committee and Third Reading stages which cannot have a binding effect upon future Parliaments? Therefore, Sir, in the interests of the Government, having regard to the effect which this announcement of the expenditure of £21,000,000 may have upon foreign Powers, as well as upon this country, and to reduce that sum to what is its

one of our aims is to have regularity of expenditure. Those ships which are to be paid for out of the £10,000,000 are to be put out to contract, and right hon. Gentlemen opposite who have been at the Admiralty may know how difficult it is to ascertain the precise sum to be spent annually by contractors. We wish to equalize the payment, which should be made every year over a certain number of years. It would be most inconvenient for the purpose of taxation if one year we had to put on a tax in order to meet the large demands which the contractors might make, and immediately afterwards to reduce the taxation and have again to raise it. We, therefore, are anxious to secure a regular payment over a certain number of years to meet this £10,000,000 of expenditure, and the conclusion at which we have arrived—I trust it will not alarm the Committee—is to divide the sum of £10,000,000 by seven, and to pay £1,430,000 annually out of taxation in order to complete the £10,000,000 for which we ask. I will acknowledge that this is a considerable demand that we make on the taxpayers of the country. I think it will be admitted that we have gone very far in endeavouring to meet this large sum in a manner which will show that we do not shrink from appealing to the taxpayers for a purpose which they have so much at heart. The taxpayers of seven years hence will have the whole of those 30 ships which are to be built by contract paid for and ready without having to contribute anything towards them. I hope it will commend itself to the sense of the Committee that seven years is a fair range over which to spread this expenditure. We propose to arrange that £1,430,000 should be paid every year into this fund. If and when the demands of the contractors in a given year exceed the sum of £1,430,000 we propose to borrow on Exchequer Bonds and Treasury Bills the amount necessary to meet the demands of the contractors, and to endeavour in that way to equalize the expenditure year after year. The interest on such temporary loans will be put on the Navy Estimates of the year. In no case would it be a very large sum. It is generally not in the first and second years that the demands are largest, but rather in the third or fourth year; and I do not think there will be any considerable burden thrown on the Estimates in respect of interest. I can assure the House that when the proper time comes to defend our proposals, from whatever quarter they are attacked, I shall not shrink from doing so, because I have not assented lightly to this expenditure. I feel that it is a very heavy responsibility, which, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, I have taken in assenting to so large a burden being placed on the people. The Navy Estimates will be increased by £600,000 a year, and there will be paid annually towards the £10,000,000 £1,430,000. We shall ask the taxpayers of the country to pay £1,400,000 extra for the next seven years over and above the sum of £600,000 extra for the next four years for the Shipbuilding Vote. The House will see that we have not shrunk from trying to meet the demands made upon us by an appeal to the patriotism and the self-sacrificing spirit of those in whose interest we believe this large outlay is necessary.

*MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): I think, Sir, after the two statements we have now heard that we see exactly where we are. If I understand correctly we shall have to raise additional taxation for the purposes of the Navy to the extent of rather more than £2,000,000 a year for the next four or five years, to be reduced, if the Navy Estimates allow, by £600,000 for two years more. I think, therefore, that when the First Lord of the Admiralty said that the scheme looked rather to a reduction than to an increase in the naval charge he was a little sanguine as to what would come from the Chancellor of the Exchequer a few minutes afterwards. I assume to-night that we shall not express any opinion whatever in reference to this scheme. It has been customary on these occasions to ask information from the Government as to details which have not been clearly or carefully expressed; but I think now we understand the proposal perfectly clearly, and that there is no misconception as to its main outlines. I wish to ask one or two questions without any opinion on the merits of the proposal. I should like to understand this. The noble Lord said that 70 ships are proposed to be added to the Navy within the next four-and-a-half years. How many ships per contra will become obsolete in all probability, or will for other reasons pass out of the service of the Navy during the time? The number in some years has been 10, 12, and even 13, and, therefore, it will be well to know what will be the net addition to the Navy under the scheme of the noble Lord. Then I also think it would be well if the House could have the two statements of the First Lord of the Admiralty and the Chancellor of the Exchequer in print.

*MR. GOSCHEN: You will have the Bill.

*MR. CHILDERS: The Bill will not give the House the amount of information needed; and, therefore, I hope, in accordance with almost invariable custom, there will be no objection on the part of the Government to put before the House a Memorandum showing in detail the plan of the noble Lord. I think that that is absolutely necessary for purposes of effective discussion. Then there is another subject on which perhaps a Return is desirable. The noble Lord has described the general effect of Lord Northbrook's scheme. I think it would expedite the general discussion if we could have the outcome of that scheme before us. The House ought to have a Return laid before it showing precisely the whole of Lord Northbrook's scheme as worked out by the Government, so that we may be able to compare the working of that scheme with the working of the scheme of the present First Lord of the Admiralty. The two plans follow each other as proposals for bringing the strength of the Navy up to a certain point, and without some such Returns as I have indicated, it will be impossible for us thoroughly to understand the effect of the scheme. It would be of no use going into the details of the noble Lord's plan at present, but as soon as any Questions have been asked and answered on this occasion which may be necessary to elucidate the proposals of the noble Lord, a future day should be fixed for the discussion of the scheme as a whole, when the House may be thoroughly prepared to deal with it. I will only say that the proposal of the noble Lord is an extremely important one, and I trust that every hon. Member will satisfy himself thoroughly about it and understand all its details. For these reasons I forbear to offer the smallest piece of criticism upon it on the present occasion.

*LORD C. BERESFORD (Marylebone, E.): Mr. Chairman, as I have taken a somewhat prominent part in the country on the Question of the Naval Defences, I wish to say that I am not now going to discuss the noble Lord's scheme, but rather to state my own position as to these matters. I have often endeavoured to bring before the country the state of the Fleet and given my opinion of what addition to it is necessary, basing my opinion on statistics, facts, and arguments. But in every statement that I have made I have always put this point before the House and the country—that whatever addition, large or small, we make to the Fleet, it should be done in a business-like way and upon a definite principle. Now I am sorry to say that the noble Lord has not brought forward any clear and definite reason for what is proposed by the Government. I cannot for a moment object to an addition to the Fleet, but I think what is proposed is very much of a phantom addition. It is all very well for the noble Lord to say that he is going to add 70 ships to the Fleet, but he must put down what is the waste of the Fleet and what ships are obsolete. He ought to tell us what is the reason that the Government come down and asked for this extension of the Fleet. I have always held that the requirements of the country should be made out by the Cabinet. They should call on the experts to say how our trade and commerce and our import of raw material is to be defended, and the experts should give their reasons for what they recommend. I do not say that the First Lord of the Admiralty should go by what the experts say, but the First Lord ought to be directly responsible for why he does not do so. In my humble opinion this addition to the Fleet will be like that under Lord Northbrook, unless there is somebody made responsible for the ships not being as they ought to be. At this moment there is nobody responsible for the proposed addition to the Fleet being enough to bring the Navy up to the proper standard. I wish to get a definite basis to work upon. The House ought to be responsible. At present it is not. Take the case of the Estimates. On certain Votes coming on the Government say, "We must have these Votes posals will involve an increase of £600,000 for the next four years—not for a further four years beyond the seven, but for the next four years. Therefore, in the next four years, there will be an increase of expenditure amounting to about £2,000,000, and in the three years succeeding an increase of £1,430,000.

*MR. CREMER: One other Question I desire to address to the Government. We have had statements made on many hands as to the relative strength of the Navies of foreign countries. I presume the Government are in possession of the actual facts, and I feel that it would greatly simplify matters if the Government would favour the House with the facts at their disposal. Within the last few weeks an important statement from the Marine Department in France has been laid before the Chamber of Deputies. This, for instance, might very properly be laid before the House.

*LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I think that if the hon. Gentleman will refer to a Return granted last year upon the motion of the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone (Lord C. Beresford) he will there obtain all the information he desires.

CAPTAIN PRICE (Devonport): I desire to ask one or two Questions, because I do not feel quite clear as to the statement made this evening. I want it to be made out exactly to what extent we are going to spend the money of the taxpayers in addition to the ordinary expenditure under the Naval Estimates. I do not think we have exactly got that as yet. We have got it very clearly as far as the Dockyards are concerned, but not with regard to contract work. I understand £10,000,000 is to be spent, and that the repayment of that money is to be spread over seven years. But is that £10,000,000 to be spent on contract ships in addition to what is ordinarily spent upon the Contract Vote? If that is not so, how are we to guarantee that any money will be asked for by the Admiralty under the Contract Vote? If nothing is asked for by them we shall be only spending £10,000,000 in seven years, which would not amount to anything more than we have been spending hitherto. Now when the noble Lord at the commencement of his speech laid down the standard he did—which I think is a very fair standard, and one generally accepted in the country and in this House as a fair one—I came to the conclusion that it was not an extravagant proposal. Indeed, I should rather say it is a very moderate one. I mean, that the Fleet of this country ought to be equal at the very least to two of the largest fleets in Europe. I thought he was then going to tell the House to what extent it was necessary to add to our Fleet to put it in that condition. I understood him—and I think the Committee must have understood him when he first spoke—to be of opinion that we require 70 ships to put us in that position. There is not one of the experts who have been putting their views before the country lately who have taken even such a moderate estimate as that. Are we to understand from the noble Lord that it is necessary for us to have 70 ships of the kind he describes to put us in the position of being equal to the fleets of two other Powers? But these 70 ships are to be built in four years, and meanwhile other Governments are going on with their shipbuilding. I should like to know this. If the Government had not come down with this programme, how many ships would be built in these four years under the ordinary Estimates? The extra expenditure is to be £600,000 for four years on contract work. What is that in excess of the ordinary Contract Vote? We have not got the figures yet. We are told that the sum of 10 millions is to be spent in four years; but are we to go on spending each year the ordinary amount of late years, on building ships by contract? Let us have it stated clearly; it is a point that has been omitted. Will the Government, so far as they can, pledge themselves—give an assurance—that the ordinary expenditure on the Contract Vote shall go on for the next four years in addition to the 10 millions on extraordinary contract shipbuilding?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford Central): Will the noble Lord say what increase his proposals will make under the head of Dockyard artificers?

*LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: £13,000.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: It appears to me from the figures that it will involve a much larger increase, for I understand 10 millions are to be given for contract work and 11 millions for 38 ships to be built in the Dockyards. It appears to me this will involve a large increase in the number of artificers, and if this is to go on for four years and then cease, it will involve a great displacement of labour that will not be advantageous to the Dockyards or the Admiralty.

*LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I am asked if the 10 millions is to be an addition to the certain sum annually voted under sub-head of Votes 8, relating to contract work. The Shipbuilding Vote is under three heads—personal, material and stores, and contract. Contract work means hulls, or engines, that are put out for contract or manufacture. The Dockyards do not make their own engines—they are put out to contract. Under this programme no fresh hulls are to be put out to contract, except those within the sum of 10 millions. But vessels which are built in the Dockyards will require engines, and these will be put out to contract under this sub-head of the Navy Estimates, a larger amount of construction going on in the Dockyards. All the rest of the work to be put out to contract will be included in the 10 millions. Of course, as to how much we shall gain under the ordinary course of Estimates depends upon the height of the Estimates; but, assuming we keep the Estimates where they are now, the amount of contract work will be £620,000. The increase will be twofold—that upon the engines for the Dockyard-built vessels and that included in the 10 millions.

MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): There is also a deduction to be made for wastage.

*LORD G. HAMILTON: That is a matter of opinion. Of course, there will be a certain amount of wastage, but, as the right hon. Gentleman is probably aware, it is much less in our ironclads owing to the nature of the metal than in those of other countries.

MR. CHILDERS: I think the noble Lord has estimated that 30 or 40 vessels may be expected to become obsolete in four years.

*LORD G. HAMILTON: Small vessels; not big ships, but gun boats, sloops, &c. As to a vessel being obsolete, of course, it is matter of opinion.

MR. R. W. DUFF: I understand that the regular Navy Estimates will be taken on Thursday. When will they be presented to the House?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: To-morrow morning.

MR. PIOTON (Leicester): I do not think this conversation should be allowed to close without a protest from those of us who object to any increased expenditure whatever. Whatever may be the merits of the arithmetical calculation we have listened to, it is clear there is to be a considerable increase in the charges for the Navy, and against this some of us will hereafter take the opportunity of protesting, because we think that amply sufficient money has been spent on the Navy, if it had been expended honestly, fairly, and practically, to give us a Navy equal to those of any two nations in the world. We find by experience that the more money is given the more it is wasted. Over and over again there have been special grants of 10 or 12 millions, and we have never had anything to show for them but what are called Fleets on paper. I never hear the hon. and gallant Member for Marylebone (Lord Charles Beresford) speaking without being prompted by considerations of personal sympathy; and I would agree with all he says, if it were only possible. There was one thing he said this evening that I can quite agree with—that the Government have not given sufficient reason for the expenditure they demand. But I will not enlarge on that now. I only rose to give a distinct intimation that we shall protest against any increased expenditure whatever—and that, not because we wish to see the country in danger, not because we are less patriotic than hon. Members opposite, but because we have worked out—in our own mind, at any rate—a policy of our own, which would ensure the safety of the country, and ensure, at the same time, that all this money wasted in armaments, which I hope to God will prove utterly useless, would go into the mouths, the pockets, the homes of the people.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): As I understand the proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he contemplates an addition of taxation of £1,400,000 a year for seven years, and of £600,000 for four years; and these two sums together come to something under £12,500,000. Now, as I understand, this is the whole of the additional burden the Government contemplate over their scheme. I think that it is somewhat unfortunate that the noble Lord should speak about £21,500,000, as if it were in addition to the ordinary expenditure. Had this been made clear, there would not have been the difficulty that arose between the noble Lord the Member for Paddington and the First Lord of the Admiralty. Am I right in supposing that the addition to the ordinary expenditure will be £12,400,000?

MR. GOSCHEN assented.

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): This is not the time to go fully into the subject, and all I will do is to cordially say "ditto" to my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester (Mr. Picton). I listened very attentively to the statement of the First Lord of the Admiralty—a very able statement it was—expounding his intentions, though some of us did not seem quite to understand it, and there was one point the noble Lord altogether omitted. He did not give any reason why the country should be in such a position that it now requires all this increase of expenditure upon the Navy, nor did he give us any statement leading to the belief that any threatened danger called for this vast expenditure. I think the increase in itself is a much greater danger than anything that is likely to come to us from abroad. I can assure the noble Lord that when the right opportunity comes—when the next stage of the Bill comes forward, or when the legitimate and proper time comes, he shall receive the most determined opposition to his proposal from below the Gangway.

MR. HALLEY STEWART (Lincolnshire, Spalding): Can the noble Lord give us an approximate estimate of how many ironclads will go out of commission during the interval? I think he said 40 ships; that will leave only 30 as additions.

*LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: My answer was given off-hand. I was speaking from memory only. Of course whether an ironclad is obsolete or not is very much a matter of opinion. Certainly a number will be considered obsolete, but if there is any desire for it, I will see if I can provide the information.

Mr. Hunter

SIR EDWARD REED: The noble Lord enumerated a number of ships which would require new boilers and new expansion engines; will the noble Lord say whether the ships, the names of which he read out as about to receive new boilers this year or next, are all or any of them going to receive new engines this year?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: The Minotaur, the Achilles, and the Superb are about to receive new boilers, the Thunderer, Devastation, and Rupert new boilers and engines.

*MR. CREMER: May I ask when it is intended that the Question will be submitted for our decision, because I may say that it is intended by some of us below the Gangway—unless the initiative is taken above the Gangway, to meet the proposal with distinct opposition in the form of an Amendment.

*LORD G. HAMILTON: I said earlier in the evening that we could not ask the House to take it into consideration before this day fortnight. Ample notice shall be given.

*LORD CHARLES BERESFORD (Marylebone, E.): Are there any arrangements for putting new boilers in the coast defence vessels of the Hydra class?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: Yes.

*MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): In reference to the question as to vessels becoming obsolete, I have Returns here for the four years 1884 to 1887, and there I find the number of vessels struck off, small and great, are 80, a larger number than the additions under the noble Lord's scheme.

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): Of course ships are struck off after they have been inefficient for a long time, and meanwhile many others have been added.

*MR. CHILDERS: Yes; but many more are in the same condition.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday, March 21.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1888-89.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

"That a Supplementary sum, not exceeding £909, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1889, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Officers of the House of Lords."

MR. MOLLOY (King's Co., Birr): It will be remembered that last Session the introduction of these Supplementary Estimates gave rise to considerable debate, and it was then stated on behalf of the Government that in future this course would be avoided as far as possible. But the case is worse now, for neither the Navy nor the Civil Service Estimates have yet been issued, and we are in the position of being asked to vote money without having the Estimates before us that we might examine the items and form our opinion. Last Session, in reply to a complaint of the practice of bringing forward Supplementary Estimates, and so depriving the Committee of a fair opportunity of considering the expenditure, a promise was made that, if possible, it should be avoided. But here we have the Supplementary Estimates sprung upon us again. I do not want to move any reduction or raise any particular objection to this Vote, but I wish to get some expression of opinion—some promise that this continual introduction of Supplementary Estimates—this taking of money in little bits—shall be avoided in future, and that the money shall be asked for in the ordinary Estimates, when the items can be properly examined.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I do not quite follow the hon. Member. These Supplementary Estimates now introduced have no connection with the Estimates about to be introduced for the coming year. These Supplementary Estimates are to make good deficiencies that would otherwise arise in the amounts which have already been voted for the current year. I entirely sympathize with the hon. Member in his desire to avoid Supplementary Estimates, and I can assure him there is nobody to whom they cause greater inconvenience than the Secretary to the Treasury for the time being. But circumstances arise that make them necessary. I may point out that the Estimates for the present financial year were framed fifteen months ago, and it is impossible to foresee all that may happen in respect to a particular Vote during fifteen months. This particular Vote arises in consequence of several Committees appointed to inquire into important subjects, such as the "Sweating Committee," the Committee on "Private Bill Legislation," the Committees on the "Pharmacy Acts," and "High Sheriffs," having prolonged their sittings into the Autumn Session far beyond the usual period; and so there arises extra expenditure for witnesses, for reporters, shorthand writers, and so on. These extra expenses could not be foreseen when the original Estimates were framed. In framing the Estimates a margin is always allowed, and everything which can be foreseen is provided for; and these comparatively few Supplementary Estimates are due to circumstances over which we have no control. I had hoped that the Committee would have congratulated the Government on these Supplementary Estimates being so small in number and amount, and I trust they will not be considered as requiring a long discussion.

MR. MOLLOY: Of course, I quite understand these Supplementary Estimates are to meet deficiencies in the current year's accounts, but they have also a great deal to do with the Estimates for the coming year, just as the balance sheet of one year has relation to that of another year. Are we to have this year's Supplementary Estimates presented from time to time, or shall we take them in the ordinary course and consider them as a whole? These constant little petty discussions might be avoided, and in that sense they are an obstruction to ordinary business.

MR. JACKSON: The hon. Member has in his mind, I think, what is known as the Vote on Account. The Estimates themselves will be in the hands of the House in a few days. It is the intention of the Government, and has been announced by the Leader of the House, that every facility will be afforded to hon. Gentlemen for the discussion of the Estimates.

MR. MOLLOY: At what time?

MR. JACKSON: Immediately. The Vote on Account of the Civil Service will be taken on Monday week.

THE CHAIRMAN: This discussion is quite irregular. The Vote is £909 for the House of Lords.

MR. SEXTON (West Belfast): Mr. Courtney, the hon. Gentleman expects a little too much when he looks for congratulations with reference to these Estimates from this side of the House—

An hon. MEMBER called attention to the fact that there was not a quorum present.

The House was counted, and a quorum was found to be present.

MR. SEXTON: The explanation of the Secretary to the Treasury with reference to this Vote is not sufficient and not satisfactory. The hon. Gentleman has himself pointed out that the item is for Select Committees of the House of Lords, and that the increase is under the special head of shorthand writers. The Solicitor to the Treasury should have been able to forecast the expenditure. The hon. Gentleman has remarked that it was for the Sweating Committee. Now the Sweating Committee was appointed in February of last year.

MR. JACKSON: It succeeded the presentation of the Estimates.

MR. SEXTON: Certainly the expenditure must have been foreseen. I am the more moved to call attention to this matter seeing that the Irish Board of Guardians gets into difficulties by not being able accurately at the beginning of the year to forecast what its expenditure will be by the end of the year. With the experience of the officials of the Treasury, I wish to know how this Estimate has been increased by 50 per cent.?

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): The Chancellor of the Exchequer said in the beginning of the evening that he was going to increase our taxation by a very large amount on account of our naval defences. I am opposed to the whole scheme, though I have no doubt the House will accept it. Under the circumstances, I think these are expensive and pernicious institutions which ought to be cut off. I have come to the conclusion that we might make a considerable economy, and with advantage to the country, if we never voted another shilling for the House of Lords.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is not entitled to enter into the question of the House of Lords. He must confine himself to the items of the Vote.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Well, I object to those items on general principles because they are applied to an institution I disapprove of. I shall feel it my duty, whenever they are proposed, to divide the House. Here we have £43,731, and we are asked to spend another £900 on shorthand writers and law reporters. I think they are not needed, and I therefore oppose the expenditure as needless and pernicious.

MR. CREMER: The Secretary to the Treasury said that it was an exceedingly small sum we are asked to vote. Small as it is, I propose to reduce it by £500, and unless an assurance is given to the House that the system against which I protest will be discontinued, I shall redeem my promise of December last, and divide the House on every Vote where the principle to which I am about to refer is involved. The Sweating Committee, to which the Secretary to the Treasury, is no doubt a very important body, but it is a very remarkable thing that the Government appointed a Committee to inquire into the evils of sweating, which—

THE CHAIRMAN: The only Question the hon. Member can discuss is the propriety of the additional charges to complete the work of the Committee.

*MR. CREMER: The reason I rose was with reference to the workmen engaged in the House of Lords. It will be within the recollection of the Chairman and of the Committee that I called attention to the course which is pursued by the Government in not paying the employés—

THE CHAIRMAN: That is quite out of Order.

*MR. CREMER: I will then move, without any further comment, that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £500, reserving to myself the right, at the proper moment, to discuss the details.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £409, be granted for the said Service."—(Mr. Cremer.)

MR. CONYBEARE (Camborne): I am exceedingly reluctant to vote against this Estimate, but I am afraid I must unless I get some information from the Government as to what this increase of salaries refers to. The details given were as to £138 in respect of Select Committees, and not as to £686, which is the principal part, apparently, of the whole Vote. I think we ought to know what this unusual number of Select Committees have been doing, and what are to be the beneficial results from their cogitations. If the Government can satisfy me on these two points, I shall certainly not be disposed to vote against the Estimate.

MR. JACKSON: I do not know whether it is possible to satisfy the hon. Member for Camborne—[Mr. CONYBEARE: I doubt it.] Quite so. The Vote states clearly and specifically what it is for. I have stated that there was an unusual number of Committees sitting for an unusual length of time, and the item is for the payment of reporters who took the shorthand notes. A very large proportion of the expenditure is due to the Sweating Committee, to which I should have thought there would have been no objection.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I have no confidence in that Committee; I go against the whole thing; and I shall object to every single Vote which appears in the Estimates for the House of Lords.

MR. SEXTON: The question I put to the hon. Gentleman was, why the expenditure in respect of a Committee which had been so long contemplated could not have been included in the ordinary Estimate for the year. With regard to the other Committees, I can see no reason why they should not be stated on the face of the Vote, and why the Minister should hesitate to name them to the Committee.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Are we to understand that this charge is only for the taking of evidence and calling witnesses in the course of the proceedings of a Committee of the House of Lords?

MR. JACKSON: Yes; the system pursued in the other House is precisely the same as is pursued in this. Every Committee that sits upstairs has its shorthand writer, in exactly the same way as in another place. I thought I had already sufficiently explained the circumstances connected with this Vote. The Estimates are prepared in December or early in January, at the very latest, and at that time it was impossible to know how long the Lords' Committee would sit, or how much would be expended on witnesses and shorthand writers; so that it is only now, when we are coming to the end of the financial year, that we can put forward anything like an accurate Estimate, or anything likely to come in course of payment. Had there been any saving on any of the other subjects that were dealt with by Committees, it might have been applied to meet the excess here; but it was impossible at the end of the Autumn Session to determine the amount that would come in course of payment up to the 31st March in this instance.

MR. SEXTON: What were the other Committees?

MR. JACKSON: There were four—namely, the Sweating Committee, the High Sheriffs' Committee, the Committee on Private Legislation, and the Pharmacy Committee.

COLONEL NOLAN: I think it would be more business-like to over-estimate rather than under-estimate, as there is nothing that wastes the time of the Committee more than the practice of bringing in these Supplementary Estimates. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury speaks of four Committees, three of which strike me as most ridiculous—I allude to the Pharmacy Committee, the High Sheriffs' Committee, and the Private Legislation Committee. The High Sheriffs, we all know, are a very ridiculous institution, and I should like to know what, in the cases I have mentioned, we are to get for our money? What legislation do the Government intend to propose in regard to the Sweating System? Are they prepared to propose any legislation at all? If not—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. and gallant Member is wandering from the strict subject of the Vote, and I think he must be aware that the Committee on the Sweating System is still sitting.

COLONEL NOLAN: I have not seen any evidence in the papers for the last two or three days, although I have read that previously given; but I think it would be well, as the Committee has been sitting so long, to send it some strong expression of opinion from this House. As to the proposal to reduce the Vote by £500, I should prefer the suggestion of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) to reduce it by £900. I think it would expedite the work of the Committee if the whole of the Opposition were to go into the Lobby against the Vote, so as to mark its sense of the unbusiness-like conduct of the Government in this matter.

MR. BIGGAR (Cavan, W.): I have not a very extensive experience of Select Committees; but I think, from what I have seen, that, in a general way, there is an enormous amount of unnecessary evidence taken, a good deal of this evidence being the personal opinions of a set of partizans. If the evidence were confined to the elucidation of the facts it is desirable to get at, there might be some advantage in the expenditure incurred; but, as it is, there is usually no real value in the action of a Select Committee. In the latest Tory Governments it has been their policy to have a large number of Select Committees, probably because they afford the opportunity for a good deal of amusement to hon. Gentlemen who do not make much show in the House, but who can be elaborate enough on these Committees, and thus have it said of them—"Oh, he is a very good man on Committees." I think that under these circumstances it is the duty of this House to curtail this system of Select Committees, and the most effective way of doing this is to refuse to pay for these records of the senseless opinions of a lot of people whose views are not worth anything.

MR. G. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I am sorry the Government have had to ask for a Supplementary Vote; but, at the same time, under all the circumstances, I feel bound to support the Government. However much we may sneer at these Committees in general, it will, at any rate, be admitted that this Sweating Committee is bringing out a great deal of very valuable evidence, which amounts to something far more important than the opinions of experts—though, to my mind, the opinions of experts have their value. We do not as yet know what will be the outcome of this inquiry. The Committee have before them exceedingly valuable evidence on a very important question, which has formed a subject of debate in this House for a period of more than 30 years. I am sorry the question raised by my hon. Friends has been brought forward on this Vote, because, although I am strongly in favour of retrenchment in every possible shape, I, nevertheless, feel it my duty on this matter to vote with the Government.

Colonel Nolan

MR. BIGGAR: The hon. Gentleman who has just spoken thinks that the opinions of experts are valuable; but in my view the opinions of experts are of no value at all; and, indeed, it is a recognized fact that there is no kind of evidence which is of so little value as that which is given by experts. I do not think the remarks of the hon. Member have added to the reasons for passing this Vote.

*MR. CREMER: I would merely point out that if the proposal I have made to reduce the Vote by £500 were carried, there would still be £409 left, which would be ample to meet the cost incurred by the Sweating Committee.

The Committee divided: Ayes, 45; Noes, 90. Majority, 45. (Division list, No. 8.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

MR. SEXTON: This is a vote which has reference to a disgracefully bad Estimate. (A laugh.) I am glad to hear the Attorney General laugh. The right hon. Gentleman has not had much opportunity for laughing of late. If hon. Members will examine the Estimate they will find that there ought to be a surplus; but, whereas certain receipts for the year ought to have amounted to £15,000, as a matter of fact they only reached £8,000. I ask the Financial Secretary to explain how so gross an error has been committed by the Department. I have also to complain that in connection with a Vote of this kind the information supplied by the Treasury is far too meagre, seeing that they have long had the necessary information to guide them in framing the Estimate. I think we have a right to be told what the nature of the receipts is, and what is the amount of each separate item.

MR. JACKSON: I shall be glad to give the hon. Member the explanation for which he asks. I quite admit that if the proposition of the hon. Member could be laid down with accuracy, this Estimate would deserve the epithet he has applied to it. But the hon. Member is not correct in saying that the Treasury have had for many months the materials to guide them in framing the Estimate. In this particular case the Supplementary Estimate has been rendered necessary in consequence, as the hon. Member has pointed out, of a deficiency in the estimated receipts. The reason is, that the Land Commissioners had imposed upon them by an Act of Parliament passed two years ago certain duties in connection with ascertaining the value of extraordinary tithes. The costs of this work were to be paid by the tithe owners, who are the persons for whom the work is done. The work had been done, or nearly done, when certain draft certificates were issued by the Land Commissioners, to which an objection was taken by the tithe owners concerned, who were of opinion that the Commissioners were not construing the Act in accordance with the law. A request was made that time should be given—first to enable them to take counsel's opinion, and secondly to enable them to decide whether they should take further action in the matter. That occupied some time, and of course the tithes could not be collected. After taking time to consider the matter, the tithe owners came to the conclusion that they would not take the case to a Court of Law. Owing to the delay, the collection of the charges which fall upon the tithe owners has been postponed. I hope that the collection will be made complete next year, but the hon. Member will see that the delay is one which the Treasury could not possibly have foreseen when the Estimate was framed. I must say that I incline to the opinion that some pressure should be put upon the Department to make the collection promptly.

MR. SEXTON: Has the question been settled up to date?

MR. JACKSON: Yes.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I do not think that the Secretary to the Treasury has given a very satisfactory explanation of this Vote; but I hope the Exchequer will profit in the coming year by what it has lost last year. I regret to say that the Estimate has been placed before the Committee in such a way that it is impossible to understand it. I think it would have been better if the Secretary to the Treasury had commenced by explaining what the Vote is, instead of leaving the Committee to find it out for themselves.

MR. MOLLOY (King's County, Birr): This matter was discussed four months ago, and the Secretary to the Treasury gave then the explanation which he has given now. He told the House that there had been dispute with the tithe owners, who in the end declined to go into a Court of Law, and agreed to pay the demands made upon them. Having agreed to pay, I do not know why there should have been any further delay in the collection of the money. I think it is a pity that the hon. Gentleman has not some little further explanation to give.

MR. LABOUCHERE: This seems to me to be a somewhat serious matter. It is notorious that the tithe owners throughout the country are gentlemen who exact the last penny of what is due to them, and now we have these gentlemen putting off payment when it is due from themselves. They said in the first instance that they must appeal to a Court of Law. That is an old trick. They had not the most remote intention of going to a Court of Law. They said they must take counsel's opinion, but counsel would at once advise them that they had no case. The next step upon the part of the Treasury should have been to insist upon immediate payment. The hon. Gentleman says he hopes the money will be collected by next year; but why should it not be paid at once? Why should not these gentlemen be dealt with as they deal with those who owe them tithes? What would happen to those who have to pay tithes if they said in the first instance that they would go to a Court of Law, next, that they had changed their mind, and then that they hoped to pay next year? No doubt it was right to give time to enable the tithe owners to take the case to a Court of Law, but when they refused to do so the Secretary to the Treasury, instead of coming on the public Exchequer, should have made the tithe owners pay up at once. I altogether object to make any kind of concession to the tithe owners.

MR. JACKSON: May I point out to the hon. Member that these circumstances arose under a special Act dealing with what is called Extraordinary Tithe, and had nothing to do with the general tithe arrangements?

In reply to MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox)—

MR. JACKSON said the charge was for work done by the Land Commissioners in connection with the Extraordinary Tithe.

MR. CALDWELL: Is there any deficiency under the head of Appropriations in Aid? You estimate your receipts at £15,000, whereas your actual receipts have only been £8,000. I want to know if a mistake was made in the Estimate?

MR. JACKSON: No; the sum will be ultimately realized.

MR. CALDWELL: When?

MR. JACKSON: I regret that I am unable to say, but under the Act the whole of the expense in connection with this particular work is recoverable from the persons for whom the work has been done. Therefore, whatever the expenditure may have been, it must be recovered.

MR. BIGGAR: I do not know whether I rightly understand the hon. Gentleman's explanation as to the reason why the money was not paid in the financial year, and why the Government have not taken proceedings to recover it. It must be remembered that these people are owners of property, and not paupers. As far as I understand the matter, certain work has been done by the Commissioners, for which the tithe owners have received full value, and are they the sort of men who should be allowed to make appeals for consideration in forma pauperis? They are men who can pay, and they ought to be made to pay. Unless the Government can give some better explanation of the reason why they have not collected this money, I think the Committee ought to reject the Vote.

MR. CONYBEARE: If the tithe owners find that this House is prepared to vote £3,000 in order to relieve them from embarrassment, I am afraid we shall have to whistle for any further payment from them. We know that when an Irish tenant is unable to pay his rent, the whole force of the law is put in motion to compel him. What I would suggest is, that there should be a little practical coercion in this country, in order to compel the landlords to pay their liabilities to the uttermost farthing. I shall, therefore, oppose the Vote, unless the Secretary to the Treasury gives an assurance that certain stringent clauses of the Irish Coercion Act shall be applied to English landlords. Let me call the attention of the Committee to the fact that what we are discussing now relates to circumstances which occurred in 1887, and not last year. The Commissioners report that, in accordance with the provisions of the Tithe Commutation Act, meetings were held in 266 parishes for the purpose of hearing the parties interested on both sides; that valuers were selected and appointed assistant Commissioners who, from their experience and knowledge, were likely to inspire confidence and to supply accurate information; that these assistant Commissioners had conducted numerous inquiries with marked ability and success; and that they had personally inspected the land, and deposited maps giving full particulars of the estates in respect of which extraordinary tithe was charged. In the end, the Commissioners issued draft certificates in relation to a number of representative parishes, in order to afford an opportunity to the tithe owners of carrying the case to the superior Courts. The Report of the Commissioners corroborates the statement of the Secretary to the Treasury to the letter; but it is dated January 31st, 1888. Yet we are told, more than a year afterwards, that perhaps some time next year the Treasury may be able to get in the money owing by the landlords. I think it is quite time that proceedings were taken against them to compel them to pay at once. I would suggest to the Government that they should, at any rate, require interest to be paid on money which has taken all this time to collect. The Commissioners say that they have been indebted to the Director General of the Ordnance Survey for the assistance he has lent; and they add that the work has been quickly and efficiently done, at a very moderate charge to the landowners. In their tenderness to the landlords, the Government have taken every measure to enable them to get the work done in the cheapest possible way. I think that, under all the circumstances, we have a right to press for some more satisfactory answer than we have yet received from the Government as to when they intend to make these people pay. I wish to make clear this point—that the business transacted by this Office ought to cover all the expenses.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order. The hon. Member is entirely out of order in discussing the Vote on general grounds.

MR. SEXTON: I think the Committee should bear in mind that the Question whether or not the House should vote this money depends on whether time enough has been allowed to these land-owners to pay the very moderate charges. The House has already voted more than enough for the expenses of the Department for the year, providing that the debts owing to it had been paid, as they should have been. We must be satisfied that reasonable diligence has been used in getting in the debts. Will the Secretary to the Treasury lay on the Table an account showing how long this money has been due, and when it ought to have been paid?

MR. JACKSON: I will make inquiries into the matter. I do not think it is possible to give the hon. Member what he asks. I am not sure it is quite correct to say that the money has been long due. The arrangements made for collecting the money are, I believe, as satisfactory as possible. It is collected by the Inland Revenue collectors, and is done in the cheapest possible way.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: I ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he has made such arrangements, as he promised in the debates last year, as will obviate the necessity for asking for another such Vote?

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order. The right hon. Gentleman is not entitled to discuss the Vote generally.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: I shall feel it my duty to divide against that Vote, unless I have an assurance that this is the last time we shall be asked to pass such a Vote.

MR. JACKSON: I am afraid that the right hon. Gentleman will have to divide the Committee then. I am not in a position to give such an assurance, and I am not prepared to say that it is either possible, desirable, or practicable to make, at a moment's notice, such an alteration in the charges as will defray the whole cost of the establishment.

MR. BIGGAR: Have proceedings been taken against these people to recover the money?

(3.) Motion made and Question proposed,

COLONEL NOLAN: This seems to be a very extravagant vote, and although I am not frightened at the amount, I must say I am astonished at the explanation which is given of it. We are told that the increase is due to the extra length of last Session. Well, all I can say is that if the Government had only arranged their business properly last Session, we should not have had to sit for so long a period, and we should not have been called upon to pay this heavy bill. Now I really think that the Government are not anxious to cut down the expenses of printing. A case occurred to-day in which I put a question and with a verbal answer to which I should have been perfectly content, but the Minister to whom it was addressed suggested that I should move for a Return, and consequently this necessitates the expenditure of £5 or £10, which might have been avoided. But to return to the long Session. Ministers muddled the time of the House, and I hope it will be a lesson to them. In the future I trust that they will give us short Sessions, and arrange their business properly. Meanwhile, in order to mark the sense of the House of their conduct, I move to reduce the Vote by £4,000. I think if we allow them one half of the sum they apply for, they ought to be satisfied.

Motion made, and Question, put “That a sum not exceeding £4,000 be granted for the said service.”—(Colonel Nolan.)

DR. CLARK (Caithness-shire): Will the hon. Gentleman tell us why we are called upon to pay £1,000 for two extra volumes of Hansard?

MR. W. L. JACKSON: The explanation is that until the present Session the arrangement with Mr. Hansard was that he should be paid £500 per volume, and, owing to the necessity of an Autumn Session, there were two extra volumes, for which we have to pay £1,000.

MR. MOLLOY: I understand that there is now a new Hansard, and there has been some difference made in the order of indexing. I think it would be of advantage to hon. Members if the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury would give Messrs. MacRae, Curtice & Co. a hint that it would be most convenient if they adhered to the old style of indexing. I am sure hon. Members would much prefer it.

MR. SEXTON: I share the astonishment of my hon. and gallant Friend, although I know he is not easily astonished; but my astonishment arises from a different cause. Instead of a heavy deficiency, I should have expected a surplus on this Vote, because last year the Government were very chary in granting Returns, especially affecting Ireland. I remember many cases in which we asked for Returns, such as lists of prisoners, depositions in magisterial proceedings and correspondence, which were refused. And they were refused on one of two grounds: either that they would take too much trouble to prepare, or that they were too long to print. The consequence was that the Irish Members were driven to the newspapers and to private correspondence for material for debate, instead of being supplied, as they ought to be, with printed Parliamentary Papers. And now I intend to ask the Government for an undertaking to treat us more liberally in this matter in the future if we pass this Vote on this magnificent scale. With regard to the extra volumes of Hansard, these are partly due to the prolongation of the Session, and partly to the undue prolixity of Ministers, which developed in a singular way last year. Undue prolixity is an incurable vice; but, in regard to the question as to how far the extra volumes of Hansard were necessary, I must point out that the prolongation of the Session was entirely due to the mismanagement and incompetence of Ministers, who persisted in taking votes on account, and deprived the House of Commons of its opportunities of criticizing the Estimates. Therefore, instead of asking the House of Commons to pay the £1,000, I think that the Ministers ought to pay the money themselves.

MR. F. W. ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I wish to ask how many houses of business are invited to tender for stationery. We all remember the iniquity——

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member is not entitled to discuss the Vote generally.

MR. CONYBEARE: I oppose this Vote on slightly different grounds to those advanced by my hon. Friend the Lord Mayor of Dublin. He objects to the Vote because Ministers have been too chary in giving us Parliamentary Papers. I oppose it because, in some respects, they have been too lavish. They have given us Returns in a form which we did not require. Take, for instance, the Blue Book containing what purported to be an official Report of the Mandeville trial—a most shameful and garbled Report——

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member cannot discuss the character of a report.

MR. CONYBEARE: I would not do that. I think I have characterised it in sufficiently strong terms——

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, Order! The hon. Member must not persist in thus speaking when called to order.

MR. CONYBEARE: I have not the slightest desire to be disorderly, neither will I be a toady. I was objecting to this Vote on certain grounds, but as I do not wish to disobey your ruling, I will resume my seat.

MR. F. W. ISAACSON: This Vote is described as for Stationery for the Houses of Parliament. I presume Stationery is required for this House, and therefore is it not in order to ask if proper estimates are obtained?

THE CHAIRMAN: This is a Supplementary Vote. The question which the hon. Member wishes to ask would be quite pertinent on the original Vote, but it is not on the Supplementary Vote.

MR. J. G. BIGGAR: I wish to know if the Stationery Committee are going to meet this year or not.

COLONEL NOLAN: As it appears the Printing Vote was under-estimated, I should like to know if the only Committee which has control of this matter ever met last year.

MR. JACKSON: There has been an alteration in the constitution of the Printing Committee. I believe the Committee did not meet last year, but my hon. Friend the Chairman gave a large amount of time to these matters, and I hope that this year there will be some real control exercised.

COLONEL NOLAN: As the Committee do not appear to have met, I think this Committee should mark its displeasure at the excess of the Vote—which arises from the lack of control—by making a substantial reduction.

MR. HALLEY STEWART (Lincolnshire, Spalding): Can the Secretary to the Treasury give us any details of the Vote? The explanation in the Estimate is simply that the Vote is unprecedentedly large. Why have we not a Return shewing the number of Papers printed, and a comparison with previous years?

MR. LABOUCHERE: I suppose the excess in the Vote is due to the fact that the Session was exceptionally long. But whose fault was it that Ministers muddled away the time of the House and necessitated this expenditure? I shall certainly divide against the Vote. A promise was made to us last Session that we should not have so many papers sent us, that instead we should have a list every morning of the papers printed, so that we might be able to ask for what we required. I thought it was perfectly understood—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order. That is a matter affecting the General Vote and not the Supplementary one.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 72; Noes 129: Majority 57.—(Division List, No. 10.)

Original Question put and agreed to.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I hope I shall be in order in expressing the hope which was expressed last year that Hansard will in future contain a table showing the number of times the Closure is applied in each Session.

THE CHAIRMAN: That does not come within the scope of the Supplementary Estimates.

Vote agreed to.

(4.) £292, Supplementary, for the Charitable Donations and Bequests Office, Ireland.

MR. SEXTON: This is a small vote but a remarkable one. The Treasury estimated the expenditure at £25, but they now come for an additional sum of £292. I am anxious to know whether the Board are allowed to institute actions on their own discretion, and whether the Returns so untested are paid out of the purse of the State.

MR. JACKSON: I believe the Board have full and complete power to take action when they think it is necessary for the protection of the funds.

MR. SEXTON: At the cost of the State?

MR. JACKSON: Yes, at the cost of the State. But I understand that there has been paid into the Exchequer rather more than has been paid out.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I should like to know how much was left by the Francis Murray's Charity, because I see that £235 of the State's money was spent in seeing that the trustee paid over the money.

MR. JACKSON: I don't know the amount of the Charity.

MR. CONYBEARE: It surely would prevent much discussion on matters of this kind if all the facts were clearly set forth in the Estimate—if, for instance, it was shown that there is really no charge upon the public purse.

MR. BIGGAR (Cavan): I cannot altogether admit that the explanation of the hon. Gentleman is perfectly satisfactory. As I understand, this Board in Dublin have power to spend money in law costs at their own discretion, whether or not they are likely to recover the debt or the costs either. I do not think that these people in Dublin should have the power to involve the Treasury in the expenses of litigation without first of all obtaining the consent of the Treasury. The Board are on more or less friendly terms with their Solicitor, and, of course, it is an extremely pleasant thing for him to run up a bill of costs when he knows that the British taxpayer is to bear the burden.

Vote agreed to.

(5) £12,000 Supplementary for Criminal Prosecutions, Sheriffs' Expenses, &c.

MR. JACKSON: Perhaps I may explain that owing to the passing of the Local Government Act last year a larger number of Sheriffs' claims will come in course of payment during this financial year than was anticipated. This, however is likely to be the last occasion on which this Vote will be taken in its present form.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I presume that upon this Vote I shall be in order in referring to the Edlingham burglary case. I am inclined to think that in this case there was a Treasury prosecution, and I am anxious to know whether the cost is included in this Vote.

MR. JACKSON: It is not.

Vote agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. JACKSON: I should like to explain that there is a slight error in the explanatory note—1887 having been printed for 1889. Under an Act passed last year and an Order made by the Lord Chancellor, certain changes have been made which came into operation on February 1, 1889, and it is to provide for the expense caused by these changes between February 1 and March 31 that this Vote is required. The increased cost will be covered by fees, so that no ultimate expense will be incurred.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton): This is a very small amount, but it raises a very great principle. This is an office which I venture to say is one of the most useless in the whole range of the Administration of this country, and is one against which the House of Commons has protested year after year, and which the last Government endeavoured to abolish so far as they could. At all events, they brought to an end a sinecure at the head of the office of something like £2,500 a year, and the intention was to bring the office itself to an end as soon as possible. The Secretary to the Treasury has alluded to an Act which was passed last Session. When that Bill was put from the Chair the Member who had the Bill under his care assured me that no additional expense would be thrown on the public by the Bill. To make assurance doubly sure, I asked, before I assented to the Third Reading, the Secretary to the Treasury to state that no additional expense would be incurred. The hon. Gentleman then stated that he had made such arrangements that no additional expense would be put upon the country. Now this is an office which has absolutely nothing to do. I believe that a Return presented to Parliament last year showed that only eight titles had been submitted to this office which has cost us in the year £2,796. I object to vote one single shilling to this Land Registry Office. If changes should be made in the office let them be made by Act of Parliament. I know that we shall be told that the fees will cover this additional expenditure. But what I say is, let expenditure be incurred when the fees come in and do not let expenditure be incurred until the fees do come in. I shall certainly divide without a moment's hesitation against this Vote, and I hope the Government will not persist in committing the House to this foolish expenditure.

MR. MOLLOY: This office has been under discussion for several years, and I rise especially for the purpose of saying that last year when the vote was under consideration, a distinct promise was given that no further expenditure would be incurred in the office. Now, however, additional expense has been incurred in consequence of the introduction of new arrangements under an Order from the Lord Chancellor. That these arrangements have been made under an Order of the Lord Chancellor is, in my opinion, sufficient reason why hon. Members on both sides of the House should vote against this expenditure.

MR. CONYBEARE: I am exceedingly glad the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton has taken a stand upon this matter. On what ground does the Secretary to the Treasury anticipate that the costs will be more than covered by the increase of fees? What alterations have taken place to induce us to suppose that the fees will be increased? I should also like hon. Members to observe that under Sub-Head A. we are asked to vote £50 for two ordnance surveyors and civil assistants. Now it has transpired in the course of the discussion on the Vote of the Land Commissioners, that some of these very surveyors had been lent by the Government to the land owners at an exceedingly moderate charge. While that is the case, we are asked to pay additional sums to similar officers under this Vote. It appears to me that if the Government had been more chary in lending Government employés to land owners, there would not have been any necessity to ask for the £50 shown under the Sub-Head A.

MR. JACKSON: The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton says I gave some promise in regard to the Bill referred to. I confess I cannot recall it to my recollection, but I will not question the statement of the right hon. Gentleman. The hon. Member for the Camborne Division has referred to the money set down for ordnance surveyors and civil assistants. These gentlemen, however, will not be paid unless they are employed, and they will not be employed unless there is work for them to do.

SIR JOHN SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I hope that the Committee will not vote this extra money, because the Land Registry Office is a complete sham. In my own opinion, the office is simply kept up at large expense, and is really a blind to prevent reforms in the land system.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I will not go into the question of whether this office ought to be abolished; but I should like to point out that we already pay for this office the sum of £2,796 a year. The work is infinitesimal, and yet, when a little extra work is thrown upon the office, it seems that, according to the opinion of the Lord Chancellor, the country is to be saddled with additional expense in consequence.

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I may remind the House that some two years ago when an appointment carrying a salary of £2,500 a year became vacant it was not filled up by the Lord Chancellor, who then stated that some slight clerical assistance would probably be necessary to do the work of the office in relation to transfer of titles. That was mentioned at the time, and as I understand this extra clerk is required in consequence of the larger reduction previously made. I believe the hon. Gentleman opposite who took a considerable part in the passing of the Bill last year, is aware the office does more work now than in years gone by.

should be an increase in the estimate for the expenses of the Land Registry Office. It will be remembered that in the form in which I introduced the Bill of last Session, it was proposed to include bankruptcy in the encumbrances with which the Bill has to deal, but this was dropped out because we found that to include it would add materially to the expense. Certainly we were under a strong conviction that the expenses of the office should not be increased. Speaking as one who has had some little experience of it, I may express the opinion that the Land Registry Act of 1875 has been a complete failure. I remember one transaction in which I was concerned when the cost of transferring an estate of £3,000 from the vendor to purchaser was run up to £600. That ought not to be. I am glad to think that in a Bill introduced in "another place," and which was before this House last year, there is evidence that the difficulties of the situation are realised; and I believe that when that Bill comes again before us, the repetition of such a scandal—for it is nothing less—will be prevented in future. But, meanwhile, is it expedient to add to the expense of the maintenance of this office? So far as the little Act with which I was connected last year is concerned, upon which all parties were agreed, as an addition to security of title, all we did was to give to a useless staff something to do to justify their existence so as to enable them to while away the hours public officials sometimes spend in their office, and to prevent the tedium of official life pressing too heavily upon them. Assuredly, I would have been no party to adding to the charge on the taxpayer for the expenses of this office. I can, of course, only speak from outside knowledge; but I cannot believe it is necessary to add to the staff in order to transact the very simple duties imposed upon it by the Act of last year; and it is certainly a source of considerable disappointment to me to find that a Bill, which passed with the approval of all parties and on the understanding that no additional burden should be imposed, should now be made the—I will not say pretext—the reason for this increase. Of course, I understand that the Secretary to the Treasury cannot help himself.

MR. JACKSON: I thought I had explained that this is merely a transfer of a clerk from the Supreme Court, not an additional burden put upon the taxpayers for his salary. He was transferred because of his competency for the work—technical work only to be done by a man specially trained for it. He will be paid according to the extent of his services.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: The answer to that is that if the clerk has been transferred from the Supreme Court his salary has already been voted in the Estimates for the year, and, therefore, there is no necessity at all for this additional Estimate. We know by experience what these transfers mean, and how they work out. I trust the hon. Member for Stockport, who has had considerable experience in these scandals of the Supreme Court, will give us his assistance in this matter, and show what the staff of this Land Registry Office is. The Attorney General says this is owing to a reduction made when the late Government was in office. What we did was to strike out a sinecure office, which had been often so called, of £2,500 a year. What was left behind for this office, the character of which my hon. Friend adequately described? There is a Vice-Registrar with £1,500; a Chief Clerk with £400; a Second Clerk with £350; and a third with £250. With all this staff they, in addition, charge for copying, engrossing, and extra business £220. There is also a porter, a housekeeper, and an allowance for assistance. Under the circumstances, I am not disposed to vote even £6 additional to the office. The hon. Member for Haddington has confirmed my statement and repeated it. I should have opposed the Third Reading if—the Secretary of the Treasury says he does not recollect it, but it was some responsible Member of the Government—if the Government had not said that there should be no increase in the cost of working this office. It was on the faith of this pledge that the Bill passed. I trust the right hon. Gentleman will not carry the Vote to a Division now, but will allow it to be raised in a proper form on the Estimates.

MR. JACKSON: I should have thought the right hon. Gentleman, with his long experience, would have known that, although the sum might be voted in the Vote for the Supreme Court, it is not possible to pay the charge for the Land Registry Vote under that for the Supreme Court.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: He is now a Clerk of the Supreme Court.

MR. JACKSON: I beg pardon, he is not; he is transferred to the Land Registry. The right hon. Gentleman says the salary has been voted and the clerk is paid, but he is in error, it is absolutely impossible that he could be paid for one purpose out of money voted for another.

*SIR W. BARTTELOT (Sussex, North-west): I am loathe to intervene in this discussion, but I remember how strongly, on a former occasion, protest was made against additional expenditure on this account. On many grounds, into which I will not now enter, I would appeal to my right hon. Friend not to proceed with the Vote for this additional sum. We have been told over and over again that this Vote was not to be increased, but decreased. Though the increase is small, I must object to it. Once get this extra clerk there, and you cannot get rid of him. It is an unwise thing to propose any addition, and I certainly cannot support such an increase.

*MR. CHILDERS: I hope the Government will yield to this advice. The effect of the Vote appears to be simply adding another clerk to the three or four who have nothing to do. I hope the Government will give way.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The fact is this clerk has been borne on the Supreme Court Staff and he has been transferred.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: Why?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: To discharge this duty and carry out the provisions of the Statute passed last year. He has been transferred, and it is not possible to pay this clerk under the Vote for the Supreme Court. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Fowler) shakes his head—if he can be paid out of the Supreme Court Vote I would not ask the House for this Vote. But he cannot be so paid, and I do not think that the right hon. Gentleman would wish to deprive the clerk of the salary he would have received had he remained on the staff of the Supreme Court. However, I will inquire into the circumstances. No one desires more than I do to diminish the expenditure on Land Registry, or that it should disappear altogether; but the House will see that in our desire for economy we should not be justified in depriving a clerk who has been doing work for the public service—whether the work is good or bad—we are not justified in depriving him of his salary. But I will inquire into the circumstances, and if it is possible to make the payment under the Supreme Court Vote then that shall be done. Meantime, we withdraw the Vote.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(6) £20,000, Supplementary, Police—Counties and Boroughs, Great Britain.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): This is for the purpose of discharging the contributions for pay and clothing of police up to September 29 last year. That date is six months past, and I should have thought that if the Treasury had been brisk in their business they might have closed this account. Why is it not closed? When is it likely to be? Will it be on the regular Estimates, or afford matter for another Supplementary Estimate?

THE UNDER SECRETARY FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam): The hon. Member will observe this is for money under the Accounts of 1888. The 1888-9 Estimates brought this matter up to the end of 1887; and of course, at that time, the Local Government Bill was only in preparation, and it is not the rule in the Estimates to anticipate the effect of proposed legislation.

MR. SEXTON: I did not say or suppose so.

MR. STUART WORTLEY: It was not possible at that time to close the Accounts, or ask the authorities to present their Accounts in a new form.

MR. SEXTON: The hon. Gentleman misapprehends my point, which is this—that the Accounts are for 1888, and we are now advanced in 1889. Why has the Treasury not been able to close the account and settle this in the Estimates?

MR. STUART WORTLEY: The original Accounts go up to the end of 1887, and these are the amounts by which they fall short up to the date given. I may explain that under the old system some local authorities send in accounts for payments for which they are actually liable on September 29, while others claim in anticipation of payments becoming due. This £20,000 is necessary to close the old account.

MR. SEXTON: The hon. Gentleman says the practice varies; but surely this is a matter on which the Treasury should have given notice to the local authorities?

MR. STUART WORTLEY: Correspondence has taken place, but necessarily after the preparation of the Estimates. This Supplementary Estimate is the consequence.

Vote agreed to.

(7) £600, Supplementary, Reformatory and Industrial Schools, Great Britain.

*MR. DONALD CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): When we are asked to spend more money on Reformatory and Industrial Schools it seems a fair opportunity for putting the question whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to extend to Scotland the power of establishing day Industrial Schools, such as exist in England?

When the point was raised last Session, we were led to suppose that the power would be extended to the School Boards in Scotland; but we found that a Bill introduced in another place, having reference to Industrial Schools, excluded Scotland. My statement that it did so was controverted by the Home Secretary, and at the time I had not a copy of the Bill for reference, as I naturally thought he would have known the contents of the Bill, which issued from his own Department. However, an assurance was ultimately given that Scotland was to be put on the same footing with England. I hope that assurance still holds good.

*MR. STUART WORTLEY: So far as I am able to answer for the intentions of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, it is intended to place Scotland in reference to day Industrial Schools on an equality with England. It is our policy to make the system uniform as far as possible, and it was by inadvertence that this was not effected as regards Day Industrial Schools in the Bill referred to.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I think this supports the contention of Scotch Members that this Department should be placed under the control of the Secretary for Scotland, and I hope at an early day that transfer will be carried into effect.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): Constant complaint is made of the very high standard taught in these schools. You give children from the lowest ranks high class teaching, especially in arithmetic.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The Vote refers exclusively to Industrial Schools.

DR. CLARK: To that I was speaking.

Vote agreed to.

(8.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Supplementary sum, not exceeding £200, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1889, for certain Expenses of the Law Agent in Scotland for Government Departments."

*DR. CAMERON (Glasgow): I rise, Sir, to oppose the grant of this money, and the Government know that they have no right to make this demand upon us for this sum. They tell us now what we could not get from them last Session; it was merely by chance that a Question elicited the information we now have, that these are not expenses altogether for Peterhead Harbour Works, but that the legal expenses of the Sheriff of Inverness have very much more to do with it. The Vote is asked for to pay the expenses incurred, by Sheriff Ivory in a Civil action for libel raised against him for publishing, in violation of his duty, the contents of a confidential report. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers) was present at the time this subject was raised on a former occasion, and he, seeing that the item would give rise to considerable debate, suggested that the Vote should be put off, and that, in the meantime, the House should have the papers giving the information asked for. Well, we now have the papers, and nothing can be more conclusive than the evidence they give that the Government have no justification whatever in making this demand. If hon. Members have read the papers, they will find that Sheriff Ivory is not only guilty of a libel, but that his whole writings are a series of libels, and his official documents one long string of libels against many persons, including myself. He cannot even allow the late Lord Advocate to escape, because he thinks that the right hon. Gentleman's influence with the Treasury was used against him. Sheriff Ivory, as the House will remember, was in charge of military expeditions, which were sent to Skye a couple of years ago, and he carried out those operations in a manner which appeared to myself, to other Scotch Members, and to a very large portion of the Scotch people, to be an illegal, brutal, and unjustifiable manner. This matter has been brought before the House repeatedly. We have shown how he broke the law in the matter of the secrecy of Postal Telegraph; how he went to a Post Office and bullied the postmaster and the telegraph clerk until he obtained the information he sought from a telegram. He denied that, but he has published a Report containing a number of private telegrams which he obtained illegally, and he made that publication in an utterly illegal and unjustifiable manner. Whoever has happened to cross the path of Sheriff Ivory has been crushed in the most vindictive manner. Such was the case with the Sheriff's Clerk Depute of Portree. He had the misfortune to come across Sheriff Ivory, and has been hounded out of his post. A telegraphist, from whom he obtained information illegally, was so persecuted that she was unable to remain at Portree, and applied to be transferred to Glasgow. That is a matter within my personal knowledge. He quarrelled even with the Chief Constable of the Police. Well, in the course of this expedition searches were made; but these searches were conducted with no regard to moderation. Whole villages were ransacked; troops surrounded houses, and every room was invaded, no distinction being made, though invalids and females were therein. Now, it seemed to us that this was a matter of Constitutional right; that the sanctity of these crofters' homes should not be allowed to be violated without trying to obtain redress in a Court of Law. A subscription was raised, a considerable amount of money was subscribed, and an action was commenced. Three actions were raised, one against the Prosecutor Fiscal and two against Mr. Sheriff Ivory, one of these actions being taken by a cow-herd. It seems that a detachment of military was sent into a district to capture a certain individuals who had deforced a sheriff's officer on the previous day, and a man being espied on the top of a hill, in spite of there being no presumption of guilt against him, and though no warrant had been taken out for his capture, he was siezed and imprisoned by Sheriff Ivory.

Subsequently, however, there being no evidence against the man, he was liberated, and an action was brought against Sheriff Ivory for the part he had taken in the matter. The Court, however, held that, under the circumstances, the action of the Sheriff was privileged, and a verdict was given in his favour. The second case—that of Stewart—sprung out of a Report which Sheriff Ivory wrote to the Lord Advocate, and this Report was, of course, in itself a confidential and a privileged document. Sheriff Ivory, however, appears to have been aggrieved by something said against him by a clergyman in Skye, and, instead of availing himself of the ordinary means that the law or the newspapers put in his power to vindicate himself against the assertions of this clergyman, he thought it would be more dignified to devote a large portion of his Report to the vindication of his action, and to publish that Report in the newspapers. If the Home Secretary had thought it desirable to make this Report public, Sheriff Ivory must have known that the right hon. Gentleman would have done so by laying it on the Table of the House. But Sheriff Ivory did not consult the Home Secretary, and, as a matter of fact, the then Home Secretary, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, was dead against the publication of it, and positively refused to put the document on the Table of the House. Sheriff Ivory alleged that in a conversation with the Lord Advocate of that time he had received permission to publish the Report; but that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Clackmannan (Mr. J. B. Balfour) denied. Sheriff Ivory, in his Report, spoke of Stewart as being the ringleader of the mob, an accusation which the result of Stewart's trial proved to have been entirely unfounded. Actions having been brought against him, the Sheriff applied to the Crown to undertake his defence, on the ground that the action which formed the subject of the cases was taken by him as servant of the Crown. The Lord Advocate replied that if the Sheriff had acted properly, he would be able to defend his character, in which case, if he found himself unable to recover his costs, it would be for the Crown to say whether they would not hold him free from the loss of his expenses. Here a question arose as to whether the Treasury had taken any steps to see that Sheriff Ivory had asked that his expenses from the pursuer in one of the cases where his defence was sustained before the indemnity was paid him by the Government. The fact was that, although there was sufficient money in the hands of the pursuer to pay the expenses, they were never asked for payment. Sheriff Ivory did not consider it a dignified course to ask for his expenses, and in spite of this the Secretary to the Treasury was prepared to pay the money. In Stewart's case, the Lord Advocate refused to recommend the Treasury to pay the expenses, asserting that the action of the Sheriff had been most imprudent, and it was utterly unusual, and opposed to official precedent, to publish a Report such as that supplied by the Sheriff without official sanction in writing. In the course of the correspondence which ensued it was stated that Sheriff Ivory was acting in bona fides, and believed he had the sanction of the Lord Advocate for what he had done. Well, one circumstance threw great doubt upon Sheriff Ivory's feeling in the matter—namely, that when he published it he prefaced it with a lie—with a statement to the effect that it had been placed before a meeting of the Commissioners of Supply of Inverness-shire. I asked a Question about this, and was told that Sheriff Ivory had never laid the Report before the Commissioners of Supply of Inverness. This piece of duplicity on the Sheriff's part seems to me to be matched by the way that the matter was brought under our notice last Session, this Vote being put down as "Peterhead Harbour, Woods and Forests," and so on. I hold that to pass this Vote would be a gross insult to the people of Scotland. There is not a man in the whole of that country who has been so severely criticized as Sheriff Ivory, and there is not a man there who has given anything like the occasion for censure that he has given. After in vain approaching this House to seek redress, and being repulsed by Parliament—or the Parliament House element that has control in this House of Scotch affairs—we took the only means to have questions of important Constitutional rights settled. We—a large section of the Scotch people—were determined to put an end to these high-handed proceedings on Sheriff Ivory's part, so we took the only course in our power. We subscribed to a fund to enable the question to be tried in the Law Courts, and there, forsooth, because Sheriff Ivory is found to have been wrong, or because it does not suit Sheriff Ivory to send in his bill of costs, the Treasury magnanimously come forward and make him a present of the whole sum out of the public money. That, I say, is an insult to the people of Scotland, and I defy the Lord Advocate to get up and defend it without putting a deliberate slight upon his Predecessor. In Beaton's case the agents for the pursuer were prepared to pay Sheriff Ivory's expenses, but he did not apply for them. The Treasury paid them, and in recommending their payment, the late Lord Advocate, I contend, showed the Sheriff too much favour. In the second case the then Lord Advocate went dead against the whole affair, being unable to see any reason whatever to recommend a grant of money. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Clackmannan said nothing to justify Sheriff Ivory; and I should like to know why that right hon. Gentleman's letter, which was laid before the Lords of the Treasury, is not included in the papers which have been supplied to the House? I ask the attention of the Secretary to the Treasury to the fact of the omission of this letter. The calumnious and mendacious attacks of Sheriff Ivory upon myself and others have been put in the papers—why could not the Government have spared a page for the letter of the late Lord Advocate, especially in view of the fact that they found their whole defence on that letter? I suppose it did not suit their purpose.

MR. JACKSON: It was private.

*DR. CAMERON: Then why did the Government go out of their way to act on this private document in the teeth of the official advice of their own Legal Adviser? Now, I have laid before the House as briefly as I can the facts of this case. We shall require to have a full explanation. I shall probably have to recur to the matter again, as I am certain we shall have a good deal of shuffling, and that it will be necessary to put the facts very clearly

[“Oh, oh!”] Well, I can only judge by what has already taken place. The matter is a small one from a monetary point of view, but it is a large one in point of principle; and I venture to say that if the Treasury officials had principle at heart, as the amount in question is so small, they would rather have made a present of this £200 to Sheriff Ivory in payment of his expenses, as private subscribers have been content to do on the other side, than allow the case to be discussed in the House. I shall move the reduction of the Vote by the whole sum—that is to say, I shall oppose the Vote.

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has certainly imported a tone of acrimony into the discussion of this sum of £200, which has already been amply explained, because he has explained that while his speech purports to criticize the action of the Government in refunding this money to a public servant, yet he personally has this complaint to make against Sheriff Ivory—namely, that Sheriff Ivory has defamed him (Dr. Cameron).

*DR. CAMERON: I made no complaint. I merely mentioned it as a matter of fact. It does not concern me.

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: He mentioned that as a matter of fact incidentally, and then, anxious that persons in a responsible position should not defame others, proceeds to use against Sheriff Ivory language which, if used outside this House, would be distinctly held to be defamatory. The question is, how far are public officers to be defended by their superiors in this House, when Members of Parliament use language against them here which, if used elsewhere, would be clearly actionable? This matter is a very clear one. In the first place, the hon. Gentleman has not mentioned the libel alleged to have been uttered by Sheriff Ivory. What Sheriff Ivory said was that a certain person was the ringleader of a mob and the chief promoter of lawlessness in the district. But under what circumstances was this written? Why, Sheriff Ivory, with the approval of the Government, went down on an expedition to arrest those who were the ringleaders in what were unquestionably lawless proceedings. He went down and executed a most difficult, delicate, and invidious duty, and on his return it became necessary for him to write a Report of the result of his proceedings. That Report was presented to the Lord Advocate. The document he prepared contained a full report of what had taken place, and incidentally a person was named as one of the ringleaders of the mob. That was not an opinion of Sheriff Ivory's; but he founded his statement upon the distinct information of those accountable to him upon the subject; and therefore, in making his statement to the Lord Advocate, Sheriff Ivory was doing no more than his duty. But the matter did not end there. He came to town and saw the Lord Advocate, and the result of that interview was that Sheriff Ivory carried away the impression that the Lord Advocate recommended or told him to send his Report to the newspapers. The reason why that was a plausible step was very obvious. It was because defamatory statements had been made against this learned Sheriff, and because every attempt was being made by agitators to bring him into disrepute, and it was only just that in some form or other the public should have brought before them the lines of his defence. That was Sheriff Ivory's opinion, and the opinion of the Lord Advocate. The hon. Gentleman the Member for the College Division of Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) allows that if Sheriff Ivory, instead of sending his Report to the papers, had placed it before the Government, and the Government had laid it upon the Table of the House, it could then have been published.

*DR. CAMERON. I beg pardon. I distinctly said that the Home Secretary refused to lay it upon the Table.

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: But he pointed out that it was in the power of the Government to publish it. Clearly Sheriff Ivory could have obtained it publication. He could have sent his Report to the Police Committee of Inverness, and they would have been at liberty to publish it in one way or another. If that were all, there would have been no difficulty in getting the document published under the shelter of privilege, and then there could have been no action in respect of it. The sole technical point was this—that Sheriff Ivory sent the Report direct to the newspapers instead of to the authorities. Accordingly Sheriff Ivory's error lies not in the fact of publication, but merely in the mode of publication. The only point attempted to be made against Sheriff Ivory is the frankness and directness with which the publication was made. Sheriff Ivory was under the belief that the Lord Advocate had authorized the publication of the Report. I regret that my right hon. Friend the Member for Clackmannan is not here, because I have reason to know that he would have completely confirmed what is now stated. If any of his Colleagues sitting on the bench opposite are going to take part in the discussion, I presume they have been made acquainted with his views. There can be no doubt that Sheriff Ivory acted in the bond fide belief that the Lord Advocate had approved of the publication of the Report in the newspapers; and what the Government had to consider was whether an error—which was merely a misconception of what took place at an interview—was one which should be visited with liability for the payment of this £200? As a matter of fact, Sheriff Ivory had been discharging the duty of a public servant under great difficulties; and I trust that this House will affirm that it is the duty of the Government to sustain the action of public officers, even when they err, if they act in good faith. That is a point on which I hope the Committee will not give an undecided opinion, and it is the only question raised in the present discussion.

MR. CALDWELL: I think if the right hon. Gentleman the Lord Advocate had referred to the circumstances of the action, he would have seen that it was one which altogether precluded the idea of privilege. I cannot agree that, when an officer takes a certain action in the execution of his duty, he is invariably entitled to the protection of the Treasury. The ground of action in this particular case was that Sheriff Ivory was acting altogether outside his judicial functions. There could have been no action whatever based on the footing that Sheriff Ivory had acted according to the duty that devolved on him; but the sole ground of action was that he published this Report without authority, acting, in so doing, altogether outside his proper functions, and, therefore, having no title to protection. How was the matter decided? The then Lord Advocate stated very clearly that Sheriff Ivory, in publishing a confidential document, had not acted prudently.

It being midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Progress reported.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 8th March, 1889.

Their Lordships met, and having gone through the business on the paper (which consisted of the Second Reading of certain unopposed Private Bills) without debate,

House adjourned at half past Four o'clock, till Monday next, a quarter before Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 8th March, 1889.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

LONDON CENTRAL (SUBWAY) RAIL- WAY BILL (By Order).

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. SEAGER HUNT (Marylebone, W.): I rise for the purpose of moving that this Bill be read a second time on this day six months. It is a Bill which contains provisions of an exceedingly novel character. The line itself goes from nowhere and leads to nowhere; it is an experiment in the shape of construction, and it is to run right through some of the best streets of London—from St. James's Street to Shaftesbury Avenue, and then on to Holborn Circus. It will disturb people who have only recently been enabled to settle down in the locality; it will produce a great hindrance to trade; and, in addition, the Company will not be compelled to take the whole of the property their projected line will interfere with, because by one of the provisions of the Bill they can take what portion of a particular property they choose—that is to say, they can take the underground portion of a shop without being compelled to take that which is above ground. It runs through a street which is now one of the leading lines of communication between the North and South of London, and the competition which will necessarily spring up between the omnibuses and the railway for the traffic of the district will, in the end, be ruinous to both. So far as the capital is concerned, it is to consist of 74,950 ordinary shares of £10 each, and 500 deferred shares of £1 each, and the management and control of the undertaking will be virtually in the hands of the deferred shareholders. This is certainly one of the most novel features we have yet seen in connection with railway enterprize. There is another curious feature—namely, power to sell the railway to the London County Council, and when we come to look at the amount of capital proposed to be spent, the means of communication which already exist, and have regard to the fact that the undertaking is to be carried on solely by five gentlemen acting as directors, I think the House will agree with me that it is not a Bill that ought to be passed.

*MR. GAINSFORD BRUCE (Finsbury, Holborn): I beg to second the Amendment, and I regret that in addressing the House for the first time

I should have to ask the House to do what it is ordinarily very reluctant to do—namely, reject a Private Bill on the Second Reading. I hope, however, to be able to place before the House reasons why the Bill should be rejected. It is a scheme for carrying a railway from the top of St. James's Street to Holborn Circus in three sections—(No. 1) from St. James's Street to (No. 2) the south west corner of Shaftesbury Avenue; from Shaftesbury Avenue to Oxford Street, and (No. 3) from Oxford Street to Holborn Circus. The line, when constructed, will not be in communication with any other line of railway. The promoters may say that it is the beginning of a new system, and that it is capable of indefinite extension; but when we consider the enormous inconvenience and interference with traffic which must result from the carrying out of extensive works in great thoroughfares of London, I think hon. Members will concur with me that it ought not to be left to private individuals to lay down a line a mile and a half in length between any points that caprice may determine in the centre of London, leaving it to chance or accident to determine whether hereafter the scheme is capable of such development as to form a connecting link between distant parts of the Metropolis. In my opinion the public have suffered in times past from the too great readiness of Parliament to sanction partially developed railway schemes. Already London is cut up by railways; and the public, although they have suffered the maximum of inconvenience, have as yet derived only the minimum of accommodation. The line, when constructed, is to be worked by electricity. Professors of science, who also claim to be prophets, tell us that electricity is destined to supersede steam as the locomotive power; I am not concerned to doubt their prophecy, but all I say is that the time has not yet arrived. With the exception of the toy railway at Brighton, I am not aware that at present there is a single line which is worked by electricity, and it has not yet been determined that electricity can be used with such regularity and certainty as is necessary for business purposes. I think some stress ought to be laid on the humidity of the climate with which the electricians will have to cope. The undertaking is put forward as an experiment, but I wish the hon. Members for Stoke-upon-Trent (Mr. W. L. Bright) and Wolverhampton (Sir W. Plowden), whose names are on the back of the Bill, had, in the first instance, tried it in their own districts before attempting to carry it out in the Metropolis. I maintain that not only is the scheme in itself impracticable, but that the means by which it is proposed to carry it out are indicative of the unsoundness of the proposals in the Bill. The promoters seem to have ransacked every Parliamentary precedent in order to take advantage of every clause at any time sanctioned granting special favours to promoters of companies, so that the Company ask for the maximum of privilege and the public are deprived of nearly all the protection which the Land Clauses Act was intended to provide. For the first time in the history of legislation the promoters have introduced the principle of founders' shares. In comparatively recent times founders' shares have been introduced in Limited Liability Companies, founded on contract. It may be right, when a number of persons are brought together, to carry out a proposal that a founder should be remunerated somehow or other, but a proposal to pay a founder 900 per cent of the funds of the Company is very novel indeed, and involves a principle which I think the House will be very jealous to sanction. It may be right where the shareholders come in by agreement upon particular terms to pay 900 per cent, but this House cannot by Act of Parliament turn £500 into £5,000, and yet that is what this Bill does. Having regard to the fact that the Bill is an experiment, and taking into account also the mode by which it is proposed to carry it out, I think the House will do well to reject it.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Seager Hunt.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question"

MR. W. L. BRIGHT (Stoke-upon-Trent): There seems to be a great deal of misapprehension in regard to this Bill. The hon. Member for West Marylebone (Mr. Seager Hunt) began by saying that it is proposed to take underground property and leave that which is overhead. If he will take the trouble to examine the Bill, he will find that it is not true. Then he said that in certain streets omnibuses are careering to and fro from morning till night. That is exactly what we say—namely, that the street traffic is so great that it is necessary to divert some of it. As to the founders' shares, they are simply deferred shares, and they are provided for the simple purpose of paying the expenses of those who will have to construct the railway. The interest upon them will, however, be deferred until 5 per cent on the ordinary capital has been paid to the ordinary shareholders of the Company. I submit that if the Metropolitan and District Railways had been made upon this principle anyone who embarked his capital at the commencement of those schemes would, up to the present moment, never have realized a single sixpence out of them. So far as the clause in the Bill relating to the voting power of the deferred shareholders is concerned, we abandon the provision altogether, and agree that the ordinary shareholders shall have full control of the Company, and that the qualification of directors shall also be decided by the shareholders. The clause entitling the London County Council to buy the railway is a usual one, and simply entitles the Council to find money or take shares. Hon. Members will be aware that the City of London subscribed £300,000 to the Metropolitan Railway. These, however, are all of them questions of detail, and I submit that they can only be discussed properly in a Committee upstairs. The shopkeepers of Holborn oppose the Bill, and I find that a gentleman named Wallace has taken the chair at one or two meetings which have been called in opposition to the Bill. Mr. Wallace is a large shopkeeper in Holborn, and he is very indignant at this scheme; but I find that in 1884 this very gentleman stated that some thousands of persons were daily resorting to his premises from all parts of the Metropolis and the suburbs, and that any scheme that would give facilities of access cheaply, expeditiously, and comfortably, would be a boon. In the face of this declaration, can the House consider that the opposition of this gentleman is worth much? It is said that the omnibus fare is only one penny. Well, we are only going to charge a penny. But I submit that all the difficulties which have been raised are difficulties which ought to be settled in Committee; we are perfectly ready to face the Committee. We believe that we have sufficient evidence to prove our case; and we ask this House to read the Bill a second time.

*SIR R. N. FOWLER (London): I have presented a petition, Sir, very numerous signed, from my constituency against this Bill. It seems to me to involve a new movement as regards underground railways, and that we are hardly in a position to deal with the question piecemeal until this House has investigated the whole subject. Nearly 30 years ago, a very influential Committee of this House, presided over by the present Earl of Derby, inquired into the railway system of London. I think that the Metropolis owes a great deal to the labours of that Committee; and before we enter into the question again, I think it is desirable that we should appoint a strong Committee to inquire into the whole subject.

MR. ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I wish to enter my most emphatic protest against a Member of Parliament using the machinery of this House for the purpose of promoting public Companies in order to foist shares upon a misguided and gulled public. In this case we have an hon. Member, who represents Stoke-upon-Trent, coming here to teach the Metropolitan Members what is necessary for the benefit of London. We, the Metropolitan Members, are rather a numerous body, and we fancy that we know quite as much about London as an hon. Member who represents a constituency like Stoke-upon-Trent. And what is it that the hon. Member wishes the House to do? He asks us to sanction an additional expenditure of a million of money upon an ~~underground~~ railway, when many millions have already been expended on similar undertakings, and up to the present day the unfortunate shareholders have not received sixpence in the shape of dividends. I do not think that the machinery of the House of Commons ought to be employed in order to foist such schemes upon the public.

MR. COGHILL (Newcastle-under-Lyme): I cannot help regarding this scheme as one of the most foolish propositions ever submitted to this House. It is a Bill introduced in the interests of the Metropolis, yet the name of no Metropolitan Member is on the back of it; the only names which appear are those of the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent and the hon. Member for Wolverhampton. I think that if those hon. Members would devote a little more of their time to their own constituents instead of to the Metropolis their services would be of considerably more value than they are at present. Of all the streets of which we ought to be proud in London, St. James's Street is one of them. It is one of the finest streets in this capital or in any capital in Europe, and yet it is proposed to run an underground railway from the top end of it to Holborn Circus. I think it is most undesirable that such a railway should be allowed to run through the heart of London, and I can only characterize the circular sent to Members of this House this morning by the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent as an outrage upon good taste.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): The hon. Member who has just sat down commenced by saying that this is a Bill which concerns the Metropolitan Members alone; therefore, as representing Newcastle-under-Lyme, he gives us his views on the subject. The hon. Member attacked the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent, and he says that a circular has been sent round by which my hon. Friend is an outrage upon the House. I do not think it necessary to make any further reply than this—that the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down is an Unionist. Then, again, there was the hon. Member for Stepney (Mr. Isaacson). I never heard such arguments addressed to this House. If the hon. Member would bring forward a proposal that no Member of this House should be a Director of a Company, that would be a matter for discussion, but to say that he will oppose a Bill because of the Members whose names are on the back of it is going a little too far.

MR. ISAACSON: What I said was, that this was a Bill proposed by Members of Parliament who have no connection with the locality which it affects.

MR. LABOUCHERE: The hon. Gentleman protested against the use of the machinery of Parliament for the purpose of carrying Railway Bills. But how can a railway be made without the consent of Parliament? I came, as I always do, with a very open mind to the consideration of this measure. If my mind was closed at all, it was to a certain extent closed against the Bill, because I thought it contained an improper clause—namely, the clause which threw the voting power into the hands of a few individuals. That clause, however, has been entirely given up by the promoters of the Bill, and I find it is an entire mistake to suppose that there is any intention on the part of the promoters to take portions of houses. The proposal is simply this: to be allowed to take any portion of a cellar running under the roadway without being obliged to take the rest of the house. In the event of a dispute, the matter, by the Bill, is to be referred to a jury, so that full and ample compensation may be given to the owner of the house for any injury he may sustain. I do not, therefore, think that that is a point which ought to prevent us from referring the Bill to a Committee. It is said that the Bill will involve a disturbance of the streets and a hindrance to the traffic; but that is an argument against any improvement in the Metropolis. No doubt the construction of this Railway will disturb the streets, but I find that the Bill provides that a large subway shall be made by the Company to carry all the gas and water pipes, and I apprehend that when that subway is made the disturbance of the streets will be much less than it is at present, for we know by painful experience that at the present moment the streets are being taken up every day by some gas or water company. There will be a disturbance for once and all, and it will then, to a great extent, cease. We are told that we ought not to pass this Bill because it is likely to injure the omnibus traffic; but that is similar to the argument that was used against the institution of railways—namely, that they would injure the stage coaches. I, as an inhabitant of London, and one of the public, think that this line will be of great advantage to the public, and for that reason I shall vote in favour of it. I have no personal interest in it except as one of the public. The Member for the City of London (Sir R. Fowler) tells us that we ought to appoint a Committee to investigate the railway system in London. We have already had a Committee, and it gave us the Underground Railway system that already exists in London, and this Bill simply proposes to add to it. The real question is this, whether prima facie this is a system which ought to be submitted to a Select Committee, and I think it is.

*MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): No doubt this is a scheme which involves many proposals of considerable novelty. It proposes to run under a very important part of London, commencing from the top of St. James' Street, and it proposes to use a power of locomotion which as yet has been practically untried. There may be some practical difficulty in carrying out the scheme, and the line may prove to be unworkable, but I think the case presented by the promoters is one which is entitled to reasonable examination. It will be backed up by guarantees of the usual character, and all doubtful questions, whether engineering or financial, or the relations between the Company and the Metropolitan authorities, will be closely examined by a Committee, to which alone we can look for a solution of such questions. I do not think that the hon. Member for Holborn (Mr. Gainsford Bruce), who spoke with great ability against the Bill, adduced a single argument which might not be brought against any scheme, or which ought to prevent us from referring the Bill to a Select Committee in the usual form. There was one provision in the Bill which was of a character that I think no Committee would pass, and if it were accepted by a Committee I do not think it would be sanctioned by the House itself—namely, the proposal that the founders' shares should be able to outvote or to nullify any vote of the ordinary shareholders. It was a provision rashly inserted in the Bill, and I am glad to hear from the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent that it has been entirely abandoned. The mere creation of founders' shares is an item of novelty, but it does not appear to be one that ought not to be investigated with perfect fulness. There may be no reason for believing that founders' shares, properly controlled, may not be a judicious way of meeting the preliminary expenses of schemes of this nature. I would suggest to the House that we should act upon the ordinary principles which guide us in regard to Private Bills, and refer this measure to a Select Committee, who will have full power to consider all the points which have been raised.

*MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): As a Metropolitan Member and one who has been in London all his life, I think the great object we ought to have at heart is the provision of facilities for moving readily and cheaply from one part of the Metropolis to the other. Now, the only argument I have heard against this railway is that it is an experiment. If the House of Commons had thrown out every railway scheme which was an experiment, I am afraid that we should have been in a state of barbarism as regards travelling at this moment. I have no doubt that if this scheme can be successfully carried out it will be of immense value. The idea that it will ruin the omnibus traffic is a very old, fashioned notion. The Underground Railway, so far from ruining the omnibuses as was originally predicted, has greatly added to their traffic.

MR. SEAGER HUNT: What I said, or meant to say, was that the omnibus fares at this moment are very low, and that the construction of this railway is likely to bring about a competition between the omnibuses and the railway which will reduce the fares and make the traffic ruinous to both parties.

*MR. BARTLEY: That is the argument which was used when the omnibus fares were much higher than they are now, but the London General Omnibus Company manage to pay a dividend of 10 per cent. I trust that the Bill will, as is usual in such cases, be referred to a Select Committee, and that the scheme will prove to be a useful addition to the system of underground railways.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): It is very rarely that I take part in the discussion of a Private Bill, but I think that we should be adopting a strong course if we were to refuse to refer this or any other Railway Bill to a Select Committee. There are, no doubt, questions of great importance involved in this proposal, but they will receive full consideration at the hands of a Committee, and the House must recollect that in reading the Bill a second time it will not be parting with its jurisdiction in the matter, because if, after the investigation upstairs, the House is dissatisfied with the proposals contained in the Bill, it will always have the power of throwing it out upon the Third Reading. I quite agree with the hon. Member for Islington (Mr. Bartley) that it is of the utmost importance to provide all classes of society, and especially the humbler classes, with facilities for cheap travelling. To throw out a Bill of this kind on the Second Reading would, I think, be an unusual and an unwise course, and therefore, although I do not often vote upon a Private Bill, I shall vote in favour of this.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I am not going to oppose the Second Reading of the Bill, but I propose to reserve to myself the right to oppose it upon the Third Reading if I think it necessary. I came down to the House determined to vote against the Second Reading, but the promoters have now withdrawn some of the most objectionable clauses. I think the Bill is one which might be carefully investigated by a Select Committee.

Question "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and referred to a Select Committee.

QUESTIONS.

IRELAND—CONSTABLE M'NEANY.

MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if it has been reported to him that Constable M'Neany pointed in a threatening manner his revolver at a man named Patrick O'Donnell, on 28th January, in County Donegal; if other constables have been reported in a similar way; and, if he will make inquiries as to complaints on the subject?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, East): The Constabulary Authorities report that it is the case that O'Donnell has alleged that the constable pointed a revolver at him, and threatened to shoot him. The case has been returned for trial at the Assizes to be held in a few days. No other constables appear to have been reported in a similar way. I shall, of course, make full inquiry as to any specific complaints on the subject.

INFRINGEMENTS OF THE COAL MINES REGULATION ACT, 1888.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the workmen employed in Knockterra Pit appointed Mr. Keir Hardie, their Union Secretary, to intimate to the manager their appointment of a check-weigher; whether the manager refused to accept the intimation from Mr. Hardie; whether the Mines Inspector for the district refused to interfere in the matter; and, whether, in view of these facts, a body of workmen have not power to appoint their Union Secretary to make an intimation on their behalf; and, if they have such power, on what grounds the Inspector of Mines refused to prosecute the manager for a breach of "The Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1888," in having prevented the check-weigher from performing his duties after such legal notice had been given? I beg also to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether notice of the election of a check-weigher at Knockterra Pit was made to the manager in writing, signed by two of the workmen; whether, on the morning following the said notice being given, the two men signing it were dismissed and the check-weigher prevented by force from performing his duty; and, whether this case was reported to the Inspector of Mines, who caused an investigation to be made, and found the facts to be as recited above; and, if so, whether it is in contemplation to prosecute the manager for a contravention of the provisions of the Mines Act; and, if not, can he explain for what reason?

THE HOME SECRETARY (Mr. H. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, East): Mr. Keir Hardie wrote a letter to the overman of the Knockterra pit informing him that Richard Young had been duly elected check-weigher by the miners employed in the pit. He did not state that he was appointed by the workmen to give this notice, and the owners of the pit refused to accept it. The inspector, on being appealed to, wrote to both parties, saying it was a pity that such disputes should arise, and pointing out that, in his opinion, the owners were entitled to an intimation from the workmen themselves and not from an outsider. Afterwards, two workmen in the pit left a letter for Mr. Angus, the manager, informing him that they had been appointed by the workmen to give him notice of the appointment of a check-weigher, and after Mr. Angus had received this letter the check-weigher was installed in his position. In the meantime, the two workmen had been dismissed by the overman, not for giving the notice, but for absenting themselves from work. They have since been reinstated, and are at work again. On the general question I have nothing to add to what I said in the House on the 28th ult.

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck): Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether a notice tendered on behalf of the workmen by the general secretary of their Association is insufficient under the provisions of the Act?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am afraid I must decline to give an opinion on a legal question arising under the Act. The section is not explicit as to the manner in which the notice is to be given. I gave the best answer I could on the 28th of last month, and I will not take upon myself to say what, in all cases, will be sufficient.

IRELAND—FATHER STEPHENS.

MR. BLANE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether part of the evidence against the Rev. Daniel Stephens, of Falcarragh, county Donegal, who was recently sentenced for conspiracy against payment of rents to six months' imprisonment in Londonderry Gaol, was statements made on oath as witness before two Resident Magistrates sitting under the provisions of the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, which statements were used against him in his own trial; and, if so, can he state if such be English Court practice except in case of perjury; if the second part of the case consisted of evidence of a letter found in a drawer at the house of the Rev. James M'Fadden, P.P. Gweedore, said to be in handwriting of defendant; whether any proof of publicity amongst the tenants of the Olphert estate were given at trial; and, if he can state the grounds of decision relied on by Resident Magistrates?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that the defendant has appealed. I am, therefore, precluded at the present time from making any statement in regard to the evidence produced or with respect to the grounds of the decision come to.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Will the right hon. Gentleman state as a matter of fact whether a portion of the evidence produced against Mr. Stephens was evidence he had given himself in the case of another defendant?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I would rather not answer Questions on this matter, as an appeal is pending.

DRAWING IN SCHOOLS.

SIR HENRY ROSCOE (Manchester, S.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether, before the issue of the Minute of the Committee of Council on Education in January, extending to Scotland the provision that no grant for drawing should be made on account of girls to whom cookery is not also taught, due account was taken of the circumstances of Scotch mixed schools and the opinions of Scotch educational authorities; whether he is aware that the effect of this restriction in England has been largely to crush out the teaching of drawing to both boys and girls in mixed schools; whether it is anticipated that this will be the case in Scotland under the new Minute; and, whether, since this is in direct conflict with the advice of the Report of the Royal Commission on Technical Instruction, and of both the majority and minority of the Royal Commission on Elementary Education, in all of which the extension of drawing teaching is strongly recommended, he can see his way to remove the restriction?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL ON EDUCATION (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): The form in which the Minute was issued was due to an understanding with the Treasury that Scotland should be placed on an equality with England, but there is no reason, so far as I know, why the change should have the effect my hon. Friend seems to anticipate, seeing that in mixed schools boys alone may be taught drawing, as, I believe, is largely done in England. Further changes in the English Code are in prospect which will, I hope, facilitate and promote the teaching of drawing to both boys and girls.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): Was the Scotch Education Department consulted before the Minute was issued?

SIR W. HART DYKE: I apprehend that was the case; but I have no right to answer positively in the absence of my right hon. Friend the Lord Advocate.

MR. T. E. ELLIS (Merionethshire): When is it proposed to lay the new Code on the Table?

SIR W. HART DYKE: The new Code will be placed on the Table well within the limit of time—probably within the next fortnight.

IRELAND — THE TREATMENT OF MICHAEL DAVITT IN THE CONVICT PRISONS.

MR. BLUNDELL MAPLE (Camberwell, Dulwich): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been called to Mr. Michael Davitt's letter, which appeared in the Pall Mall Gazette of 4th March instant, in which he states that, having been tried and convicted in 1870, on a charge of treason-felony, he was degraded to the level of a non-political prisoner; is it true that he was so treated, and dressed like a convict in Portland in 1881-2, or did he receive any exceptional indulgence; and, when in Dartmoor, was he made to wear a collar and yoked to a cart to do the work of a beast of burden?

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): With the assent of the Home Secretary, as part of this Question relates to a matter in my knowledge, I will answer that portion of the hon. Member's Question. What I have to reply to is the second paragraph of the Question. As to what took place on the first imprisonment of Michael Davitt, I know nothing. It was not under my administration. But as to what took place in 1881-2 I will reply. The hon. Member asks whether Davitt was treated and dressed as a convict in Portland, or whether he received any exceptional indulgence. I will first answer that in the words of Davitt himself. He wrote a letter to me—very much to my surprise—immediately he was released from Portland. In it he says—

“ Learning since my release from Portland that I am indebted to you for whatever kind treatment I have received while incarcerated there, I beg you will accept this as an expression of my grateful acknowledgment of such kindness.”

That is the first answer, and they are his thanks for the exceptional treatment he received. As it is a matter of some importance, I will tell the hon. Gentleman what the exceptional treatment was. Mr. Michael Davitt was arrested on February 4, a Friday, and I gave immediate directions that he was not to be treated as an ordinary convict, and I wish it to be quite understood that I acted on my own personal responsibility as Secretary of State, on the authority of the Prisons Act, by which the control of all prisons and prisoners is vested in and exercised by the Secretary of State. So that the Home Secretary is the prison authority. The Prison Commissioners are stated in the 6th section to be appointed for the purpose of aiding the Secretary of State in carrying out the provisions of the Act, and in the 9th section they are ordered in the exercise of their powers to conform to any directions of the Secretary of State which they may receive from time to time. Therefore I considered it my duty to determine and order how Mr. Davitt should be treated. I accordingly sent for Sir E. Du Cane, one of the ablest administrators I have ever come across, and told him what my views were, and desired him to communicate them to the Governor of Portland Prison. As far as my recollection goes, Sir E. Du Cane entirely coincided with my view, although I need hardly say, if he had not done so, he would have loyally carried it out. Mr. Davitt having been arrested upon the Friday, on the Monday, February 7, I was asked a Question in the House of Commons upon the subject, and I stated then that Mr. Davitt was to be removed to Portland, and was not to have his hair cut. The next thing I directed was that he should not be moved in his prison clothes. These, of course, were special directions in his case. Immediately upon his being removed to Portland, I had an application, which I also stated to the House—indeed, everything I did in this matter was stated to the House of Commons in the presence of a very experienced Home Secretary, Sir Richard Cross, who could have challenged my conduct if he had thought it open to observation. This application I refer to was made on February 11th, and was from a private friend of Mr. Davitt's, to see him. That was not allowed by the prison rules. I ought to have mentioned, when I referred to the Prisons Act, that the convict prisons are not under the Prisons Act, but the authority of the Secretary of State is the same; in fact, if it be possible, he has more absolute control over the convict prisons than he has over the ordinary prisons. This friend of Mr. Davitt's was the wife of an honoured and respected Member of this House, now unfortunately deceased, I mean the late Mr. A. M. Sullivan. Mrs. Sullivan wished to see Mr. Davitt, and I wished her to see Mr. Davitt for two reasons. I wanted his friends to be satisfied with his treatment, and I wanted to be satisfied with their report myself, and not merely with official reports. The constant communication, which passed between Mr. Sullivan and myself at that time were the foundation of a friendship which, I am sorry to say, lasted too short a time. Mrs. Sullivan visited Mr. Davitt, and from that moment down to a year after the imprisonment of Mr. Davitt there never was a question or complaint in this House as to his treatment. I ordered constant visits of his friends not allowable by prison rules, and there were other female friends of Mr. Davitt who wished to see him. [A laugh.] I do not see why hon. Members should laugh. I will tell you why I preferred that these ladies should visit him. I treated him as a political prisoner, and I said that I did not think it desirable that his political colleagues should visit him, but I wished his personal friends to do so. That was the distinction I drew. I ordered also that his own personal friend and medical adviser, Dr. Kennedy, should visit him. He did so, and reported to me constantly upon his condition, and I have those reports still. I said there were no further questions asked in the House of Commons until March 20th, more than a year after his imprisonment. On March 20th, 1882, I made a statement in this House of all the particulars of the treatment of Mr. Davitt. It is in Hansard, and my statement was made in the face of this House, so that my conduct could be challenged and I could, if necessary, be called to account. I said—

“I not only wished to satisfy myself but also the friends of Mr. Davitt by allowing friends of his to visit him, and they have reported to me privately in a satisfactory manner. I could not give those private reports, but I see one of those visitors has published a letter in an American paper, in which he said:—‘You will be glad to hear that Mr. Davitt is well, and that he has increased six pounds in weight since I last saw him, that he has no complaint to make, that he seems in wonderful spirits, and that he reads and writes every day.’”

I had given orders that he should receive writing materials and whatever books he desired. This, of course, was contrary to all prison rules—

“Mr. Davitt,” his friend says, “is in the enjoyment of excellent health, and has nothing to complain of in his treatment. He is in as good spirits as if he were outside; satisfied with his diet and sleeping accommodation, and he takes an intense pleasure in the care of his garden.”

I wish to mention another thing. I ordered that he should not consort with any of the other convicts. I gave a direction that he should not be put to any disagreeable labour, and that he was to amuse himself in the garden; and his friend called it "his garden." As a fact, it was the Governor's garden which he so much enjoyed. "To wind up," his friend said, "we can say that his health has materially improved, and that he is now sound and strong." And I added at the time—

"I thought that a man in his position would require mental as well as physical recreation, and, therefore, I have ordered that what books he wishes he should be allowed to use, and that he should have the use also of writing materials. These have been a great satisfaction to him, I have also permitted his friends to see him, and I do not think that they will take an improper advantage of that permission. This will allow his friends to satisfy themselves as to his condition."

Then, Sir, a question was put to me by the hon. and learned Member for Longford—"Have you not refused him Hansard?" I confessed that I had not thought of that, and I gave the answer that—

"If anyone likes to read Hansard he may do so as far as I am concerned. I should have thought that would have been an additional punishment."

The only point on which Sir E. Du Cane expressed any doubt as to Mr. Davitt's treatment was as to whether Hansard should be allowed him. On consideration I thought that if Mr. Davitt wished to have Hansard for the purposes of the writing on which he was engaged, he should have Hansard, and he did have Hansard. That is the history of the prison treatment of Mr. Davitt upon which the hon. Member has asked a Question. Now, just to sum up what the exceptional treatment was, Mr. Davitt had a separate and comfortable room where he could read and write; he had a supply of writing materials and books, including Hansard; he was not allowed to consort with convicts; he had no irksome occupation, but occupied himself in an agreeable way in the garden; and he received visits from his friends. There is another point I ought to refer to, and that is with regard to the prison clothes. Now, I have already said that Mr. Davitt, when he was removed to Portland, was moved in his own clothes and not in prison clothes. I was not asked, I think, in this House, but I made a statement on this matter at the very beginning; and I said I thought prison clothes could not be dispensed with, because if he were allowed to wear his own clothes they might facilitate escape. From that time, as far as I can recollect, there was no question in this House, and I do not find that in any correspondence the matter of the prison clothes was pressed upon me. Mr. Davitt wore the prison clothes all the time he was at Portland; but if the matter had been pressed upon me, all I can say now is that, as in the case of Hansard. I think I should have dispensed with them. These are the facts of the case. When I was consulted by Lord Spencer as to the treatment of Irish prisoners I referred to the details of this case, and I recommended him in a letter that I have already read to the House to follow the example I had set. I thank the House for having enabled me to make this statement, I have told the hon. Member that my determination was that Mr. Davitt should not be treated as a convict, and he was not so treated. In that respect I followed, I believe, the course taken by my predecessors and by my successors; and if anybody had desired to challenge that course of conduct, it was stated in the House of Commons, and they had the opportunity here and at the time to do so. Having stated these facts as to the treatment of Mr. Davitt, I confess I was a little surprised—I am not going into details—at the tone of Mr. Davitt's letter on which this Question was founded; but I do not complain, because in these days one ought not to be surprised at anything.

MR. MATTHEWS: I am afraid that the hon. Member will find my answer most uninteresting and jejune after the statement of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman speaks from the fulness of his personal knowledge, while my answer contains only such particulars as I have been able to gather from the official sources at my command, Mr. Davitt, while at Portland in 1881-2, was clothed as a convict, but on medical grounds he was at once located in the infirmary in the usual course, and was there allowed such indulgences as were expressly recommended by the medical officer, including the use of books and writing materials. The Secretary of State himself verbally expressed the desire that every consideration should be shown to Mr. Davitt. While at Dartmoor in 1872 and subsequent years Mr. Davitt was employed as an ordinary convict, and had to assist, with five others, in drawing a cart with a yoke made of webbing placed on the shoulder and passed across the breast.

MR. DE LISLE (Leicestershire, Mid): Under whose Administration was Mr. Davitt first imprisoned, and who was Home Secretary at the time?

MR. MATTHEWS: The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian was Premier in 1872, and Mr. Bruce, now Lord Aberdare, was Home Secretary.

THE BANKRUPTCY ACT, 1883.

COLONEL HILL (Bristol, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether Trustees under the Bankruptcy Act, and the estates which they represent, are now put to considerable expense in disclaiming leasehold and other onerous property which is of no value to the debtor's estate, but which must be disclaimed in order to avoid personal liability; and, whether it is the intention of the Government to propose any amendment of the law with the view of diminishing such expense?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The alterations in the law relating to the disclaimer of onerous property effected by Section 55 of the present Bankruptcy Act have undoubtedly been a serious source of expense to bankrupt estates, as has been pointed out in the Annual Reports presented to Parliament by the Board of Trade, and the Board of Trade are in communication with the Lord Chancellor on the subject, with the view of ascertaining whether any measures can be adopted to diminish such expense.

IRELAND—MR. CECIL ROCHE, R.M.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland is it the fact that Mr. Cecil Roche, R.M., after presiding at the trial of Mr. Wm. O'Brien, M.P., at Killarney, proceeded with the accused to Tralee, and followed the vehicle containing the prisoner through the streets of Tralee; that Mr. Roche, finding the townspeople cheering Mr. O'Brien, ordered them to be prosecuted, and, in the case of at least one of them (Mr. M. Stack), swore a deposition before another Resident Magistrate (Capt. Welch); that upon Mr. Roche's evidence, Mr. Stack was sentenced to six months' imprisonment, or to give bail for his good behaviour, for cheering for Mr. O'Brien; was this trial held in the police barracks, and was this legal under the Petty Sessions Act; can the deposition made by Mr. Roche be laid upon the Table; and, is there any precedent under the Crimes Act of 1882 for this blending of judicial and administrative functions by Resident Magistrates, or for their acting in this way in cases where they have sat as Judges?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that Mr. Roche, on the occasion in question, accompanied on his way home Captain Welch, who was in charge of the forces, and who was going in the same direction. Mr. Roche did not take any part in the management of the forces, nor did he direct any prosecution. He did, when required to do so, give sworn testimony as to the riotous behaviour of Mr. Stack. Mr. Stack was ordered to find bail to be of good behaviour, or in default to be imprisoned. He found bail, as did the others charged on that occasion. I see no ground to adopt the unusual course suggested of laying the deposition on the table.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the part of the Question which asks if the trial was held in the police barracks, and whether that was legal under the Petty Sessions Act?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Notice of the Question was not given me in time to get those particulars.

MR. T. M. HEALY: It has been on the Paper the last two days. I will put it down for Monday. I beg also to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland why did Mr. Cecil Roche cease to be employed as Legal Sub-Commissioner under the Land Act, 1881, when he received £1,000 per annum travelling expenses; and, is it the case that since he was disemployed under the Land Commission other Legal Sub-Commissioners have been appointed by that body, although Mr. Roche's salary as Resident Magistrate is only £425 and allowances?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The appointment held by Mr. Roche as Legal Assistant Commissioner was an annual one. He was re-appointed by Lord Spencer no less than four times, and, I understand, was informed by all the heads of the Commission that they were perfectly satisfied with the manner in which he had discharged his duties. He was not appointed by the present Government as an Assistant Commissioner, nor did he subsequently seek to be so re-appointed. His present remuneration as a Resident Magistrate is £425 and allowances.

IRISH NATIONAL TEACHERS.

MR. PETER M'DONALD (Sligo. N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Poor Law Guardians of Clones and other Unions in Ireland have declined to certify to the Local Government Board, as required by the Probate Duties Act of 1888, that the contributory grant to National teachers is included under the head of "Salaries, &c." as they are empowered to do by that Statute; and, whether he, as head of the Local Government Board, will take steps to enforce this necessary requirement to be complied with, so that an equitable proportion of the Probate Duty Grant shall be applied to supplement the miserable salaries of National teachers in such Unions as do not otherwise become contributory?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member appears to be under some misapprehension. By Section 3 of the Probate Duties (Scotland and Ireland) Act, 1888, the basis of the allocation of the grant is confined to the amount expended by the Guardians on the salaries and remuneration, &c., of the officers of the Union in connection with the relief of the poor or under the Medical Charities Act of 1851. Consequently, in making the allocation, no account can be taken of sums contributed or paid by the Guardians under the National School Teachers Act.

PROVISIONAL ORDERS.

SIR BERNHARD SAMUELSON (Oxfordshire, Banbury): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board what steps are being taken by the Board in reference to making Provisional Orders, as directed by Section 52 of the Local Government Act of last Session, in the case of boroughs and sanitary districts in the same area, and when such Provisional Orders will be introduced for confirmation by Parliament?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The Local Government Board have in each of the cases referred to directed a local inquiry by one of their inspectors, and the several inquiries have now been held. The preparation of the Orders which are required is being proceeded with, but before the Orders are issued the drafts will be forwarded to the local authorities. There will be no delay that can be avoided in submitting the Orders to Parliament for Confirmation.

NATIONAL RIFLE ASSOCIATION— ACCOMMODATION FOR ANNUAL MEETINGS.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what acreage of Government land the War Office has placed at the disposal of the National Rifle Association; for what portion of the year, for how many years, and upon what terms; and whether, as stated in the Times, it is the intention of the War Office to acquire control of Bisley Common and to place it together with the land it already holds at the disposal of the Association; and, if so, what is the agreement or understanding with the Association as to Bisley Common?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): No detailed arrangements for the user of Government land have yet been made, as I have not yet received official intimation that the Brookwood site has been finally adopted. I have intimated informally to the Association that if they will grant the War Department the user over the land at Brookwood which they may purchase, I would take steps to extinguish the common rights over a wedge-shaped plot of Bisley Common which juts into War Department property, and allow the Association the user of it. Such an arrangement would add considerably to the ground in the neighbourhood of Aldershot available for military manœuvres.

MARAUDING AT SIERRA LEONE

SIR R. FOWLER (London): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has received information as to a coroner's inquest held at Free Town, Sierra Leone, on February 1st last, on the body of the Chief, Gabanna Gombo, brought as a political prisoner from the Gallinas country, who died on January 26th; whether he is aware that it was alleged before the jury that the prisoner died of strangulation, having during four days been tied round the neck and other parts of his body with a rope, on the excuse that no handcuffs were available, and that the jury were only persuaded to pass a verdict of "death resulting from blood poisoning, the effect of ill-usage," on the coroner's promise that the facts of the case should be reported to the authorities with a recommendation that the police officers in charge of the prisoner be brought to justice; whether any action is being taken in accordance with this compromise; and whether he can acquaint the House with the circumstances under which a native chief who has for a long time been an ally of the British Government in its advances in the West Coast of Africa has been thus severely dealt with.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): This chief, who cannot correctly be styled a political prisoner, was conveyed as a prisoner to Sierra Leone, having been guilty of marauding and raiding a short time after he had been present at a meeting of chiefs when they were warned that such practices must cease. We have not heard officially of the inquest; but the Governor has reported the chief's death, owing to blood poisoning, in consequence of a wound caused by the rope with which he was secured. This treatment is very much to be regretted; and the Governor has issued a strict order to the police that as a rule handcuffs only should be used, and that when it is unavoidable to tie prisoners, great care should be taken that no injury or undue harshness is permitted; and that any remissness will be severely dealt with.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): Has anything been done to the police officers who dragged the man along with a rope; have they been suspended and tried, or are they still at work and in full pay?

MR. PICTON (Leicester): When the right hon. Gentleman says that an independent chief has been guilty of marauding, does he mean that the man was guilty of making war?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: I cannot give a definition of marauding.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): Will the right hon. Gentleman make inquiries as to what has been done to the policemen?

DR. CLARK: May I call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the third paragraph of the question, which he has not answered?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: I have given an answer. I said I have not heard of the inquest officially; until I do I cannot give the hon. Member any further information.

LIVERPOOL BOARD OF CUSTOMS.

MR. NEVILLE (Liverpool, Exchange): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the action, at Liverpool in February last, of the Deputy-Chairman of the Board of Customs in ordering the immediate dissolution of the joint committee of the examining officers and outdoor officers of Customs, censuring the members of that committee and other officers, and ordering the removal to other posts of five examining officers and six outdoor officers; whether the committee had been guilty of any breach of existing regulations which justified such action; and, if not, whether he will instruct the Board of Customs to remove the censure passed on the officers and the interdict on their association; what was the reason of the removal of the officers from Liverpool; and whether they have been restored to their former positions?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds N.): I have received a Report from the Commissioners of Customs with reference to the hon. Member's Question. The Treasury does not interfere with matters of discipline in the Revenue Departments unless specially appealed to. In the present case I am informed that the Board of Customs had reason to believe that the committee referred to was organizing opposition throughout the service to the orders of the Board, and the Commissioners took steps for the dissolution of the committee and for the removal to other ports of certain officers. I am informed that several of the officers selected for removal petitioned to be allowed to remain at Liverpool, and that the Commissioners, their directions having been obeyed, have granted this request.

THE ARREST OF DR. TANNER.

MR. CONDON (Tipperary, E.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is true that, on the arrival of Dr. Tanner on Sunday morning last in Clonmel, a reporter of the Tipperary Nationalist sought admission to the railway station in his professional capacity, and was refused by the police; that he asked for the name of the sergeant in charge, and was also refused and told "to go to the devil"; and that, immediately after, the police charged and bâtoned him, inflicting several wounds; whether it is true that the policeman who committed the assault was fined 21s. at the Clonmel Petty Sessions, on Wednesday, 6th March; and, what notice the Government intends to take of this policeman's conduct?

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg also to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether Constable Doyle, of the Royal Irish Constabulary, was fined 20s. and costs by the magistrates at Clonmel for unnecessarily using his bâton in Clonmel on the 3rd March, on the occasion of the arrival there of the hon. Member for Mid-Cork?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary authorities report that it is the case that on the arrival of Dr. Tanner at Clonmel a cordon of police, which was keeping back a disorderly crowd, refused admittance to a reporter of the Tipperary Nationalist, as they could not let him through without giving an opportunity for others to force their way in also. The two sergeants in charge denied that they refused their names, or heard any offensive expression used to the reporter. The police did not charge until they were severely struck with stones, one constable being knocked down insensible. The reporter appears to have received a blow in the charge, but it is not true that a policeman was fined in respect to it. A man who was arrested in another part of the town, when in the act of picking up a stone, and who resisted arrest, was in the mêlée struck with a bâton. For this he summoned Constable Doyle, who was fined in the Borough Court, from which, however, he has appealed.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman say how it is the police took upon themselves the right to exclude persons from the railway station? Does the railway station belong to the police, or is it not private property belonging to a Limited Liability Company?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The police have a right to prevent a disorderly mob entering the railway station upon an occasion like that referred to in the Question.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Does the railway station belong to the police, or to a Company?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no official knowledge as to whom it belongs to.

IRELAND—MR. JOHNSON.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, South): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether Mr. Johnson, who was formerly employed as sub-agent in a landlord's office where Mr. Commissioner Wrench was then the landlord's rent agent, has been promoted to an important office in the Land Commission at a salary of £500 a year; whether Mr. Johnson some time ago appeared before the Sub-Commission, instructing the landlord's solicitor against the fair rent applications of the tenants; whether he is now, or was lately, in charge of that department of the Land Commission which has custody of and control over the lists of prices and the reports furnished by the scrutineers, &c., for the purpose of altering or revising the judicial rents; and, why Mr. Johnson was promoted over the heads of the four Registrars appointed in 1881, and in preference to them and to others in the Land Commission, who were led to believe that they would be treated as Civil Service officials?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: He was employed in the office; I do not know whether as a sub-agent. He has not been appointed to a place of £500 a year. He gets £1 1s. a week, and his place is temporary. The answer to the second and third paragraph is in the negative. His duties are confined to clerical and arithmetical work. He has not been promoted over the head of anyone. The Registrars alluded to have much better places. No officials of the Land Commission have been given to understand that they will be treated as Civil Servants.

IRISH BANKS.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what were the circumstances under which the Board of Guardians of the North Dublin Poor Law Union recently applied to the Irish Local Government Board to sanction the substitution of the Munster and Leinster Bank for the Bank of Ireland, as treasurer of the Union: whether the Local Government Board maintain their refusal to sanction the substitution desired by the Guardians; and, whether a copy of the correspondence will be laid upon the Table?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As regards paragraphs 1 and 2, I beg to refer the hon. Member to the reply given by me yesterday to a Question on this subject put by the hon. Member for Dublin County, North. With respect to paragraph 3, I do not see that any public advantage would be gained by following the course suggested. The correspondence is in the hands of the Guardians of the Union, and has already obtained publicity.

MR. SEXTON: As I intend to raise the Question on a future occasion, would it not be of advantage that all the facts contained in the correspondence should be in the hands of Members?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will consider the point.

THE SPECIAL COMMISSION.

MR. GILL (Louth, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant whether Head Constable Preston, in visiting certain prisoners in Millbank without direction from any one, was acting on his own responsibility?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The answer is in the affirmative.

MR. GILL: Is it the custom to allow a constable to rove about English gaols for the purpose of seeing prisoners?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the hon. Member asks me the Question, I do not know anything about the circumstances, but I have no doubt it is in accordance with the English practice.

MR. T. M. HEALY: As Preston is an Irish Constable, will the right hon. Gentleman tell us what he is doing in England?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe I have answered before that Head Constable Preston was in London on subpoena from the Commission.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Does that give him the right to visit gaols, and do the Government approve of a constable brought over here to give evidence taking other duties and functions on himself and visiting prisoners in gaols in the interests of the Times?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR did not reply.

MR. GILL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, in what capacity did Head Constable Preston visit certain prisoners in Millbank; was his application for leave to visit them made in writing; and, in virtue of what consideration or authority was it that Preston was held entitled to have his application to visit these prisoners granted?

MR. MATTHEWS: Head Constable Preston visited the prisoner Tracy on two occasions as the representative of Mr. Soames. The application was made in writing on the first occasion. The second visit was allowed on personal application. The applications were granted in accordance with the usual practice, which I have more than once explained.

MR. SEXTON: Was the prisoner Tracy asked in advance whether these visits were acceptable?

MR. MATTHEWS: I think I have answered that Question once or twice before, but I really do not carry these particulars in my mind.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman says that on the occasion of the first visit a written application was made. Who made the written application?

MR. MATTHEWS: The written application was from Mr. Soames.

MR. GILL: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he has any objection to lay the written application on the Table of the House; and I wish to ask the Chief Secretary under what understanding a Head Constable of the Royal Irish Constabulary is authorized to act as the representative of Mr. Soames?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR did not reply.

MR. M'CARTAN: May I ask the Chief Secretary whether we are now to understand that it was not correct, as he stated, that Preston went to visit Tracy on behalf of the Government to find who was tampering with him?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe that to be perfectly and absolutely accurate. I stated that this constable, who was over here on subpoena, did ask Mr. Soames to get leave to visit this prisoner, and I also informed the House that the object with which he visited him was for the purpose I then indicated.

MR. T. M. HEALY: May I now ask the right hon. Gentleman if he approves of the Irish Constabulary acting on the initiative of Mr. Soames in visiting these prisoners?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR did not answer.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I will put the Question again. Does the right hon. Gentleman approve of Head Constable Preston, of the Royal Irish Constabulary, acting for Mr. Soames in this matter?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I did not catch whether the hon. and learned Gentleman addressed his Question to me or to the Home Secretary.

MR. T. M. HEALY intimated that he addressed the Question to the Chief Secretary.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will give my answer. I do not think any general rule can be laid down as to what is proper or improper in the matter. [Ironical cheers.] I repeat, I do not think any general rule can be laid down as to what is proper or improper in the actions of constables in the matter to which the hon. and learned Member has referred. It depends upon the circumstances of the case. For my own part, I will lay down no other general propositions on the subject than those I have already stated to the House on more than one occasion; but, as a matter of fact, I believe in this case the constable in question was not acting as agent for the Times. I stated so yesterday.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Who was he acting for then?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: One hon. Gentleman has already referred to the answer which I gave to a similar Question yesterday. That answer was given in precise accordance with the information conveyed to me. I still believe it to be accurate.

MR. T. M. HEALY: As the right hon. Gentleman has stated that Constable Preston, in visiting the prisoner on a letter from Mr. Soames, was not acting for Mr. Soames or the Times, will he be good enough to state if he was acting for the Government; and will he be good enough to state whether the Government were aware that he was so acting for them?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have already stated that this constable acted entirely on his own responsibility, and the Government were not cognizant of it. But I may remind the House that the circumstances under which any constable visited Tracy were these: Tracy, when in Ireland, volunteered information of a very serious and a very important character connected with crime in Ireland. He was at that time in one of the local gaols—Sligo, I think—

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Castlebar.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes. He was then denounced in the local Roman Catholic chapel as an informer. Thereupon he was removed to Belfast, and in Belfast also police—I am not sure whether this particular constable, but members of the Police Force—again visited him, with a view of seeing whether he would pursue and complete the confession—complete the statement; and I conceive that the police were unquestionably not only doing their duty, but were doing that which, if they had not done, they would have been guilty of a very grave dereliction of duty. I am informed that when the prisoner was brought over to London on the subpoena of the Times he asked to see Head Constable Preston. He either made the request in London or just before he left Belfast; and the Head Constable, I believe, went to the prisoner in consequence of the request of the Treasury—his object being, as I have stated, to elicit, so far as he could, the truth of this matter from the man, and to see what means had been used to tamper with him; and the fact that he got permission to go and see the prisoner through Mr. Soames, who was the instrument through which he had been brought to London as a witness, appears to me to be immaterial.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The right hon. Gentleman has made a long statement, but he has not answered. ["Oh, oh!"] I do not complain at all; but what I am going to point out is—

MR. E. STANHOPE: Oh, oh!

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Hear, hear!

SIR W. HARCOURT: It is only the Secretary of State for War. What I was going to point out was that the right hon. Gentleman has not answered the Question put to him—namely, Did Constable Preston go into this prison on behalf of the Times or on behalf of the Government; and if he did not go on behalf of either, I think we must ask the Home Secretary by what right Irish constables go into English prisons on roving commissions of this kind?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think I have answered that point, Sir. I have stated that I believe this Head Constable acted on his own responsibility. It appears to me he acted perfectly rightly. Tracy was already giving very interesting and important information to the Government, and this man was perfectly right to try and follow it out.

MR. SEXTON: In reference to the statement just made that while Tracy was in Castlebar he was publicly denounced in the Roman Catholic Chapel, as he had turned informer, I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether his attention has been drawn to a letter of the Rev. Patrick Lyons, P.P., of Castlebar, who is Chaplain of the prison, in which he states:—

"I feel it my imperative duty to give that statement an emphatic and unqualified contradiction. It is utterly and absolutely untrue that Tracy's name was mentioned either directly or indirectly, under any circumstances whatsoever, either in the Prison Chapel or the Parish Church at Castlebar."

I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he now withdraws the statement.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir; I do not withdraw my statement. I cannot recollect the name of the chapel at this moment, but I know it is not in the parish church to which the hon. Gentleman refers. Of course I am quite open to correction, but so far no reason has been stated in this House by the right hon. Gentleman to induce me to believe I am wrong.

MR. SEXTON rose to put a further Question, but—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I think any further Questions should be put on the paper. The supplementary Questions are becoming very numerous.

MR. SEXTON: As a personal explanation, I wish to state that I quoted from the verbatim report of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman in which Castlebar Church is mentioned.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether there is any precedent for the course which has been taken with reference to the visit of the agent of the Times to Nally in Millbank; and, if so, whether he will give the date, names, and circumstances relating to the last precedent?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have already stated that the course followed was in accordance with the usual and frequent practice. It is quite unnecessary that I should refer to precedents.

MR. COBB: Can the right hon. Gentleman not give one similar case?

MR. MATTHEWS: I can give many; but, inasmuch as the Question appears to throw doubt on my veracity, I decline to do so.

MR. LALOR (Queen's Co., Leix): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether Delaney, the Invincible convict, was accorded any special privileges; and in virtue of which of the prison rules was it that he was exempt from the compulsion to wear prison dress, and to have his beard and moustache shorn when he appeared to give evidence at the Special Commission?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As I have already stated to the House, Delaney was accorded no special privileges whatever. I am informed he was brought over from Ireland in private clothes, in pursuance of the discretion exercised by the General Prisons Board, which was responsible for seeing that the convict was safely produced in Court in compliance with the order of the three Judges.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department upon whose authority or instructions he stated that Mr. Anderson, of the Home Office, would give evidence before the Special Commission; and if Mr. Anderson has been absent from

to act as the representative of Mr. Soames?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR did not reply.

Mr. M'CARTAN: May I ask the Chief Secretary whether we are now to understand that it was not correct, as he stated, that Preston went to visit Tracy on behalf of the Government to find who was tampering with him?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe that to be perfectly and absolutely accurate. I stated that this constable, who was over here on subpoena, did ask Mr. Soames to get leave to visit this prisoner, and I also informed the House that the object with which he visited him was for the purpose I then indicated.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: May I now ask the right hon. Gentleman if he approves of the Irish Constabulary acting on the initiative of Mr. Soames in visiting these prisoners?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR did not answer.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: I will put the Question again. Does the right hon. Gentleman approve of Head Constable Preston, of the Royal Irish Constabulary, acting for Mr. Soames in this matter?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I did not catch whether the hon. and learned Gentleman addressed his Question to me or to the Home Secretary.

Mr. T. M. HEALY intimated that he addressed the Question to the Chief Secretary.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I will give my answer. I do not think any general rule can be laid down as to what is proper or improper in the matter. [Ironical cheers.] I repeat, I do not think any general rule can be laid down as to what is proper or improper in the actions of constables in the matter to which the hon. and learned Member has referred. It depends upon the circumstances of the case. For my own part, I will lay down no other general propositions on the subject than those I have already stated to the House on more than one occasion; but, as a matter of fact, I believe in this case the constable in question was not acting as agent for the Times. I stated so yesterday.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: Who was he acting for then?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order, order!

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: One hon. Gentleman has already referred to the answer which I gave to a similar Question yesterday. That answer was given in precise accordance with the information conveyed to me. I still believe it to be accurate.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: As the right hon. Gentleman has stated that Constable Preston, in visiting the prisoner on a letter from Mr. Soames, was not acting for Mr. Soames or the Times, will he be good enough to state if he was acting for the Government; and will he be good enough to state whether the Government were aware that he was so acting for them?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I have already stated that this constable acted entirely on his own responsibility, and the Government were not cognizant of it. But I may remind the House that the circumstances under which any constable visited Tracy were these: Tracy, when in Ireland, volunteered information of a very serious and a very important character connected with crime in Ireland. He was at that time in one of the local gaols—Sligo, I think—

Mr. T. W. RUSSELL: Castlebar.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes. He was then denounced in the local Roman Catholic chapel as an informer. Thereupon he was removed to Belfast, and in Belfast also police—I am not sure whether this particular constable, but members of the Police Force—again visited him, with a view of seeing whether he would pursue and complete the confession—complete the statement; and I conceive that the police were unquestionably not only doing their duty, but were doing that which, if they had not done, they would have been guilty of a very grave dereliction of duty. I am informed that when the prisoner was brought over to London on the subpoena of the Times he asked to see Head Constable Preston. He either made the request in London or just before he left Belfast; and the Head Constable, I believe, went to the prisoner in consequence of the request of the Treasury—his object being, as I have stated, to elicit, so far as he could, the truth of this matter from the man, and to see what means had been used to tamper with him; and the fact that he got permission to go and see the prisoner through Mr. Soames, who was the instrument through which he had been brought to London as a witness, appears to me to be immaterial.

Mr. Gill

SIR W. HARCOURT: The right hon. Gentleman has made a long statement, but he has not answered. ["Oh, oh!"] I do not complain at all; but what I am going to point out is——

MR. E. STANHOPE: Oh, oh!

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Hear, hear!

SIR W. HARCOURT: It is only the Secretary of State for War. What I was going to point out was that the right hon. Gentleman has not answered the Question put to him—namely, Did Constable Preston go into this prison on behalf of the Times or on behalf of the Government; and if he did not go on behalf of either, I think we must ask the Home Secretary by what right Irish constables go into English prisons on roving commissions of this kind?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think I have answered that point, Sir. I have stated that I believe this Head Constable acted on his own responsibility. It appears to me he acted perfectly rightly. Tracy was already giving very interesting and important information to the Government, and this man was perfectly right to try and follow it out.

MR. SEXTON: In reference to the statement just made that while Tracy was in Castlebar he was publicly denounced in the Roman Catholic Chapel, as he had turned informer, I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether his attention has been drawn to a letter of the Rev. Patrick Lyons, P.P., of Castlebar, who is Chaplain of the prison, in which he states:—

"I feel it my imperative duty to give that statement an emphatic and unqualified contradiction. It is utterly and absolutely untrue that Tracy's name was mentioned either directly or indirectly, under any circumstances whatsoever, either in the Prison Chapel or the Parish Church at Castlebar."

I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he now withdraws the statement.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir; I do not withdraw my statement. I cannot recollect the name of the chapel at this moment, but I know it is not in the parish church to which the hon. Gentleman refers. Of course I am quite open to correction, but so far no reason has been stated in this House by the right hon. Gentleman to induce me to believe I am wrong.

MR. SEXTON rose to put a further Question, but——

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I think any further Questions should be put on the paper. The supplementary Questions are becoming very numerous.

MR. SEXTON: As a personal explanation, I wish to state that I quoted from the verbatim report of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman in which Castlebar Church is mentioned.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether there is any precedent for the course which has been taken with reference to the visit of the agent of the Times to Nally in Millbank; and, if so, whether he will give the date, names, and circumstances relating to the last precedent?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have already stated that the course followed was in accordance with the usual and frequent practice. It is quite unnecessary that I should refer to precedents.

MR. COBB: Can the right hon. Gentleman not give one similar case?

MR. MATTHEWS: I can give many; but, inasmuch as the Question appears to throw doubt on my veracity, I decline to do so.

MR. LALOR (Queen's Co., Leix): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether Delaney, the Invincible convict, was accorded any special privileges; and in virtue of which of the prison rules was it that he was exempt from the compulsion to wear prison dress, and to have his beard and moustache shorn when he appeared to give evidence at the Special Commission?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As I have already stated to the House, Delaney was accorded no special privileges whatever. I am informed he was brought over from Ireland in private clothes, in pursuance of the discretion exercised by the General Prisons Board, which was responsible for seeing that the convict was safely produced in Court in compliance with the order of the three Judges.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department upon whose authority or instructions he stated that Mr. Anderson, of the Home Office, would give evidence before the Special Commission; and if Mr. Anderson has been absent from

William Butcher, Thomas Scragg, Joseph Brindley, Caleb Johnson, and James Lloyd to receive Second Class Certificates under section 80 of "The Coal Mines, &c. Regulation Act, 1887?"

MR. MATTHEWS: In the case of Isaac Dale, William Butcher, and Thomas Scragg, certificates of fitness under the Coal Mines Regulation Act will be granted. No certificate can be given in the case of Thomas Oswald, as I find on inquiry that the applicant's previous service did not substantially correspond to that of an under-manager of a mine. The inquiries into the merits of the applications of Joseph Brindley, Caleb Johnson, and James Lloyd are not yet completed.

POSTAGE TO AUSTRALIA.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he can explain why newspapers four ounces in weight are charged 1½d. to Ceylon, but only 1d. to Sydney, Australia, 5,000 miles further, and although the Australian mail steamers of the Penninsular and Oriental Company call at Ceylon?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): Ceylon is in the Postal Union, and consequently the postage rates on newspapers for that Colony are governed by the Union regulations. Newspapers sent via Brindisi to all places in the Union are charged 1½d. for four ounces. The Australian Colonies, on the other hand, are not within the Union, and under an arrangement made with them in 1880, when the Southampton route for mails to Australia was abandoned, it was agreed that the old long sea rate of 1d. should continue to be charged on newspapers for Australia, notwithstanding the fact that they would be forwarded in future by the quicker and more expensive route of Brindisi. I need hardly say that this was a very advantageous arrangement for the Australian Colonies.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that France, which is also in the Postal Union, charges 50 per cent less than England for letters and newspapers to our British Colony of Ceylon. May I ask, too, what excuse the British Postal Authorities give for taking advantage of a clause in the Postal Union for doubling the rates to Ceylon, and whether England cannot withdraw from the Postal Union by giving six months' notice?

*MR. RAIKES: I must have notice of the Question.

DINIZULU.

MR. WALTER M'LAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has had notice of the fact that an appeal is now pending before the Privy Council upon the question of the validity of the warrant by virtue of which the Zululand officials claim the right to try Cetshwayo's son, Dinuzulu, by the Special Commission now sitting in Zululand; whether the Lord Chancellor, upon the occasion of the Privy Council granting leave for the said appeal, used these words with reference to such notice, viz.: "Anybody who with notice proceeds to try him (Dinizulu) now would be guilty of a very grave dereliction of duty;" and whether he has reason to fear that this warning will be disregarded?

BARON H. DE WORMS: No appeal is actually pending; but leave to appeal has been granted. The jurisdiction of the Special Commission to try Dinizulu does not depend upon the validity of the warrant for his removal from Natal. I am informed that the Lord Chancellor did use the words in question; but he was under the impression that if the trial proceeded and sentence of death were passed, Dinizulu might be executed before the appeal could be heard. This, however, is not the case, as distinct instructions have been long ago sent to the Governor that no sentence passed on any of the accused chiefs is to be carried out until the proceedings have been reviewed by the Secretary of State. I may also add that the Governor reported to the Secretary of State that further postponement of the trial was most undesirable and possibly dangerous; and that delay had already caused apprehension, and created a bad impression on the well-disposed. In these circumstances the Secretary of State considered it proper that the trial should proceed.

THE MURDER OF DISTRICT INSPECTOR MARTIN.

SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I beg to ask the Chief his liberty if he would attend the Special Commission and swear accordingly; whether Tracy, having again refused to swear falsely as required, was told by Preston that he would not be called as a witness; whether these officers of police were the only persons who held communication with Tracy on behalf of the Times; and, whether, considering the serious nature of the allegations made by Tracy as to threats and promises of reward held out to him by the police officers who visited him at Belfast, in the event of his refusing or consenting to swear as instructed at the Special Commission, he will grant an independent inquiry into all the circumstances in connection with these visits, and as to the communications made to him by the police at and since his removal from Castlebar Gaol?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The ground for refusing the application was that Tracy had no legal case pending. Under the circumstances there did not appear to be any necessity for an interview. I am not aware that Tracy made any such allegations as are contained in the second paragraph of the Question, and if he has done so they are untrue. The allegations in the third and fourth paragraphs against Preston are also untrue. If by paragraph 5 it is intended to be conveyed that these police officers held communication with Tracy on behalf of the Times, I have already stated that they did not do so. As to the last paragraph, I do not see any necessity for granting such an inquiry.

MR. MC CARTAN: If a statement in writing by Tracy of the character indicated is produced, will the right hon. Gentleman grant an inquiry?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Of course, I should be glad to consider that or any other communication, but such a statement would not of itself be adequate ground for an inquiry.

IRELAND—REV. FATHER CLARKE.

MR. WILLIAM CORBET (Wicklow, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, (1) whether the Reverend Father Clarke, now undergoing sentence in Wexford Gaol has undergone the two terms of punishment on bread and water imposed on him by the governor of the gaol for refusing to take exercise with the ordinary prisoners; and (2), whether it is the fact that a number of prisoners convicted of disgraceful crimes, pickpockets, burglars, and others have been transferred from Dublin to Wexford, and is it intended to require the Reverend Father Clarke to take exercise in the same yard and at the same time with such criminals?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As regards the inquiry in the first paragraph, I beg to refer the hon. Member to my reply of yesterday on this subject. I may, however, add that I am informed that one of the terms of punishment was remitted on medical grounds. With respect to the inquiry in paragraph 2, time has not admitted of the receipt of a Report, a local reference being necessary.

LOCAL TAXATION IN COUNTIES.

SIR J. DORINGTON (Gloucester, Tewkesbury): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is in a position to state when the first instalment from the local taxation account will be paid to counties, and what proportion it is likely to bear to the whole amount payable in the course of the year, and also at what periods similar instalments will be paid, such information being necessary to enable County Councils to arrange their Budgets?

*MR. RITCHIE: I have under consideration the arrangements which it may be practicable to make for the distribution of the licence duties and the proportion of the probate duty payable to local authorities, and I am anxious, so far as possible, to meet the convenience of the authorities in this matter. I am endeavouring to arrange that an instalment shall be paid in July, and a second instalment in October or November, the two together making up an amount not much less than one-half of the sum which it is estimated that the authorities will be entitled to receive in the course of the year.

COAL MINE CERTIFICATES.

CAPTAIN HEATHCOTE (Staffordshire, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is now able to say whether the additional certificates of fitness now in the possession of the Home Office entitle Isaac Dale, Thomas Oswald, cellor of the Exchequer, I asked the noble Lord whether he would lay on the Table certain information. The first thing I asked for was a statement as to the waste of ships in the Fleet; the second was a statement as to the effect of what was known as Lord Northbrook's scheme since it was adopted; and the third was a statement in print of the figures contained in the noble Lord's speech. Will the noble Lord give the House that information?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: I have directed the first two statements mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman to be prepared, and I will circulate the third statement for which the right hon. Gentleman asks in the course of 24 hours.

SUPPLY—MORNING SITTINGS.

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand Westminster), in rising to move, "That until Easter whenever the Committee of Supply is appointed for Tuesday or Thursday the House shall meet at 2 of the clock. At such Morning Sittings the Committee of Supply shall be the principal business, and the provisions of Standing Order 56 shall be extended to Tuesday. The Motion appointing the next Sitting of the Committee of Supply may be taken at any hour, though opposed," said: During the past 20 years the difficulties which have been experienced by the House itself in regard to the discussion of the Estimates have been considerable. I remember, in previous years, to have taken part in the objections urged in the House against the practice of asking for repeated Votes on Account, and have myself deplored the delay connected with the business of Committee of Supply in many Sessions of Parliament. I believe that every Government, without exception, has been most anxious to take steps to remedy that acknowledged evil, and make a serious attempt to grapple with it. Various Select Committees have from time to time been appointed to consider whether better arrangements cannot be made for that purpose. A strong Committee in 1885 gave the question a great amount of consideration; but they were unable to arrive at a conclusion which offered any hope of affording the relief desired in regard to the despatch of public business. Last Session, again, a Committee, of which the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington) was Chairman, very seriously considered the question. It has been suggested that a Standing Committee might be appointed to deal with the questions involved in the voting of Supply; but no conclusion has been adopted which will be sufficient to justify the House in making any very considerable departure from the present form of procedure in Committee of Supply. I think that anyone who looks back to our past experience must feel that many of the discussions in Committee of Supply have not been of a businesslike or satisfactory character, and that it is very desirable, if possible, that questions involved in Votes of Supply should be considered by an authoritative body, which will aid the House and the Government in arriving at a satisfactory result. But no such suggestion has been made in any form that gives the slightest hope that it is likely to be accepted by the House, and, therefore, the Government are forced to fall back on the existing system, with such modifications as are found to be practicable. Under the present practice the pressure of public business has driven the voting of Supply to a late period of the Session, and the very prolonged discussions on certain Votes has led to other Votes having afterwards to be passed with a slight amount of consideration. Now, if it should be decided that the Government must appropriate the ordinary Government days, Mondays and Thursdays, to Committee of Supply, it will result in this—that, taking yesterday, the 7th of March, as the first day of Committee of Supply this Session, every Monday and Thursday up to the end of July will be absorbed by Committee of Supply. That is assuming the business of Supply to occupy as much of our time as it did in the Sessions of 1887 and 1888. I wish to show that some change is absolutely necessary if the House is to give proper consideration to the business of Supply. I do not doubt that hon. Members themselves may effect a considerable change in our progress with the Votes if they slightly condense their speeches in Committee of Supply and proportion their observations to the importance of the items discussed. I remember that in former years both sides of the House approached Supply in a perfect impartial spirit, with a desire to assist the progress of business, and with much less of that kind of discussion which tends to delay it. But I do not wish to say anything to protract this discussion. I am only anxious to invite the attention of the House to a most grave and important question, and to recommend it to accept the proposal of the Government, by which I hope we shall be better able to get through the business of the country, and to abate what has amounted to something like a public scandal. In proposing that Supply should be taken at the Morning Sittings of Tuesday and Thursday, I fully recognize that it must be reserved to the House, to the Government, and to the Opposition itself to require a different appropriation of the time of the House for special reasons; but I trust that, if the Resolution is passed, we shall at least endeavour to make the best use of the time so appropriated for the purpose of making progress with Supply, and so rendering Votes on Account less necessary than they have been in the past. It is not necessary to discuss the matter historically, and therefore, I will only say that I prefer to begin the Session this way rather than at a later period to have to make appeals for concessions, which then take the character of a much more complete absorption of the time of private Members than I now desired to make. The absorption of the whole time of the House by the Government has been necessary in the public interest, but it is an exceedingly unsatisfactory condition of things, and it is one which I hope may be avoided by the assistance of Members on both sides of the House. If we can only find a method of dealing with the problem before us in a business-like manner—in something like the manner in which other great Assemblies transact theirs, I think we may accomplish even better results with a saving of time. I beg to move the Resolution.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That until Easter, whenever the Committee of Supply is appointed for Tuesday or Thursday, the House shall meet at Two of the clock. At such Morning Sittings the Committee of Supply shall be the principal Business, and the provisions of Standing Order 66 shall be extended to Tuesday. The Motion appointing the next Sitting of the Committee of Supply may be taken at any hour, though opposed.”— (Mr. William Henry Smith.)

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I am very sorry the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian is not able to be present to-day, but I am sufficiently acquainted with the views of the right hon. Gentleman to be able to answer the Leader of the House. I will not dispute that the condition of business in the House is unsatisfactory, and that it has been so for a long time; but I am afraid that the Opposition and the Government will not agree as to the causes of that unsatisfactory condition; and the remedy I would recommend would be very much wider and broader than Motions of this kind. We have been promised over and over again that the House of Commons shall have plenty of time to deal with all the subjects it desires to discuss, because in a certain portion of the United Kingdom the success of the Government's administration has been such that there is really no question of difficulty there. If that were so we need not anticipate any discussions upon that subject; but I am not so sanguine, and I am afraid that there are difficulties that will still lead to a good deal of discussion. It is true that proposals were made in former times for dealing with the Estimates. In 1886 there was a Committee on the subject, presided over by the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale, and the Government then made proposals for dealing with the Estimates, but they were rejected by the friends of the right hon. Gentleman, and mainly through the opposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. No doubt the Estimates occupied more time last year than in former years, but the obvious reason was that the Government took the whole time of the House. The consequence has been that the utmost ingenuity has been employed to find in Committee of Supply opportunities for discussion which cannot be had in any other way. It is for the same reason that the Debate on the Address has become, of late years, so protracted. The Government is now asking for a limited sacrifice of the time of private Members. I understand the present Motion only asks for the time of the House till Easter, and, of course, it is on that footing, and on that footing alone, that we have to deal with this proposal. I quite admit the great difficulty in which the Government are placed at this moment is partly owing to the late commencement of the Session, with reference to Votes in Supply which must be obtained before a certain date. To the limited demand made for the purpose of enabling legal conditions to be fulfilled I have no opposition to offer; and I am glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman say that the enforcement of the Resolution must be subject to the condition of allowing time for the discussion of questions that may be raised by the Opposition. For I contemplate that we shall have grave matters to bring before the House, and I desire that they shall be submitted to the House at the earliest possible moment. On the Vote on Account we shall desire to challenge the conduct of the Executive Government in this country and in Ireland. There are questions to be raised with regard to the conduct of the principal Law Officer of the Crown and with regard to Irish magistrates and constables; and these are matters which might be properly discussed on the Vote on Account. There is also another matter, which it would be premature to refer to, but upon which it will be our duty to ask for the opinion of the House. I will be no party to limiting the liberties of private Members, but I will not oppose the facilities asked for by the Government in the special circumstances, and under the necessary conditions which have been recognized by the Leader of the House.

*MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I certainly did not expect that we should have any assistance from the Front Bench below me in resisting this demand of the Government; the Front Benches invariably agree in the attempt to absorb the time of private Members. I do not believe there is anyone in the House but is anxious that the discussions in Supply should be more frequent and more efficient than they have been in the past, but I do not believe the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman will tend to that result. There are two strong objections to it; in the first place it is an unwarranted infringement of the rights of private Members; and, secondly, it will cause an undue prolongation of the Sittings of the House without adequate reason shown for it. The right hon. Gentleman says let us meet at 2 o'clock, but he forgot to remind us that when we do so we sit until 1 o'clock the next morning. In regard to private Members, I am bound to say that I may be somewhat partial in this matter, because I have for the first time after four or five years of membership had the satisfaction of drawing the first place for the coming Tuesday, and now the Government propose to take away my ewe lamb. I naturally resent it. But the right hon. Gentleman tells us that we may have our discussions in the evening, but every Member knows perfectly well that unless the matter is one combining Radicalism with amusement, such, for instance, as the reform of the House of Lords, it is impossible for a private Member to make or keep a House after five hours' work and the two hours' interval, and practically it comes to this, that the Government secure five hours for official work, the House is counted at 9 o'clock, and you, Sir, have an opportunity of going to bed at a reasonable time. I must say, if the Government are to make a proposal in reference to Tuesdays, it would be much better for them to be bold, and to say the exigencies of the time require us to take the whole day. As it is, they only get five hours, and the rest of the time is almost certain to be wasted. I would much rather see them get a good night of the ordinary hours for Supply than see this time wasted. It is perfectly true that one reason why there is so much time absorbed in Motions on the Estimates, on adjournments and discussions in Supply, is that the Government are always intruding on the rights of private Members. If private Members cannot get these rights in meal they will have them in malt. I do not believe this appropriation of Tuesdays will save any of the time of the House, because Members who find themselves counted out will take care to raise questions in which they are interested on the Estimates or in some other way. The right hon. Gentleman says he only asks this now in order to save the absorption of time of private Members later on in the Session. I never yet heard a Government make this proposal, without saying that they do it to safeguard future rights; and after Easter we shall find the Government ready with another proposal to absorb more of our rights. So much in regard to Tuesday. But I do want to ask what in the world is the reason for making this proposal in reference to Thursdays? It simply comes to this—that instead of sitting from 3 to 12 we shall sit from 2 to 7, and from 9 to 1. Why, we all know perfectly well, and I should have thought the right hon. Gentleman would know, that the best time to get through business, especially Supply, is just those two hours about dinner-time.

We shall have, instead of nine consecutive hours, a division into five hours and four hours—the first period taken up by the front benches, and a great part of the second. What possible gain can be expected I cannot see. The number of hours will be exactly the same, and hon. Members will be inconvenienced by having the hour in the morning and the hour after 12 o'clock added, or one hour at each end, the Government losing two hours, and those the two best hours, in the middle. I protest most emphatically against the proposal—not that we do not desire that Supply should be adequately discussed, but we object at this early period—the third week of the Session—to private Members' rights being ruthlessly invaded; and the proposal as to Thursday is one of the most extraordinary with reference to business that any Government—even a Conservative Government—ever made to the House.

MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries): I will not prolong the debate beyond a few words. Certainly I am somewhat disappointed that my right hon. Friend (Sir W. Harcourt) has taken the course he has taken; for, although I have every confidence in him upon other matters, I have not on this subject—the protection of the rights of private Members. Now, what is the situation? At the very beginning of the Session, and with no special circumstances to justify them, the Government take away a considerable portion of private Members' time down to Easter; and if they do it now, I do not see why they should not do it at the commencement of every Session. There are important questions which hon. Members desire to raise; for example, the hon. Member for West Nottingham has a Motion in reference to the condition of the poor in our great cities. Last year his opportunity was taken away in this manner, and now it is to be taken away again, merely to enable the Government easily and leisurely to get through Supply. Many projects have at different times been submitted to the House, any one of which the Government might have adopted instead of thus taking away private Members' rights. These encroachments are continually going on. From 1880 to 1885 there were few; in 1886 and 1887 they increased; and in 1888 the time of private Members was almost entirely taken away; and now, at an earlier stage than ever, the process is continued, against all the traditions of the House. It has always been customary to allow Members facilities for bringing on matters of public interest, and, public attention being thus directed, they frequently afterwards become the subject of important measures.

*MR. SPEAKER: The form in which the hon. Member has put down his Amendment cannot appear on the Journals of the House, as it is not, as it stands, an independent proposition. Perhaps it will suit the hon. Member's purpose to meet the right hon. Gentleman's proposal with a negative.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I will do that, Sir.

MR. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I have a good deal of sympathy with Members against whom there seems to be a conspiracy of the two front benches. I confess I am not surprised in the least at the course taken by the right hon. Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt). He is always extremely liberal, and in this case he does not mind how much of private Members' time is taken up, provided he gets the opportunity of ventilating any grievance against the Government whenever he pleases. That is an attitude I am not surprised at. But I submit there is another side to this question. Undoubtedly it is desirable that we should get on better with Supply than we have done in recent Sessions. Undoubtedly, in these days it does take a great deal longer for any Government to get Supply than it did some years ago, when first I had the honour of a seat in this House, and this is mainly owing to the increase and development of the talking powers of hon. Members.

Now we are told that to fulfil the conditions of the law these days must be appropriated by the Government, and if it is absolutely necessary we must consent to it; but it appears to me the conditions of the law would be fulfilled if, instead of taking the Tuesdays up to Easter, the Government took them up to March 31. This suggestion I submit for consideration. I have always protested against this absorption of private Members' rights, and I confess I am the more inclined to do so now, having in view a subject in which I take great interest—interest that I know is shared on both sides of the House; and certainly I shall take what steps I can to secure a day for its discussion before the end of the Session. I hope the suggestion I have made to limit the Motion to March 31 will find favour; but, whether or no, the passing of this Motion must not be taken as a precedent to be followed up with another immediately after Easter. My experience is that a Motion made thus early is very likely to be soon renewed.

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck): There are strong reasons why we should not consent to this proposal. It will be in the recollection of the House that on Wednesday afternoon a special appeal was made to the Leader of the House in reference to a Motion standing in the name of the hon. Member for West Nottingham, raising a very important question, which we hoped to have fully and properly discussed. That Motion stands for the 26th; but a week earlier there is a Motion in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Morpeth (Mr. Burt), in which many Members on both sides take the deepest interest. During the whole of last Session my hon. Friend was unfortunate in the ballot; but, having been more fortunate this Session, I sincerely hope his opportunity will not be taken away. From the shake of the right hon. Gentleman's head I suppose I may infer that he means that it will not be taken away, because there will be opportunity for discussion at the Evening Sitting; but I submit the time at our disposal in the evening would not be sufficient to deal with a question of such vital importance, for I know there is a desire among many Members on both sides to take part in the discussion. I certainly could not give a silent vote on this occasion, and I make an appeal at least to except the 19th and 26th from this Motion, that we may have the opportunity of discussing Motions that are of vital interest to the industrial classes of the country.

*SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT (Sussex, N.W.): I can quite understand the right hon. Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) when he says he will have ample opportunity of discussing the difficult and delicate questions he is prepared to bring before the House, and that is a statement which of course the First Lord will take notice of, because it means that we shall be considerably delayed with the Estimates, even with the time the Government now propose to take. The Committee of Public Accounts are considering whether the number of Civil Service Votes can be reduced; but there is another point that deserves serious consideration, and that is whether, in this branch of the Estimates, Votes might be taken and used precisely in the same way as they are used in the Navy and Army Estimates. If that were done, I venture to say it would prevent a large waste of the time of the House. I merely mention it as a subject deserving serious consideration. Now, we were kept here until Christmas last year. Do you want to be kept here until Christmas again? I venture to say we ought to do everything in our power to prevent an Autumn Session, and it is only by working steadily at the Estimates that we can prevent that. We all know what a melancholy failure that Autumn Session was, and I hope we shall not be placed in such a position again. Therefore it is that while disliking, as I do, taking away the time of private Members, I shall support the proposal. It must be remembered that at least private Members will have as much time as the Government up to Easter, half Tuesdays and all Wednesdays and Fridays. But I would, however, make an appeal to my right hon. Friend in respect to Thursdays. I cannot for the life of me see what object is to be gained by the proposal. Let us have Supply on Thursday and proceed consecutively through the day. I am not at all sure that even the Government, without great pressure, will be able to keep a House at 9 o'clock. I am sure it would be more in the interest of business to leave Thursday as it is.

Mr. Chaplin

MR. T. E. ELLIS (Merionethshire): I support resistance to this combination of the front benches to take away the time of private Members. Year by year this encroachment increases under Liberal and Conservative Governments alike. But our grievances must be discussed, if not in the old way on the Motion for going into Supply, then upon special Votes as they arise, so progress is not actually accelerated. The hope that our time after Easter will not be taken is utterly groundless. It is a completely hollow promise for the right hon. Gentleman to hold out any hope that the Government will be more tender with our time than now. Let me point to one consideration in reference to this meeting at 2 o'clock on two days of the week. It is putting an unnecessary and unfair strain upon a large number of Members who attend Committees upstairs. They cannot attend to their duties there commencing at noon, and then take that interest in the proceedings here as they are supposed to do until 1 o'clock the next morning. It is unprecedented for the Government to make this demand at this period of the Session. When the right hon. Gentleman asks us to work as other great Assemblies do, he asks us to do an impossible task. No other Assembly attempts to do the work we attempt, attending to the interest of an Empire of untold millions, and actively superintending the government of every parish, county, and nationality in the United Kingdom. You are asking us to perform an impossible task. Various Governments have tried to change our Rules of Procedure, but it becomes more apparent Session by Session that this House has completely broken down under the strain put upon it, and that you never will be able, by any changes in procedure, to keep abreast of the work to be done. The only remedy is that hinted at by the right hon. Gentleman last Session, that, instead of putting increased work on one Assembly, you should delegate to local Assemblies in England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland, work that can be more effectually done by them. I hope opposition to this Motion will be pressed to Division.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. Goschen, St. George's, Hanover Square): I can assure the House this proposal is made with every desire to meet the views of hon. Members. Supply is in one sense Government business, but in another sense it affords to Members the opportunity of criticizing the conduct of the Executive Government, and the performance of a certain portion of those functions for which the right hon. Gentleman opposite is so anxious to retain full time to private Members. But I am bound to say it appears to me that a larger number of private Members have far more opportunities of taking part in criticism of the Executive on the days of Supply than on those particular days when a private Member brings forward a Motion, and when he does not, perhaps, secure a very large attendance. I can assure hon. Members that the Government have a harder time when Supply is before the House than when a private Member's Motion is under consideration. If we consulted merely our own convenience, we should rejoice at the Motions on Tuesday, inasmuch as most of the Ministers can then take a holiday, instead of having to be present in the House prepared as we ought to be, and as I hope we are, to meet the criticisms that may be passed upon our conduct. The hon. Member opposite says no Assembly in the world has such a mighty task, and I entirely agree with him, but no Assembly devotes anything like the proportion of time we do to the minutest criticism of the minutest details in the Estimates. I have often wondered, when I have heard two Members discussing as they did last year over so small an item as £10 paid for a park-keeper's ammunition, if they consider that there may be others who desire to discuss colonial and other large matters of administration. A small number of Members carry their criticism to such a minute point that they prevent time being given to larger and more general questions of policy which certainly ought to engage the attention of the House. I can assure the House that in proposing to take Morning Sittings on Tuesday and Thursday, it is with the idea that we should allow some reciprocity to Members for the time taken from Tuesday. We do not seek to take the time from them without an assurance that a portion of the time shall be given to Supply. I judge that I am not mistaken in the belief that the right hon. Gentleman opposite considers it a reciprocal concession on our part. It was made with that view, and we have reason to believe it was so estimated by some Members for whose judgment we have considerable regard. What I would suggest to the House is, that they should, at least, allow us to take this on trial and see how it works. We are only anxious to get on with Supply. Hon. Members will admit that Supply is to a great extent private Members' time, for not only do we vote the money, but we ventilate grievances—and grievances are freely brought forward in relation to many subjects for which Supply affords ample opportunity. Therefore, we really thought we were not trenching much on the rights of Members in making the suggestion. We ask you at least to give it a trial until Easter; and if it does not work smoothly, if hon. Members do not get their opportunity, it will be open to us to reconsider the matter. We do not wish to force our view with any degree of obstinacy or persistency, but there is a desire that Supply should be brought on early, and full opportunity will be given for financial criticism, as well as for the ventilation of grievances that arise in connection with administration.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): The right hon. Gentleman said he was willing to make a sacrifice in conceding an alteration as regards Tuesday.

MR. GOSCHEN: As regards Thursday.

MR. LABOUCHERE: As regards Tuesday, I think the right hon. Gentleman used the word "sacrifice." I can assure him we do not want him to make that sacrifice, and that we prefer to remain as we are as regards Tuesday. The right hon. Gentleman says he makes the sacrifice to us as a sort of quid pro quo, but are we sure that he will put down the Estimates on Thursdays as well as Tuesdays? What is to prevent him on a Thursday going on with the Estimates for a certain number of hours, and then going on with other business? I really believe the majority on both sides of the House would infinitely prefer to meet at 3 o'clock and adjourn at 12 o'clock, than to meet at 2 and adjourn from 7 till 9 o'clock and then sit until 1 o'clock. I do hope we shall have some sort of assurance from the right hon. Gentleman that he will not press this matter as regards Thursday. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chaplin) came forward as a private Member, and said he had sympathy with us. It is an exceedingly barren sympathy. He is going to vote against us, this sympathetic friend. He says that this will not be established as a precedent for the taking of all Tuesdays, because it appears that the right hon. Gentleman wants it after Easter, to treat us to an essay on bi-metallism. I can tell the right hon. Gentleman that if you give an inch to a Minister he will take an ell. We will not get back the Tuesdays after Easter, and they will take our Fridays. It is an additional reason with me for voting against the Resolution that I might lose the chance of hearing the most interesting essay on bi-metallism. I entirely agree with the right hon. Gentleman that the Members of both front benches need to be thoroughly instructed in these matters. A man, once he becomes a Minister, loses half his virtue. The reason private Members have been crushed like worms is because hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House will not turn. There are two notes upon this question—the official and the non-official or private Members below the Gangway on either side of the House. Private Members have always stood together—irrespective of Party—in protection of their rights; but the reason why we cannot get those rights now is that hon. Gentlemen on those benches are too servile to their Leaders. It is notorious that no reforms whatever would have been brought forward had it not been for private Members, who bring forward their measures or resolutions, probably getting small divisions at first, but gradually increasing them until the Ministry, from considerations of Party support in the House and country, are at length compelled to deal with the questions so brought into public view for settlement. It is absolutely essential for the well-being of this country, and for the progress of any species of reform, that you should have private Members' nights. We have been told that the Estimates must be pressed forward at this time of the Session, otherwise we shall have to sit until Christmas. Irrespective of the Estimates, there will be a good deal to discuss, and which we will insist upon discussing. But surely there is no necessity for taking private Members' nights after we have only been sitting for fourteen days, unless it is the fear of sitting until Christmas. I cannot see anything in the gracious Speech of Her Majesty to show that the Government have any important business to lay before this House. We are going to have an increase of the Navy, which will of course be approved on this side of the House. We are going to have a Scotch Local Government Bill, in respect of which, knowing nothing about Scotch business, I shall vote with the majority of Scotch Members, who ought to know pretty well what they want. I do hope the First Lord of the Treasury will reconsider this proposal, or if not—for I know that he has the majority at his back—that he will reconsider it with regard to Thursday.

*MR. DE LISLE (Mid Leicestershire): I hope the House will pardon my supporting the Motion, for, in doing so, I shall be imposing on myself a Lenten penance, which, like other Lenten penances, may not lead to an amendment of life. I agree with the hon. Gentleman opposite that Morning Sittings do not add much to our work, and at the Evening Sittings it is often impossible to keep a House for the discussion of questions in which we are interested. I hope this is the last time a Motion of this kind will be proposed. I hope the House will give a kind consideration to the proposal which I had on the Paper last Session, for it meets nearly all the objections which have been urged on both sides of the House. It has been said by the First Lord of the Treasury that discussions in Committee of Supply are generally not of a profitable kind. Now my proposal is that thirty days of the Session should be set apart for the discussion of the Estimates, dividing the total into 10 parts, and allowing for the discussion of each class of the Estimates three days. When these three days had elapsed, then the Closure would, by automatic action, be applied at midnight. Thirty days are in excess of the average number, the figures given by the First Lord of the Treasury showing that the number of days devoted to Supply for the last 20 years average 26 days, although last year 42 days were devoted to Supply. In classes of the Civil Service which are sub-divided into English, Scotch, and Irish Estimates the Government, by taking English Estimates the first day, Scotch the second, and Irish the third day, would be able to reduce the discussion of Irish affairs to just and well-proportioned limits, and if necessary to insure adequate and fair discussion. Spokesmen might be selected on both sides, who should devote their energies to the subjects which they had mastered. I hope the House will give this proposal their careful consideration. As a loyal supporter of the Government, I am bound, though not without regret, to vote for the Motion of the First Lord of the Treasury.

SIR W. FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): The hon. Member who has just sat down says he will vote for the Motion as a matter of penance; but I must join with hon. Members in protesting against this interference with private Members' rights. Our experience of Evening Sittings last Session was by no means satisfactory, for the House counted out on several occasions. Now, when there are several questions affecting the industrial classes to be discussed, I emphatically object to a return to a system that has worked badly. I think it is time private Members should protest against these reciprocal concessions being made at their expense. The proposal of the right hon. Gentleman is to restore the custom of last Session with regard to Tuesdays, and which did not work well, and further it seeks to apply that which worked badly to another day of the week. I do not see the advantage of it. It is a great inconvenience to hon. Members to be brought down to the House at two o'clock, only to adjourn at seven and meeting again at nine—a course which gives you exactly the same number of working hours, only with this disadvantage, that an interval like that from seven to nine retards the work. therefore, I holding as I do, that the use of Thursday as a day for Morning Sittings would interfere with the business of the House, I move that the words "or Thursday" be omitted.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy): I beg to second the Amendment, and would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury to give due consideration to the general feeling of this House on the subject. I am quite ready to come here at two o'clock, but I have a strong objection to stay here till one o'clock in the morning, especially when two hours in the middle of the time are rendered absolutely useless.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "or Thursday."—(Sir Walter Foster.)

SIR W. HARCOURT: There seems to be a strong feeling in the House as to the inconvenience of the arrangement as to Thursday, and I would suggest that the Government might avoid the inconvenience of a Morning Sitting on that day if they would allow the House to meet at the usual hour on the understanding that after a certain amount of time has been given to Supply, progress shall be reported and the legislative business proceeded with. The Government can hardly expect to get through all the legislative business on the Monday, and must, therefore, have some portion of another day on which legislative measures can be considered.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: If it be the pleasure of the House to sit at three o'clock on Thursdays instead of two, I shall not object so long as the House is agreeable to carry out the spirit of the proposal I have submitted, and give an amount of time to Supply equal to that which we shall obtain on Tuesdays. In that case I will endeavour to carry out the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, and not insist on the part of the Resolution which relates to Thursday.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I object entirely to the proposal of the Government, who are anxious to put further obstacles in the way of the discussion of Irish business. I think there never was a time when the Government were less entitled to take the time of private Members. I can assure my Friends below the Gangway who have spoken with sorrow of the opportunities that will be lost to them in regard to the consideration of matters in which they are interested, that it is not English matters of which the Government are thinking; the object of this proposal is entirely to extinguish Irish discussions. [Laughter.] Hon. Members opposite laugh, and I quite agree with the suggestion that laughter conveys—namely, that Her Majesty's Government will not succeed in preventing the discussion of Irish matters. We have in Ireland a most stringent Coercion Act—the operation of which is producing daily acts of cruelty and injustice—and the Irish people, in view of this, have a right to have their affairs discussed in this House. The more the Government coerce in Ireland, the more strenuously will they endeavour to apply the Closure with regard to Irish discussions in this House; the Closure with them being the complement of Coercion.

MR. T. M. HEALY: If the Government will only frankly state that no business will be taken at the Tuesday Morning Sittings except Supply, and that no other business of a contentious character will be taken, I think the House will be satisfied. I should like to know what the Government mean by "the principal business?" Do they mean that no business shall be taken on Tuesday mornings except Supply and purely formal business, and that they will not bring on contentious matters?

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: While thanking the Government for the concession they have made, I am fully of opinion that it does not meet our objections to their proposals, and therefore I shall feel bound to divide the House on the Question.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I think we ought to have some clear understanding as to what is to be "the principal business;" and that the Resolution is not to be used except for the most formal business beyond Supply.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It might be necessary to take the Report of Committee of Supply, or a stage of the Consolidated Fund Bill.

Question, "That the words 'or Thursday' stand part of the Question," put, and negatived.

Main Question, as amended, put:—The House divided; Ayes 255; Noes 132.—(Division List, No. 11.)

Resolved, That until Easter, whenever the Committee of Supply is appointed for Tuesday, the House shall meet at 2 of the clock. At such Morning Sittings the Committee of Supply shall be the principal Business, and the provisions of Standing Order 56 shall be extended to Tuesday. The Motion appointing the next Sitting of the Committee of Supply may be taken at any hour, though opposed.

POOR RELIEF (IRELAND) ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Tuite, Bill to amend and extend the Acts relating to Poor Relief in Ireland, in order to enable Boards of Guardians to provide Industrial Training for Pauper Children, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Tuite, M<sup>c</sup>Cartan, Mr. P. J. Power, Mr. Pinkerton, Mr. Patrick Joseph O'Brien, and Dr. Fox.

SMALL DEBTS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Caldwell, Bill to extend and amend the Law relating to the recovery of Small Debts in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Caldwell, Mr. W. P. Sinclair, Mr. Thorburn, and Mr. Provand.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 153.]

SHERIFF COURTS CONSOLIDATION CIVIL CODE (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Caldwell, Bill to combine in one Code the regulations affecting Sheriff Courts in Scotland, and to extend and amend the Law of civil process therein, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Caldwell, Sir George Trevelyan, and Mr. Philipps.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 154.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (MR. BRADLAUGH)—MOTION TO EXPUNGE FROM THE JOURNALS OF THE HOUSE RESOLUTION OF THE 22ND JUNE, 1880.

*MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): The Amendment which now stands in my name, and which I now beg to move, is—"That the Resolution of this House of the 22nd day of June, 1880, 'That having regard to the Reports and Proceedings of Two Select Committees appointed by this House, Mr.

Bradlaugh be not permitted to take the oath or make the affirmation mentioned in the Statute 29 Vic. c. 19, and the 31 & 32 Vic. c. 72,' be expunged from the Journals of this House, as being subversive of the rights of the whole body of electors of this Kingdom."

Now, this Resolution which I ask the House to assent to will be found in the Commons' Journal, vol. 135, page 934. In asking the House to give its assent to the Motion, I trust I may be allowed to express a hope that the Government will not feel it its duty to oppose it. The Resolution itself is not without precedent. There are, indeed, several precedents upon the Journals of the House, but I shall only trouble the House with five of them, and those very briefly. Two of them are exactly applicable to the state of things I am about to submit to the House this evening. The one most in point is the Resolution which stands in the Commons' Journal, vol. 38, page 937, of the 3rd of May, 1782, and is as follows:—

"That the entry in the Journals of the House on the 17th of February, 1769, of a Resolution that John Wilkes, having been in this Session expelled the House, was and is incapable of being elected a Member of the present Parliament, be expunged from the Journals of this House, as being subversive of the rights of the electors of this Kingdom."

That, however, was not the first Resolution of this character. In vol. 4 of the Commons' Journal, page 397, there is this entry:—

"The House took into consideration the Votes and Orders of this House for disabling Mr. Henry Martyn to sit as a Member of Parliament."

After some discussion, it was resolved—

"That this Resolution be annulled and made void and erased out of the book, and that the Clerk do vacate the same accordingly."

There are several other Resolutions which, by subsequent Resolutions, have been expunged from the Journals of the House. One will be found in 5 Commons Journals, page 197, but it is impossible now to discover its application, the page being blank, the Resolution having been actually expunged, and no trace of it left. Then there is in the 11th Commons Journals, page 210, an entry of a payment made to Sir Thomas Clarges which is directed to be struck out; and, curiously enough, there are two other entries on the same page which are also directed to be expunged, and which related to the Rev. Dr. Nowel and Mr. Lenthall for words spoken. So that what I am asking the House to do to-night, if I make out a good case, is only a matter which has been done more than once. I do not propose, in what I have to say, to re-awaken any of the bitterness which might be found in portions of the struggle which commenced with this Resolution. My desire is rather to induce the House, in the interests of my constituents specially, and in the interests, I think I have a right to say, of the electors generally, to erase the Resolution from the Records of the House, the struggle in this matter having practically ended by the passing into law last year of the Oaths Act. I do not propose to make any other statement of facts than that which is found in Sir Erskine May's admirable summary, and the only references I shall make are to the Journals and the Report of the Select Committee, to which I must refer in order to make myself clear. I shall abstain from referring in any way to Hansard, because it would be impossible for me to do so without remembering things which Members on the other side of the House have shown a wise disposition to forget, and which I have no desire to recall. There is only one exception which I shall make to that, and the House will see the reason why I make it. In the Journals of the House of Commons it will be seen by reference to vol. 135, page 123, that it is recorded that I did not come to the House until the 3rd of May, 1880, to make my claim to affirm, while the Journals show that Parliament opened on the 29th of April, several days earlier. I think it is absolutely necessary, both for my own honour and in order to explain what is otherwise not clear, that I should state why it was that I delayed coming to the Table. What I am now stating has reference to the late Speaker of the House of Commons, of whom I desire to speak with the most profound respect, and for whose personal courtesy towards myself, during the difficult struggle to which I am referring, no words of recognition on my part can be too high. I have no desire to speak of him except as a Judge holding a high position in which I am sure that in every respect he tried to do what he thought to be right and just in reference to the honour of this House and the rights of individual Members. Of course it is necessary that I should challenge the decision of the late Speaker upon one point, although I admit that the House itself acted with him. It must be remembered that I am speaking now of the opposition which I received some years after it happened, but I received full permission at that time from Mr. Speaker Brand to state at any time, seeing that the matter had been alluded to by Sir Stafford Northcote in a speech to the House, that I delayed coming to the Table after having communicated informally to Mr. Speaker and to the Clerk, subsequent to my election, my intention to claim to affirm, as I then thought I had a right to do, in consequence of Mr. Speaker's request that I should wait until the opinions of the then Attorney General, Sir John Holker, the Solicitor General, the present Lord Chancellor, the Speaker's Counsel, and an eminent legal personage who was not named to me, and whose name, therefore, although I think I know it, I have no right to mention, had been taken, as to whether my claim to affirm was a claim which, in their opinion, was well founded in law. I stated then to Mr. Speaker Brand that, if the opinion of the majority of these personages turned out to be against me, although I thought myself right in my individual opinion, I should bow to their decision. I was told by the Clerk, Sir Erskine May, and afterwards by Mr. Speaker Brand, that if the opinion of the majority was not in my favour, the majority were certainly not against me. Under those circumstances I came to the Table, relying not merely upon my own view, but knowing that most eminent legal authority held exactly the same view as I did. I say this because the case has been sometimes put as though I had thrust a conflict upon the House of Commons, implying that I was wrong from the commencement, and that a degree of moral blame attaches to me which would naturally attach to me if the statement were true. I will assume, for the purposes of my Resolution this evening, that my claim to affirm was an ill-founded claim. Any way that is a position which I am bound to accept, because it was so decided against me by a competent tribunal. It is right, however, that I should inform the House that in the trial at bar, in which I was defendant, the learned Chief Justice of England, referring to that decision against my claim to affirm, said—“Whether that is well or ill decided it is not for me to suggest. It is decided, and decided by authority superior to the Court sitting here.” Frankly I admit that the whole difficulty in the struggle arose from my making a claim to affirm, which the Courts ultimately held to be an ill-founded claim. I have made that admission, because I desire to be as frank with the House as it is possible to be, because I wish to appeal to the generous judgment of hon. Members, as well as to their just judgment in the way in which they will deal with my Motion this evening. It is right I should remind the House that one Committee having decided, as far as a Committee can decide by its Report, that my claim to affirm was ill founded, when the matter was referred to a second Select Committee on my claiming to take the oath, this is what happened. The Journals of the House say—

“Mr. Bradlaugh, returned as one of the Members for the Borough of Northampton, came to the Table to take and subscribe the oath, and the Clerk was proceeding to administer the same to him, when Sir Henry Drummond Wolff, the Member for Portsmouth, rose to take objection and to submit a Resolution to the House.”

Now, I cannot help thinking that Mr. Speaker Brand did not then act upon what was clearly his view as contained in the Journals of the 26th April, 1881, when he said that—

“The hon. Member for Northampton, having been introduced, has come to take the oath in the accustomed form, and is prepared to comply with the provision prescribed by the House, ought, under ordinary circumstances, to be continued without interruption.”

I submit that the words “under ordinary circumstances” ought to have been omitted, and that between the return of a Member to Parliament and the performance of his duties at the Table imposed upon him by law, whatever they are, there should be no kind of interference, supposing that he comes regularly in compliance with the Standing Orders to that Table ready to fulfil everything imposed on him by law. If he does not fulfil these obligations, there is then a method of trying the question by a tribunal—a Court before which all matters of fact would have to be proved and none assumed. That was not the course adopted. Sir H. D. Wolff was permitted to submit a Resolution under which the matter was referred to a Select Committee. The Report of the Committee is rather long, but I will only trouble the House with two material paragraphs contained in it, and which are those which come last. The Committee were

“of opinion that in making the claim to affirm Mr. Bradlaugh voluntarily brought to the notice of the House that on several occasions he had been permitted in Courts of Justice to affirm under the Evidence Amendment Acts, 1869 and 1870.”

Therefore the Committee reported that the House could—and in their opinion, if it could, it ought to—prevent Mr. Bradlaugh from going through the form of taking the oath. The Committee pointed out that if the House prevented a duly elected Member from taking the oath or affirming, there was no power of reviewing or reversing that decision, however erroneous it might be in point of law. The Committee, therefore, recommended that should Mr. Bradlaugh again request to make and subscribe the affirmation, he should not be prevented from so doing. But the House of Commons, in its wisdom, did not accept that Report, and passed the Resolution which I now ask the House to erase from its Journals, declaring that Mr. Bradlaugh should not be permitted either to take the oath or to make an affirmation. Having put this to the House, I should like to say that there is no truth in the statement that in any fashion whatever, either directly or indirectly, have I ever sought, during any portion of the struggle, to put upon this House any opinions I hold upon any matter whatever other than those which are connected with the discharge of my political duties as a Member of this House. Now, it is clear what was the old practice of the House, and I am going to ask this House to renew and re-affirm it by erasing this Resolution from its Books. The old practice, as shown by Hatsell, vol. ii., p. 64, was that on a Member appearing to take his seat, all business was suspended until he was sworn. I do not ask the House to vary the change as to time made by the Stand-trust I may not have to waste the time of the House, which, willingly, I have never wasted and do not desire to waste, in such an undertaking, and I trust the House may feel they can accept the Resolution in the spirit in which I move it, without taunt or boasting, only entreating the High Court of Parliament to do itself the justice which none other has the power to do.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words—

"The Resolution of this House on the 22nd day of June, 1880, 'having regard to the Reports and Proceedings of two Select Committees appointed by this House, Mr. Bradlaugh be not permitted to take the oath or make the affirmation mentioned in the Statute 29 Vic. c. 19, and the 31 and 32 Vic. c. 72,' be expunged from the Journals of this House, as being subversive of the rights of the whole body of Electors of this Kingdom,"—(Mr. Bradlaugh,)

—instead thereof.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, Bristol, W.): I think the calm atmosphere of the House at the present time is a sufficient earnest to the hon. Member that the question he has brought forward will be approached by the Government, and by any hon. Member who addresses the House, in no spirit of personal hostility to himself, and with no desire to re-awaken unpleasant memories. Sir, I would point out, in the first place, that the Motion of the hon. Member is no mere request for the assertion of a principle or doctrine in which himself believes; it is to ask the House to take the very serious step of expunging from the Journals a Resolution entered upon those Journals by the vote of a previous Parliament. Now, Sir, I hope I shall command the assent of the House, whatever their opinion upon this Resolution itself may have been, to this proposition, that no such step as that which the hon. Member asks the House to take should be taken on account of a mere difference of opinion, if such difference of opinion exist, between one Parliament and another. If it were otherwise, we might be asked to rescind Resolutions passed by previous Parliaments on any conceivable subject. Not only the inconvenience, but the unconstitutional nature of such a course is obvious. I venture, Sir, to submit to this House that the only ground upon which it could be asked that the Resolution of a former Parliament should be rescinded is this: that it should be clearly proved that the Resolution is either contrary to the law or the Constitution of the country. Well, now, what is the argument of the hon. Member? He asks the House to rescind this Resolution, in the first place in the name of justice to himself, but it appears to me that if the Resolution was in accordance with the law it was not unjust. Secondly, he asks us to do this as a protest against some terrible prospect which he holds out—that this or some future Parliament may exercise the power of debarring 10 or 20 or any number of Members from coming to the Table to take the oath and their seats. But, Sir, the mere expunging of this Resolution—if Parliament possesses such a power—could not deprive it of that power. We can only deal with this Resolution as one arrived at under certain circumstances, and applicable only to a particular case. In the first place I deny that the precedents which the hon. Member has quoted afford any argument for the course he recommends. The two precedents on which he seemed most to rely are the case of Henry Martyn and that of Wilkes, in 1782. I think that the case of Henry Martyn was not an expunging by one Parliament of a Resolution arrived at by a previous Parliament. It was merely the expunging by a Parliament of a Resolution which the same Parliament had previously arrived at, by which a disqualification had been imposed on Henry Martyn; and it must be perfectly obvious that that is a very different thing from asking the House to go back nine years and expunge a Resolution at which a previous Parliament had arrived, which certainly now imposes no disqualification on anybody. In the case of Mr. Wilkes, that gentleman moved—

"That the following Resolution, which had been passed by a previous Parliament, should be expunged—'That Mr. Wilkes having been in this Session of Parliament expelled from the House was, and is, incapable of being elected a Member to serve in this present Parliament.'"

And the House of Commons of the day, on Mr. Wilkes's Motion, expunged the Resolution from its Journals as being subversive of the rights of the whole body of electors of this United Kingdom. But why was it subversive? Because it was considered that, although the House had, of course, the right to expel a Member, it had no right to debar the electors from returning him again if they so pleased. That does not apply to the case of the hon. Member. The Resolution which he asks us to expunge did not touch the power of the electors of Northampton to return the hon. Member as often as they choose, and, as a matter of fact, they did return him after it was passed. What the Resolution did was to express the opinion of the House of Commons that the hon. Member, after having been so returned, should not be allowed to take the oath or the affirmation prescribed in certain cases by law. What, Sir, was the effect of this Resolution, and how did the circumstances arise? As the hon. Member has very fairly admitted, they arose owing to his own action in asking to be permitted on the 3rd of May, 1880, to make an affirmation instead of taking the oath in the ordinary manner; that brought the whole case before the judgment of the House, and from that began all the subsequent proceedings in the Parliament of 1880 with regard to it. I remember when, at the commencement of the Parliament of 1886, before any hon. Members had taken the oath, I felt it my duty to place before you, Sir, by letter, the history of the case, and to ask you to submit to the judgment of the new House of Commons whether the hon. Member for Northampton should be permitted to take the oath or to affirm. You, Sir, declined to comply with the request, ruling that it was not for you nor for the House to enter into any inquisition as to what may be the opinions of a Member when he comes to the Table to take the oath. No question was then raised, and the hon. Member for Northampton took the oath like any other Member of the House. These circumstances obviously differed from the circumstances of the Parliament of 1880, when, by his own action in claiming to affirm, the hon. Member had invited the judgment of the House on his particular case. Now, Sir, I contend, in the words of one of the Committees, to which the hon. Member has referred, that there is an inherent power in the House to require that the law by which the proceedings of the House and its Members in reference to taking the oath is regulated, should be duly conformed to: and that was the power which was exercised in the Resolution which the hon. Member now asks to have expunged from the Journal. I think I can show, in the first place, that it was exercised strictly in accordance with the law. Indeed, the hon. Member has not denied it. What have been the decisions of the Courts? On March 31, 1881, the Court of Appeal decided that the hon. Member was a person who, by want of religious belief, was not entitled by the Parliamentary Oaths Act or the Promissory Oaths Act to make or subscribe an affirmation.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: I have not denied that the conclusion at which the House arrived was a conclusion in accordance with the judgment of the Court, but I deny the right or the duty of the House to arrive at any legal conclusion at all respecting a lawful return. I held that the Courts alone should do that.

*SIR M. HICKS-BEACH: I am arguing that the House in this matter did not arrive at a legal conclusion, but simply maintained and enforced the law. That was the decision of the Court of Appeal. The hon. Member, by his own action in being primarily responsible for the passage of the Oaths Act of last Session, has shown that he himself accepts the decision of that Court as good law. In January, 1885, the Court of Appeal decided that—

“The hon. Member having been found by a jury to be a person not believing in the existence of a Supreme Being, and upon whom the oath, as an oath, had no binding effect, is, owing to his want of religious belief, incapable by law of taking and subscribing the oath at the Table.”

That was the law in 1880, both as regards the taking of the oath and the right of the affirmation in the hon. Member's case. What the Resolution of the House did was simply to see that the law was enforced and carried out. The hon. Member contends it was not the duty or the right of the House to do so. But this is not the first time in the history of the present Parliament that he has brought the matter under the judgment of the House. Last Session he asked the House to declare that curious one. In the year 1769 the Resolution which was complained of had been carried by a substantial majority in a full House. Afterwards Wilkes, having been again elected, took his seat, and from time to time, between 1775 and 1782, made almost annual Resolutions on the subject. At last the Resolution was passed in a careless and tired House—a House which attached very little importance to the matter. There is in the Records of the House which are generally referred to for the facts of that period no mention of the Debate or the Division which resulted in expunging the Resolution from the Journals. In the seventh volume of “debrett's Parliamentary Debates” a reference is made to the incident, but it is a very short one, very little of the Debate is given, and the Motion is stated to have been eventually carried by 115 against 47. Only one speech was thought worthy of report by the editors of those reports, and that speech was the speech of Mr. Fox—[Sir W. HARCOURT, Hear, hear!]

—in which Mr. Fox protested strongly against the Motion being expunged. Mr. Fox opposed the Motion, but said—

“It was not from any false pride or fear of being thought inconsistent. He had turned the question often in his mind, and he was still convinced that the Resolution which gentlemen wanted to expunge was founded on proper principles. It was for the good of the people of England that the House should have a power of expelling any man whom the representatives of the people of England thought unworthy to sit among them; this was a privilege too valuable to be given up. He supposed some cases in which the public utility of it would be felt and acknowledged; if the Bill for excluding contractors from seats in that House had been rejected in the other; and that the House of Commons should come to a Resolution of their own that no person holding a contract should sit amongst them, the present contractors losing their seats might be re-elected, and then, if not prevented by the inherent power of the House to expel, the very men whom the House should have pronounced improper to sit among them might be returned again”.

The Resolution passed in 1769 was expunged in the Manuscript Journals of the House, but when they were reprinted in 1803 it was not expunged, and is to be found in the printed Journals to this day. The difference between that case and the present is perfectly clear. In respect to the present case the House had appointed two Select Committees, the first of which advised that the hon. Member (Mr. Bradlaugh) was not a person who could be allowed to affirm. That was sound law. Then the second Committee reported that the hon. Member was not a person who was capable of taking an oath.

MR. BRADLAUGH: The Committee added that in their opinion the House ought not to prevent me from affirming.

*SIR E. CLARKE: I am quite aware that that Committee added the suggestion that the hon. Member should be allowed to affirm; but in view of these declarations of the two Committees, what was the House to do? Was it to throw over the Reports of the Committees when it believed them to be sound, and to say that the hon. Member should be allowed to do one of these two things? The House of Commons was perfectly right in its law. In the conflict which ensued between the two sides of the House it was suggested by the right hon. and learned Member for Bury and those acting with him at the time that the House had no certain knowledge of the opinions of the hon. Member for Northampton, and, therefore, it ought not to take this action, but that it ought to be left to the judgment of a Court of Law. My right hon. and learned Friend has said in the course of his speech to-night that the House of Commons is a Court. It is part of the High Court of Parliament; and the House of Commons, knowing that the Member who came to the Bar was one who could not affirm and was incapable of taking an oath, was only discharging its first duty in passing that Resolution. I submit to the House that so far from being, as in the case of Wilkes, the assertion of a principle which the House may or may not now desire to get rid of, it is simply the Record of an act done by the House. There is no sense in expunging the Record from the proceedings of the House; it would be of no use to the hon. Member or to his constituents. There is nothing on the face of the Resolution which in the least degree infringes the Constitutional rights of the electors of the country, because the House took the proper course at that time in protecting itself against an illegal or profane performance taking place before it. If, however, it is suggested that the House should expunge had previously opposed him that they had no Constitutional right to prevent him taking his seat. If a constituency returns a Member to the House, that Member has a right to take his seat. If he took his seat wrongfully by affirming when he had no right to affirm, or by pretending to take the oath when he did not take it, there is a penalty imposed which prevents the Member from continuing to take his seat, because it is a recurrent penalty. What was contended for in July, 1880, and what was then opposed by the Government of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone) was the proposition that said, "We will not let the hon. Member take the oath or affirm." The House cannot probe the reasons or thoughts of men, and it is not in the power of the majority wilfully to lay down such a proposition in order that the right may be legally tried. The present case is identical in principle with that of Wilkes. In the case of Wilkes the effect of the House's action was to say, "The constituency had no right to return Mr. Wilkes, and his opponent is returned." That was an unconstitutional Resolution. If the House prevents a Member from either taking the oath or affirming, it is a barren argument to urge that the House does not prevent the constituency from returning the same Member again. It will be but an empty form for the constituency to go on returning the Member under such circumstances; and yet of such a character is the Motion which was proposed by Sir Hardinge Giffard and carried by the House of Commons. Both in the case of Wilkes and in the present case there is an unconstitutional interference with the rights of a constituency. I believe that the resolution of 1880 was unconstitutional and wrong, and that it never ought to have been entered on the Journals of the House. What ought to be done, then? To express a contrary opinion now would be scarcely enough. It was proposed in 1880 to insert in the Resolution the words "if Parliament shall otherwise direct," but those words were, by the unanimous consent of the House, struck out, thereby admitting that no such right existed. I feel that this is a grave matter, but I believe we shall be acting constitutionally and rightly if we assert that there is no power in the hands of the House to interfere in the return of a Member of Parliament.

*THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir E. CLARKE, Plymouth): I cannot help thinking that the recollections of the conflict of 1880 are very acute in the mind of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir H. James). The right hon. Gentleman began by admitting that the expunging of a Resolution from the Records of Parliament was a very serious action. Of course it is absurd, unless there is some necessity to disaffirm a principle laid down in a previous Resolution. It is an idle thing to try to tear out of the history of the House of Commons one page. That does not get rid of the incident itself. If this Resolution is carried it will not alter the fact that the House of Commons did, in 1880, take upon itself the right represented by the Resolution in question. Unless it is to relieve the character of some person from stigma, or to remove some principle which ought no longer to remain in the Books of Parliament, there is no excuse for tampering with and falsifying the Records of the House by striking out part of them. The right hon. and learned Member for Bury admits that it requires a very strong case to induce the acceptance of the Resolution before the House, and he seems to think that the case of Wilkes in some way supports the proposal of the hon. Member for Northampton. There can be nothing more marked and clear than the difference between the present case and the cases of Martyn and Wilkes. In the case of Martyn the House had pronounced a disqualification against the Member, and as long as that remained on the Books, the man could not be sent to the House. But the House of Commons retracted that disqualification, and declared that it should be annulled and erased from the Books of the House. The sentence of disqualification was cancelled, and Martyn admitted to all the rights of citizenship. In the case of Wilkes, as long as the Resolution remained unaffected by any later Vote of the House, it amounted to a declaration by the House of Commons that any person who had been expelled from the House was by that very act incapacitated from being a Member of the House again. The history of the matter with regard to John Wilkes was rather a curious one. In the year 1769 the Resolution which was complained of had been carried by a substantial majority in a full House. Afterwards Wilkes, having been again elected, took his seat, and from time to time, between 1775 and 1782, made almost annual Resolutions on the subject. There is no sense in expunging the Record from the proceedings of the House; it would be of no use to the hon. Member or to his constituents. There is nothing on the face of the Resolution which in the least degree infringes the Constitutional rights of the electors of the country, because the House took the proper course at that time in protecting itself against an illegal or profane performance taking place before it. If, however, it is suggested that the House should expunge from the record of its proceedings acts done by the House, there would be scarcely any limit to the discussions of this kind. There is one important instance to be found on the Records of the House. Not many years ago the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian rose at the Table while Mr. O'Donnell, then the Member for Dungarvan was addressing the House, and moved that that hon. Member should no longer be heard. Your predecessor, Sir, said that no such Motion had been made for 200 years, but he could not say that it was out of order. There was a strong majority in the House at the back of the right hon. Gentleman at that time, and Mr. O'Donnell was directed to discontinue his speech at once, but when the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) followed the example of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, and proposed in the next Session that the right hon. Member should be directed to discontinue his speech, the results were different, for the hon. Member for Cork was straightway suspended. Would any sane man suggest that those incidents should be expunged from the Records? The House may have done a wise or an unwise thing; it may have adopted inconveniently an old precedent, or made an inconvenient new one, but everything which takes place in the House in the course of the Session is part of the history of the House and the country. It is as childish to suggest that a leaf should be torn out of the Records of Parliament as it would be for an angry wife to revenge herself by tearing up her marriage certificate, or for an embarrassed tradesman to put himself right by tearing a leaf out of his ledger. If a transaction takes place the record of it ought to remain. I do not say that if a Resolution on the Books of the House lays down an unsound and un-Constitutional principle, the House may not be right in expunging it in order to mark its strong sense of the wrongful principle so laid down, but the Resolution which the hon. Member asks should be expunged is the Record of an action taken by the House. That action was, in my judgment, absolutely right; I believed it to be right at the time, and I know it has been proved to be right in the Courts of Law by the proceedings which have taken place since. I appeal to the House not to do so unwise or foolish a thing as to try to erase the Resolution from our Records.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I wish that the hon. and learned Gentleman had endeavoured to deal with what, after all, is a grave Constitutional question in a somewhat more serious manner and in a style more worthy of the subject. The illustrations he gave were beneath the gravity of the occasion. The question is whether the action taken by the House at that time was un-Constitutional? I could not make out, from the hon. and learned Gentleman's quotation from the speech of Mr. Fox, whether he thought the original decision of the House of Commons in Wilkes's case was right or wrong. I think that everyone is of opinion—that every Constitutional lawyer is of opinion—I make an exception in the case of the Solicitor General—that the course taken by the House of Commons from 1769 to 1782 was thoroughly un-Constitutional. It is said that Mr. Wilkes made an annual Motion. Yes, but in what kind of Parliament did he do this? It was in the corrupt Parliament of Lord North, which did un-Constitutional acts every day. The striking out of the Resolution from the Records was one of the first acts of the first Liberal Parliament elected after the disasters of the American War. That is a chapter in the history of the matter to which the hon. and learned Gentleman did not refer. Was the declaration an un-Constitutional one? It has always been held so, because it was an assumption on the part of Parliament to prevent a Member taking his seat who had a right to take his seat. The Solicitor General says it was the bounden duty of Parliament to pass that Resolution in 1880. If it was the bounden duty of Parliament to do so because it was a right and proper Resolution, why is it not the bounden duty of this Parliament to pass a similar Resolution? What became of the sacred duty insisted on by the Solicitor General? When this Parliament was elected, the persons who had the guardianship of this legal duty were the present Law Officers of the Crown. What were they doing when they failed to declare this fundamental duty of the House of Commons to exclude the hon. Member for Northampton? They did not perform that obligation in this Parliament, because they knew that the Parliament of 1880 had committed an un-Constitutional act, and they were ashamed to be again parties to that transaction. The Attorney General laughs. He is a bold man I know; but why did he not make the Motion? The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General says the incident has taken place, and, therefore, it cannot be obliterated. Everybody knows that. We do not wish to falsify the Record, as has been suggested, but merely to point out the fact that the House of Commons committed an illegal act, and we do not desire that the precedent should remain. The question does not affect one side of the House more than the other; it is the right of the constituencies which is involved. If you choose to leave on the Records that the House of Commons—I care not whether the declaration is a legal or an illegal one—assumes to itself by a vote of the majority to declare the rights of a Member or of a constituency, you set a dangerous and an un-Constitutional precedent. If the declaration is a legal one, then the Court of Law can work it out if necessary, but if the declaration is an illegal one, then, unfortunately, there is no Court to reverse our decision or examine our conduct. That is, unfortunately, the danger of a declaration of this kind. I shall vote as I voted in 1880, against the Resolution, because, now, as then, I think, as I thought, that it is an extremely dangerous thing, and still more so after this debate and the speech of the Solicitor General, that we should allow it to remain on record that the Government has maintained the proposition that the House of Commons has a right by its own vote to determine the right of a Member to his seat, and the right of a constituency to elect him. That is the doctrine maintained on those benches, and asserted by the Solicitor General, but which they did not dare to act upon at the commencement of this Parliament. What does it mean? It means that whenever it is convenient to them—and it was not convenient to them at the beginning of Parliament—whenever it suits their purpose they will assert that principle and act upon it.

SIR JOHN GORST: The hon. Member sat in the last Parliament.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: What I am saying is in reference to the proposition of the Solicitor General. I was examining his proposition, the position that a great Party assumes in reference to this point, and I say it is a most dangerous thing. Depend upon it it is a doctrine that will be taken up by a Party to which you do not belong, and I shall deplore it as a great evil then as it is when asserted by you. It is an assertion that a Parliamentary majority may at any moment exclude a Member elected to this House as a representative of the people, may take upon itself to declare the law, not leaving that declaration to the Courts of Law. That is a most dangerous doctrine, and, therefore, I shall vote for the Motion of my hon. Friend.

The House divided:—Ayes 112; Noes 79.—(Division List, No. 12.)

Main Question again proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I understand that a Scotch Member desires to bring forward a Scotch measure in which Scotch Members on this side are much interested, and I will not, therefore, stand in the way with the Motion of which I have given notice.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SUPPLY.—REPORT.

Resolutions [7th March], reported.

(1.) "That a Supplementary sum, not exceeding £909, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1889, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Offices of the House of Lords."

(2.) "That a Supplementary sum, not exceeding £3,290, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1889, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of the Land Commissioners for England."

(3.) "That a Supplementary sum, not exceeding £8,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1889, for Stationery, Printing, and Paper, Binding, and Printed Books for the two Houses of Parliament, and for a Grant in Aid of the publication of Parliamentary Debates."

effect, and from the manner in which it has been met we might gather that the whole thing was arranged beforehand between the Government and the hon. Member for South Tyrone. The hon. Member discharges a pious duty towards a certain portion of his constituents in proposing the Bill, without the least desire to see it carried; he proposes it in a half-hearted manner, without advancing the slightest reason in its support, while the Government think so lightly of him and his Bill, that the Solicitor General for Ireland disposes of them with the briefest words. I am very glad indeed to see the great Liberal Union Alliance has come down to this. I am rejoiced to think this is the result of the great Liberal Unionist compact with the Times. "That it should come to this!" The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland, when he kicks out the Bill, kicks with a little ceremony that he does not, out of courtesy to the hon. Member for South Tyrone, spend a few words to give a decent grace to the act of summary dismissal. This is a most instructive evening for the constituents of the hon. Member for South Tyrone. We have him posing as a supporter of the Union, but at the same time he is most anxious that the "diggers and delvers" of South Tyrone, the people who till the soil, the honest Orangemen, the people who love their country—not as we do—the hard-headed people of South Tyrone, who love the Government of law and order, should get their rights in Parliament by returning a Member who, while cordially supporting the Union, and all the great purposes of the Union, is at the same time the extremest Radical on Land Questions. Well, we have seen to-night what all this flummery amounts to. I observe the Chancellor of the Exchequer growing slightly uneasy; will he, with Liberal Unionist force and humour, express to the House the great advantages of this measure from a Liberal Unionist point of view, this Bill which has "some features that specially recommend it"? The Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1887 professed the principle of admitting leaseholders under 99 years to the right of having fair rents fixed; but why are 99 years' lease to be omitted and 100 years to be left outside? I hope Members of the Government are not promoting a "count" against this great Liberal Unionist question. I do not wish to detain the right hon. Baronet (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) to listen to me, but to wait for the reply of the hon. Member for South Tyrone. The gloom in which we were obscured in 1887 was suddenly irradiated by the light of a Liberal Unionist Chancellor of the Exchequer. Persons who hold for longer than 99 years, he says, must be considered as purchasers—they must be considered as having a perpetuity; and the great object of the Liberal Unionist Party and the Tory Party, of which he is so distinguished a Member—for he spoke of the Tories the other day as "We the Tory Party"—is to root in the tillers of the soil perpetuity of tenure. We had to allow the Bill of 1887 to pass in that shape and form, but stirring meetings were held in Ireland on this subject at the end of 1887 and during the whole of 1888, and the Ulster leaseholders clamoured for relief. Well, it is rather remarkable that the only class of persons for whom the learned Solicitor General for Ireland has no sympathy, and whom he proposes to exclude from the benefit of a fair rent under this Liberal Unionist measure, are the loyal classes of Ireland. These classes would have nothing to do with us. Oh, no; they would not touch us with a 40-foot pole. They are all "loyal men and true," and they entrust their fortunes to that distinguished Member of this House, the Member for South Tyrone. They know that he is employed about the country, paid by some mysterious source, acting on behalf of the Government, speaking in the name of the Government, promising that there will be evictions here and no evictions there, and they naturally thought they might treat with this Plenipotentiary on the Land Question. The hon. Member for South Tyrone gets up to-night, and how does he treat these poor people, the long leaseholders? Why, he does not even pretend to argue the question. He dismisses it in a sentence without so much as pretending to understand it. It is not as though he were dealing with a subject which could be disposed of in a sentence, or as if there were no time to discuss the Bill. With a view to enable it to come on—and, in part, to oblige the Scotch Members—I refrained from bringing forward a Motion which I had put down on the paper. I must say I had an eye to the bringing on of this great hybrid piece of Liberal Unionist legislation. We have three and a half hours before us for the discussion of this Bill, but the hon. Member for South Tyrone did not occupy three and a half minutes in describing the grievances of the long leaseholders. I doubt if he took half a minute, and though we are all anxious to get on with the business I must say that I think the fate of these unfortunate leaseholders is a subject which should have induced the hon. Member who so keenly sympathizes with them to pour out from his bleeding heart a word or two of commiseration for their woes, as he had the opportunity of doing to-night. It is seldom that a private Member has an opportunity of this kind. It is only in consequence of your very fair ruling, Sir, that any Member of the House had the opportunity of bringing on this legislation. Your ruling gave an opportunity which anyone desirous of promoting the interests of the Irish farmer would gladly have availed himself of, and that is exactly the opportunity which the hon. Member for South Tyrone has thrown away. To-night is the first opportunity we have had for years of bringing on a private Member's Bill on Friday night when Supply is put down. It is a golden opportunity—a Liberal Unionist opportunity—an opportunity which I should have thought the hon. Member for South Tyrone would gladly have seized hold of. I can only deplore that Her Majesty's Government and the Liberal Unionist Party should have no heart in a measure for the relief of the Ulster farmers. We all know there is no Irish grievance which the Liberal Unionist Party are not pining to remove so long as its removal does not interfere with the Union. Oh, the anxiety of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) to remove Irish grievances! Those grievances are killing him. Well, here is a chance of depriving the miserable agitators who infest Ireland, and are the bane of that unhappy country, of another grievance. One would expect the First Lord of the Treasury to spring to his feet with alacrity, and say, "This measure may not be perfect in its details; there may be some faults of draftsmanship about it; there may be some little defects in it one way or the other, but we will not reject the Second Reading; we will send it to a Select Committee, or even give it the favour we extend to Scotch herrings—we will send it up to a Standing Committee." But, Sir, Scotch herrings are one thing and Irish tenants are another. The grievances of the Scottish fishermen may be dealt with by a Standing Committee; but Irish farmers, even under the wing of the hon. Member for South Tyrone, are to be kicked out of this House without even a word of sympathy, or without even the pretence of argument, by the learned Solicitor General for Ireland. Now, Sir, I desire, as the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Tyrone has entirely betrayed the cause of those who entrusted him with this important measure, to say one or two words upon the scope of the Bill. I know, of course, that the Liberal Unionist Government are most anxious for a "count out;" and no doubt the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Tyrone would be happy to promote it with them, but I decline to enter into that conspiracy. I intend to take advantage of this unusual chance that has been afforded to us to expose exactly, in the light of day, the state of the case and the situation as it has now presented itself; and I may say, in the first instance, that this measure represents the united action—I am speaking now of the measure to include in the benefits of the Land Act all leaseholders—of a large organized body of Loyalists in Ireland. Now, an Irish Loyalist is so rare a specimen of an Irishman that I should have thought the hon. Member for South Tyrone would have thought it right to tell us something about his grievances. These people who are excluded from the benefits of the Land Act are, as a rule, members of the Loyalist Party. They have been labouring under their grievance patiently, because, above all things, the beauty of the Irish Loyalist is that he is a patient animal. He is always boasting about his patience—he is always telling us that he does not go out with a mask on his face, or with moonlighters. He lies as quietly as a slug under a garden roller, and takes every unpleasantness that falls to his lot as if it were a dispensation from Providence, instead of a dispensation of the Government. These Irish leaseholders have begged and prayed of the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Tyrone to submit their case to a sympathetic House of Commons. They say—

“This is an Imperial Parliament; we are all anxious to be under the rule of such a Parliament, and we, therefore, expect that our grievances will be attended to by it, and we confidently submit to the House that it is unfair that we should be under rack rents, whilst our neighbour across the road, whose lease is only for ninety-nine years, is able to go to the Land Court and get a fair rent fixed.”

I would ask on what ground can this abominable disability be continued? I say there is no ground, and that, as a matter of fact, since the Act of 1870 was passed, leases for extremely long periods have been forced on the tenants at the point of the bayonet; and it is because these men have had these leases forced on them for these long periods that now you refuse to remedy the situation. I say that there is no logic, reason, or common sense in that position, and one might at least expect that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who in his position as a leading Liberal Unionist has done so much service to the Government on this Irish Land Question, which I believe he so thoroughly understands — which I believe he understands as well as the Egyptian Canal Question — I should have expected that he would have said, “Let us go to the Select Committee and take evidence, and see what is the extent and scope of this grievance.” But what does he do? I saw him put up the Irish Solicitor General—who, I am bound to say, I do not think understands anything about the Bill. There is not a keener intellect in the House than that of the hon. and learned Gentleman, and if he had been afforded two minutes he would have digested the Bill and understood all about it. But the Government put him up—and it may be that even now, at the eleventh hour, they may mean to retrace their steps, because I observe that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been bending his giant mind to the task of understanding the measure of the hon. Member for South Tyrone. I do trust that as I am making this appeal on behalf of the Loyalists of Ulster the Government will now consider it in a fair and reasonable spirit. I am quite free to admit that the consideration of the clauses of the measure may, perhaps, be relegated to a more favourable opportunity when a “count” is not in the offing; but with regard to the proposal to admit leaseholders, I do say that if the Government will accept my assurance that the Loyalists in Ireland would be most gratified to see this principle accepted, and will do something to secure its adoption, they will be taking a step in the right direction. Let them remember that most of these loyal and long-suffering leaseholders are Orangemen and most strenuous supporters of the Unionist Party, and that a number of them came over to this country not long ago, and poured into the sympathetic bosom of Lord Salisbury an account of their grievances. Has it come to this—that after this measure has been so fully explained by this worthy body of men, it is to meet with such scant courtesy on the part of a House which has such ample time to attend to it? I hope it will be understood in the country that the House of Commons has no other business but this before it. There is not a single item of business remaining on the Paper except this, and we have yet some hours at our disposal before the hour for adjournment. Parliament, for once in its long-centuried historical existence, has perfect leisure to attend to this small Irish grievance; and I, therefore, do trust that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with that anxiety he feels to remove Irish grievances—reasonable grievances put forward by the hon. Member for South Tyrone in a calm spirit and in a business-like way, embracing, I believe, two sentences—the time of the House not having been taken up with long and wordy harangues—I do trust, I say, that the right hon. Gentleman will, at least, condescend to give attention to this measure. And I say, for my own part, that, representing as I do a Nationalist constituency, I would sincerely urge the Government, if they want to assure their supporters in the Loyalist districts of Ireland of the earnestness of their desire to remove grievances, to regard this question of leaseholders as one which, above all others, should be attended to. It cannot be pretended—and this is a misfortune from the

Mr. T. M. Healy

Government point of view—that there is not ample time to attend to the matter. If you were to count out the House it would show that you were indifferent to the interests of the Loyalists of Ireland, and were ready to count out a measure introduced by one of your own supporters. Therefore you are debarred from such ruthless procedure as that. There only remains then the question, as you have ample time, “oceans” of it, in which to deal with this measure, what is it that stops you from doing justice to the Irish leaseholders? It cannot be want of will, because we know you have most anxiously at heart the improvement of the material prosperity of the Irish people. We know you have no arguments, as the Solicitor General for Ireland—than whom you could not have a keener advocate—had none to offer, and he met the thing with a simple non possumus. It cannot be that you have not sufficient time, or that you want a count out. I have shown how this particular measure has the strongest claim upon the time and attention of Parliament. I have disposed of every possible objection that can be taken to it; I have shown that the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Tyrone has been sent to this House by a body of Loyalists most anxious in every way to uphold the Union, and that he, as their spokesman, asks you to attend to the measure. And I, uniting and associating myself to the fullest extent with the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Tyrone—joining myself with him in the desire that this House should do ample justice to the Loyalists, I do trust that you will, to-night, by passing this measure, do an act of justice which will enable this House, and especially its Unionist Members, for all future time to say that nothing shall stand between them and justice to Ireland when the great cause of the Union is not interfered with.

*MR. C. W. GRAY (Essex, Maldon): I have listened with considerable interest to the somewhat lengthy speech of the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. T. Healy), who has just sat down, and I regret the tone of levity which pervaded the greater part of it. In my opinion, the subject of land, in connection with Irish tenants, is one that ought not to be treated with levity in this House. I can assure hon. Members opposite that we English agriculturists watch with great interest all measures that are brought forward in this House relative to Irish land and Irish tenancies, and I am sure there are many on this side of the House who are sincerely anxious, where it can be shown that there is anything unfair in connection with those tenancies, that the unfairness shall be as speedily as possible removed. We are all perfectly well aware of what the Irish tenants must have suffered; for the agricultural depression which affects them, as well as the English tenants, has been common to all parts of the United Kingdom, and we can honestly say that, whenever there is a reasonable opportunity of doing so, we are desirous of assisting in the passage of measures that will, to some extent, alleviate the difficulties of our Irish brother farmers. But I think the hon. Member for Longford was hardly serious in the speech he made—and a most interesting speech it was—or he would not have treated with so much levity a subject which we are told is one of so much importance to the Irish tenants. This Bill has come somewhat unexpectedly before the House, owing to some accidental circumstances; and in dealing with it as it now stands, I would ask hon. Members on that side of the House whether, if Her Majesty's Government had proposed to deal with so important a question as this unexpectedly, they would not have been the very persons to get up in their places and say, “How can you undertake to deal with such a question as this without having given the House sufficient time to consider it?” I can assure hon. Members opposite that the interest felt in this question does not belong altogether to that side of the House, and I say without hesitation that every Member on this side of the House is anxious that all questions connected with Irish tenancies should be dealt with not in an off-hand way, as will be the case to-night, but with that consideration and care which its importance demands. If Lord Ashbourne's Act has worked well—and I have never heard it suggested that as far as it goes it is not a beneficial and a good Act—I ask, would it not be a pity to make a departure from it? I am not sure that the Irish Members opposite take the best course when they so persistently find fault with Her Majesty's Government whenever it proposes to do anything; and then, on the other hand, as persistently blame it for something it does not propose to do. This line of action is injuring the Nationalist Party in this country, and I say so with perfect honesty. As long as the Nationalist Party are only going for measures of justice which the English tenants themselves would like to see passed, they will be supported not only in this House but in the country generally; but I am sure the English people will not be impressed with the earnestness of the Irish Members on this occasion, as evidenced by the speech of the hon. Member for Longford. We on this side of the House have all along recognized that there are undoubted Irish grievances, and we desire to see them brought forward in an honest way and with a single purpose; but we do not think they should be made a stalking-horse for the mere purpose of getting the Party that now holds the reins out of office and of placing another Party in office. We want all grievances brought before the country in a bonâ fide way, and to see them when before this House debated with earnestness. If hon. Members opposite will only accept this hint from me, in the belief that it is made with perfect sincerity, and will put before us genuine measures dealing with questions of Irish land and Irish tenancies, they will find that hon. Members on this side will be more inclined to listen to their arguments than when our debates are mixed up with so much bitter Party feeling. I implore hon. Members opposite to try and drop that bitterness, and put before us what they regard as practical remedies for the grievances of the Irish tenants. In that case I believe that many of us on this side of the House would do all in our power to get those practical remedies carried into effect as speedily as possible. If, however, you are to go behind Lord Ashbourne's Act and alter the greater principle of that measure without due consideration—

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I would point out to the hon. Member that this Bill, so far from upsetting Lord Ashbourne's Act, actually proposes to extend that Act to a certain class of tenants now exempted from it.

*MR. C. W. GRAY: I accept the statement of the hon. Member, but I think my argument will apply equally to the way in which he has put the case. If you apply Lord Ashbourne's Act in the manner now proposed, without being very careful of what you are doing, you may set up precedents which will eventually land you in great difficulty. We English tenants watch all these proposed changes with a great deal of interest, because we are not sure how soon the time may come when we shall be seeking similar reforms for ourselves; and this is one reason why I so anxiously hope that when this question is practically debated there will be a fair attendance of those Members who represent English agricultural interests in this House, I do not see why we should not be able to give you a helping hand.

*MR. SPEAKER: I would call the hon. Member's attention to the fact that he is not discussing the Second Reading of the Bill.

*MR. C. W. GRAY: I bow, Sir, to your ruling, and am sorry you have had the trouble to rise; but I do not wish to go into the details of the Bill.

MR. CRILLY (Mayo, N.): Will you permit me to say that, as an Irish Member, I quite recognize the friendly and kindly spirit in which the hon. Member for Maldon has just spoken, and I am quite sure if the same spirit were more frequently evinced by hon. Gentlemen opposite—and I am sorry to see now those empty benches—when questions affecting the agricultural tenants of Ireland are discussed, they would be more speedily and more satisfactorily settled. One reason given for the rejection of this Bill by the hon. Member, which was applauded by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, was that it had been brought forward unexpectedly. Any Member, either inside or outside the House, knows very small that this question of the leaseholders of Ireland is an old one. Any gentleman in the position of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who knows, or professes to know, the condition of Ireland, would be aware that no Parliamentary Session could open without the question of the leaseholders of Ireland being brought forward. Therefore I think that the excuse given for the action of the Government—that this Bill has come on unexpectedly—is not a genuine one. This question has been before the House on many previous occasions. It is a pressing and vital question. The right hon. Gentleman knows very well from experience that a large number of his supporters from Ireland have every cause to complain of the action of the Government on this question. Now, although we have not perhaps many friends among the leaseholders, and anxious as we are to settle the social condition of Ireland, we are also anxious to press upon this House the necessity of dealing with this question as quickly as possible. We must press the Government to take some other action than they have taken to-night. I hope the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Tyrone is proud of his friends, and of the action of the present Government, which he supports through thick and thin. I dare say he thought that they would have accepted his Bill; so, without deigning to give one single word of explanation, he moved the Second Reading. I hope that he is grateful to the Government, and that he will convey to the leaseholders of Ireland the fact that they have nothing to hope for from the present Government. I hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will yet tell us the Government do not intend to meet this Bill with a point-blank refusal. They cannot plead the excuse that there is no time to debate it, for we have nearly three hours before us. The Bill might even be advanced by promising to deal with it in Committee; at least the promise might be held out that the leaseholders will be assisted in the coming year. There are many clauses of the Bill with which I do not agree, but I hope the Government will not shut the door on the principle that it is their duty to come to the assistance of the leaseholders of Ireland.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I think that hon. Members below the Gangway opposite have enjoyed the opportunity of displaying a little political hypocrisy. But they have disguised the fact that this is entirely an unexpected debate. The hon. Member who has just sat down, by a rather clever rhetorical device, suggested that the Bill was not unexpected. Certainly it was not thought by any Member of this House that the evening would be devoted to this subject. The hon. Member has challenged us to take a Division, but we ought not to do so in the absence of those who are interested in the Bill which they did not expect would be debated to-night. Why, the hon. Member himself is said to have stated he did not expect it to come on.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I never was consulted on the matter.

MR. GOSCHEN: The language which was used by the hon. Member to some Members of the House was that he did not expect to be able to reach this Bill to-night.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I hope that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer will allow me to say that the Bill came on quite unexpectedly to myself, but I never said to any Member that I did not expect it to come on, I had no conversation about the Bill, and it was only when the House was dividing on the Motion of the hon. Member for Northampton that I recognized it would come on.

MR. GOSCHEN: Then the impression conveyed to me was not absolutely correct. The hon. Member says he had no idea it was coming on; neither had the Irish Secretary nor hon. Members from Ireland who are interested in it. In such circumstances it has often been the practice to adjourn the debate on a Bill reached unexpectedly. I am sure my hon. Friend is quite aware that if the Chief Secretary had had any idea that the Bill would come on he would have been in his place and have been able to deal with the Bill. No disrespect was intended to those Members by the Solicitor General, and I am sure the hon. Gentleman will not see in anything that has happened any intention on the part of the Government to treat with any disrespect the proposals he has brought before the House. The hon. Gentleman will see that there is a wide difference between this Bill and Lord Ashbourne's Act, for while the latter makes the expropriation of owners voluntary the hon. Gentleman's Bill will make it compulsory. I would suggest that the hon. Member should consent to the adjournment of the debate. If the Bill be pressed to a Division in the absence of those who take an interest in it, the Government will have no option but to vote against it. The Government are, however, anxious that every opportunity should be given for the discussion of the Bill, and I think the best course will be to adjourn the debate.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I can only speak by the indulgence of the House; but I hope I may be allowed to say that if I introduced the Bill in a somewhat summary way, it was because I saw every Member wished the early adjournment of the House, and I thought the Government might assent to the Second Reading. I wish to point out to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that if I accept the suggestion to adjourn the discussion to another day I shall be practically giving up my chance of bringing on again a Bill which I believe to be urgently necessary in the interest of a large number of leaseholders in every part of Ireland, for the Government have given no promise of facilities for another day to continue the discussion. I have a duty to perform as a Member of this House, and unless I get such a promise I must press the Motion to a Division.

*MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E): I hope that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer will not press a Motion for the adjournment of the debate. It is quite notorious that the principle of this Bill has been before the Government during the last two Sessions; and if it is only for the purpose of gaining time as regards the clauses, the Second Reading can be assented to, with the reservation on the part of the Government that it will deal with them in Committee. I am sure that, as a Scotchman, I shall not be charged by the Chancellor of the Exchequer with speaking on this subject in a bantering tone or sarcastic manner; but I think the case of the Irish leaseholders is so pressing that every Member who represents an agricultural constituency should lose no opportunity of bringing the principle of the Bill before the House. I hope the hon. Member for South Tyrone will take the sense of the House on it.

The House divided:—Ayes 46; Noes 87.—Majority 41.—(Division List, No. 13.)

ADJOURNMENT.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That this House do now adjourn."

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford N.): I wish to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, who has returned to the House, whether he is aware that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has said it was impossible to discuss the Bill, which has just been defeated in his absence; and whether he will now favour the House with his views upon it?

No answer was given to the hon. Member's question.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at Ten o'clock till Monday next.

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES.

No. 13.] FIRST VOLUME OF SESSION 1889. [MARCH 18.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 11th March, 1889.

HOUSE OF LORDS (DISCONTINUANCE OF WRITS) BILL.

A Bill to authorise the cancellation, discontinuance, and re-issue in particular cases of writs of summons to the House of Lords—Was presented by the Earl of Carnarvon; read 1<sup>a</sup>; to be printed; and to be read 2<sup>a</sup> on Tuesday, 19th March. (No. 18.)

PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN THE METROPOLIS.—QUESTION.

LORD LAMINGTON, in rising to call the attention of the House to the state of the public buildings in the Metropolis, said: My object in bringing forward the question of public buildings so early in the Session is to anticipate the Estimates in the House of Commons; because, as a general rule, whenever there is any proposal made in this House with reference to improvements in public buildings, the answer is that the money is already appropriated. I am not going to complain of what the Government has done during the Recess in the matter of public buildings; I cannot make that complaint, because they have done nothing at all. With respect to the public offices, and especially the Admiralty and the War Office, this discussion has been going on for 25 years. Committee after Committee have sat, plan after plan has been proposed, there has been the battle of sites and the battle of designs, and yet nothing has been done at all. It is a most extravagant policy, because the country is paying for the hire of public offices an amount of rent which, if capitalized, would have erected the most beautiful and perfect buildings possible. I hope Her Majesty's Government will be able to explain why the plan proposed in 1886 has not been carried into effect. My great object in bringing forward this question is to show the indifference, not only of this Government, but of every other Government, to this important subject. Take, for instance, the question of the housing of the National Portrait Gallery, a collection thoroughly worthy of the country, which was removed to the Bethnal Green Museum some three years ago, at the instance of Mr. Gladstone, who was one of the trustees. I was a trustee, and I ventured to differ with Mr. Gladstone, but the collection was removed. Mr. Gladstone was then in office, and he assured Parliament that suitable provision would be made and an adequate gallery provided; but nothing has been done. There the pictures remain in Bethnal Green, and the more recent acquisitions are hid away in any cellars that are available in the National Gallery. After all, the exhibition of the pictures at Bethnal Green has not added one visitor to the ordinary number of those who attend the Museum there; the pictures are treated with absolute indifference. I submit, my Lords, that it is intolerable that this magnificent collection—especially that unique collection of portraits of the illustrious men of our country which could not be replaced if destroyed by fire or otherwise—should be deposited in a quarter of the town where they are practically lost. The trustees of the National Gallery have presented a memorial, "urging upon the Government the desirability of providing a suitable place for the pictures now located in Bethnal Green Museum," but no notice has been taken of the memorial. As to the question of site, there are two sites already available, either one of which could be secured at a comparatively small expense. I may mention especially the site of Lord Carrington's former house in Whitehall. As an instance of the unsatisfactory policy pursued with regard to public buildings generally, I may refer to the Parliament Street Improvement, for which a sum of £17,000 was voted. Instead of a good plan being decided upon and carried out, and all the buildings on what is called the George Street site being pulled down, and a handsome block of public offices, close to the Houses of Parliament, and in every way convenient, being erected, the work of demolition and reconstruction was entrusted to a company, and after the lapse of two years nothing has been done. My Lords, this is really the only country in the world where no interest whatever is taken, either by the rulers or the people, in the beauty of its Metropolis. In Rome, Paris, Berlin, and Vienna the public buildings are worthy of great capitals, and even in our Colonies the people take great pride in their public buildings; but here nobody seems to care. With regard to the new buildings on the west side of Westminster Hall, I admit that outside the work is well done; but inside it has been discovered that there is no space, according to the plans, to make a necessary corridor, so that the rooms actually run into one another, and are of no use at all. It is the same with the Royal Courts of Justice. There is not half the accommodation required. There are corridors which lead nowhere and windows which let in no light. I think that the Government should either explain the causes of this unsatisfactory condition of things, or else contend boldly that they have no responsibility in the matter. I beg to ask the Question of which I have given notice.

*LORD HENNIKER: I have no doubt your Lordships will appreciate as I do the intention of my noble Friend in bringing this question before your Lordships' House. I have no doubt that he wishes to see improvements carried on in the Metropolis, and he would also like to see those valuable collections of pictures and portraits which belong to the country properly housed. I will not follow my noble Friend through all his observations, because I have answered some of those questions during the last two or three years, over and over again. With regard to the Admiralty and War Office buildings, the National Portrait Gallery, and the Parliament Street improvements, to which my noble Friend has referred, the House is aware that a great many plans have been placed before Parliament and the public for a long time past, and the plan known as that of Leeming and Leeming had not only been adopted, but the work had been commenced. Parliament interfered and took the question up, and a Committee was appointed in 1885, and re-appointed in 1887, to take the whole thing in hand; and, because they had done nothing immediately, it was hardly right to blame the Office of Works for the delay. The plan to be adopted for the Admiralty would be the basis upon which the War Office plans would be considered, because the one greatly depends upon the other. I have never given any pledge as to what would be done; I have only tried to tell exactly what was being done. The carrying out of plans by the Office of Works depends entirely on the Parliamentary grants; and this year, owing to the special demands on the Chancellor of the Exchequer in connection with the Navy, it is more than ever improbable that money will be forthcoming for public works. With regard to the Admiralty, a small sum has been put into the Estimates for the purpose of allowing the work to be begun. A proper home for the pictures in the National Portrait Gallery will be built as soon as the money is granted. There will be no difficulty in the matter of plans or sites, so soon as the necessary funds are available. My noble Friend said just now that he thought the pictures would never come back from Bethnal Green; but I must remind him that they were sent distinctly on loan, and they will be brought back as soon as there is a proper lodging for them. With respect to improvements in Parliament Street, a private company two years ago obtained an Act of Parliament for the erection of certain buildings, on the condition that £500,000 was raised before the works were begun. This condition has delayed the carrying out of the scheme, but I am informed privately that there is no doubt that the requisite money will be subscribed before very long. The Office of Works have made proposals to the promoters of the company for the sale of certain land in Parliament Street in which the Government had an interest; and though no official reply has yet been received, the First Commissioner of Works has reason to believe that the proposals made as to price and so on will be acceptable to the promoters.

At a subsequent period:—

LORD SANDHURST: I understood from the statement of the noble Lord (Lord Henniker) that there were about 140,000 visitors to the National Portrait Gallery before the removal of the collection to Bethnal Green. I should like to know if he could tell us in round figures what the number of visitors has been since the removal?

*LORD HENNIKER: I have not the figures with me, but I believe that last year and the year before last there were three or four times as many visitors to the Portrait Gallery at the Bethnal Green Museum as compared with the number who visited the National Portrait Gallery in the year immediately preceding the removal of the collection.

DOCK ACCOMMODATION AT BOMBAY.

QUESTION.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH, in rising to ask Her Majesty's Government whether any definite arrangement has been made for providing the requisite dock accommodation for the ships of Her Majesty's Navy at Bombay, said: My Lords, a Question upon this subject was, as far back as December last, put by me to Her Majesty's Government, and I was on that occasion answered by my noble Friend the Secretary of State for India, who said that the negotiations between the India Office and the Admiralty, which naturally must precede any definite adoption of plans, were almost completed, and that he hoped that very shortly the works would be commenced. My noble Friend—and indeed everyone who has had to do with the Admiralty—have repeatedly expressed their opinion—an opinion in which I am quite sure every noble Lord who has considered this subject will concur—that docks at Bombay, capable of accommodating the largest vessels, are absolutely necessary; and the question I wish to ask is, whether there is any hitch in the progress of the matter; and, if so, whether that hitch will be very shortly removed, so that the works may go forward? I think I need not take up your Lordships' time by pointing out the extreme necessity which exists for this work. In the event of war, we should have a great deal of work for our Navy in these seas, and quite probably in the immediate vicinity of Bombay. Without wishing to re-open the interesting discussion we had the other day upon the question of dock accommodation at Gibraltar, I may just point out that the views which my noble Friend (Lord Carnarvon) expressed on that occasion certainly do not hold good in this instance, for the distance from the Indian Seas to the nearest available dock is very much greater than the distance which my noble Friend quoted as being sufficient for Gibraltar—namely, three days' sail from Plymouth. Some years ago an accident occurred in the Indian Ocean to a ship much smaller than the vessels which we should be employing in the event of actual hostilities, and she had to be towed all the way through the Red Sea to Suez, simply because in our greatest Colony, in which centres an enormous proportion of our commerce, where it is quite certain our Possessions would be the object of the strongest attack by any enemy, there was no accommodation for the repairs that were necessary. The nearest dock is at Mauritius, which is not a Government dock, and it is some 3,000 miles away. The next nearest dock is at Hong Kong. So that, in the event of accident to any vessel on the Indian Station, she would have to be taken off the station, which would thereby be, to the extent of that vessel's capabilities, unprotected. Her Majesty's Government have stated on two previous occasions that they were bound to see the construction of a naval dock at Bombay carried forward at once, and I should like them to explain why the work has been entirely suspended, and nothing whatever done for the last 12 months.

LORD ELPHINSTONE: I can assure your Lordships that the Government are fully sensible of the desirability, and even of the absolute necessity, of having a dock at Bombay. I admit at once the force of the arguments that have been put forward by my noble Friend; but, owing to more pressing demands of an important character, it has not been found advisable to commence the work of construction this year. There is a scheme which has, practically, the approval of the Admiralty, for the construction of a first-class dock at Bombay; but, pending the distribution of the expense between the Imperial and the Indian Governments, the matter is still under the consideration of both Governments. My noble Friend may permit me to remind him that there is already at Bombay a dock belonging to the Port Trust, which will be available for small vessels, and they are now constructing a graving dock inside.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Viscount Cross): I should like to add that, with regard to the action that is being taken by the Port Trust at Bombay, I have had private intimation that a larger dock might be constructed if certain money were handed over by the Government to assist in the cost of construction. Seeing the great delay that has taken place on the part of the Imperial Government, I am now in communication with the Government of India to see whether we cannot come to some arrangement with the Bombay Port Trust, in order to make the graving dock of theirs of sufficient size to take the largest vessels. I am quite aware that that would involve the enlarging of the wet dock, through which all the ships would have to pass in order to get to the graving dock; but I am informed privately that there would be practically no difficulties in the way except that of money, and I hope that some arrangement may be come to between the Imperial and the Indian Governments, whereby something, at all events, may be done in the way of assisting the Bombay Port Trust to so enlarge their docks that they may be utilized in case of need by Her Majesty's Navy.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: As my noble Friend (Viscount Sidmouth) has referred to what I said the other day, I rise just to make two observations. So far from objecting to the construction of a dock at Bombay, I am very glad to bear out what has been said by my noble Friend as to the urgent necessity of carrying out that work. As a matter of fact, Bombay is so situated that there is no convenient dock within a large distance which would be available in such an emergency as that contemplated by the noble Lord. But I must protest against the argument of my noble Friend, when he asked what would be the consequences of a breakdown near Gibraltar. If there was any logical conclusion to be drawn from the argument, it was that we should have a large dock constructed there at enormous expense, which would, after all, not be in a tenable and defensible position. I confess that I object to the construction of a dock at Gibraltar, and I do so on the broad ground that it is not possible, as I understand, in the present condition of modern gunnery, to make it defensible against an enemy who held the Spanish heights. If, in the chances and exigencies of war, Spain were to be our opponent, the dock at Gibraltar would be wholly indefensible. The case of Bombay, however, as my noble Friend knows, and as must be appreciated by anyone with naval experience, is entirely different. A dock there is, as far as I understand, desirable; and I shall be glad to see it constructed as rapidly as possible.

*VISCOUNT MIDLETON: Having brought the question of dock accommodation at Bombay before your Lordships last Session, I wish to point out that the answer then given was that there was no ironclad on the Indian Station, and that our fleet in Indian waters was, notwithstanding, superior in force to that of any other Naval Power there. Since then, in consequence of what has occurred at Zanzibar, it has been found necessary to send an ironclad to that station; and, in view of the increased Naval Forces of other Powers, it may be necessary to send more. In that case, there is no adequate dock accommodation for them between Malta and the Cape of Good Hope. I would venture to point out that this fact shows the importance of making some provision for our vessels at some point nearer to Zanzibar than is at present available.

WORKS—PRESERVATION OF FRONT-AGES IN THE METROPOLIS.

QUESTION.

*EARL FORTESCUE, in rising to ask the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works whether it is the fact that, in spite of the unanimous opposition of the Vestry of St. Marylebone, the Metropolitan Board of Works has granted permission to the Samaritan Free Hospital to advance their frontage 12 feet on the Marylebone Road; and whether, if this is so, in view of the importance of preserving all open spaces in the Metropolis, and of the danger of one encroachment forming a precedent for others, the Board will not postpone action in the matter until it can be dealt with by the London County Council, said: My Lords, the Metropolitan Board, in a recent case gave two reasons for sanctioning a very similar encroachment, first, that there had been previous encroachments extending to the very next house, secondly, that the Vestry of St. Pancras was in favour of the encroachment. In this case the action of the Metropolitan Board, as set out in the Question which I have put on the Paper, is one that has throughout met with opposition from the Vestry of St. Marylebone and the ratepayers of the district. In a communication made to the Board by the Vestry so far back as the 4th October last, the Board was informed that the Vestry opposed the application by the Hospital for an advance of frontage, which was then to be 30, not 12 feet; yet on the 15th November, there having been in the meantime no further communications, the Board announced that they had consented to that advance. The opposition on the part of the Vestry was renewed. On January 31 the Metropolitan Board informed the Vestry that as the Hospital Authorities now asked for only an advance of 12 feet, they would take no further action in the matter. Upon that public meetings were held, at which resolutions condemnatory of the proposal were passed, and the Members for the borough were asked to bring in a Bill to prohibit the projection beyond the line of frontage. But on the 7th of March the Metropolitan Board finally confirmed its approval, though the London County Council had previously requested that Board to postpone granting permission to the Hospital for an advance of frontage. The land which the Board has thus given away is of considerable value, and therefore the action of the Board amounted, in effect, to making a donation from the public funds to this Hospital. Besides this, there is the consideration that the space reserved is infringed upon, and the contiguous property deprived of light and air. I beg to ask the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works whether it is yet too late to reconsider the matter; and whether the Board, which will in a very short time be superseded by the London County Council, will not leave the determination of such a matter as this to their successors?

*LORD MAGHERAMORNE: In answer to the Question of the noble Earl, the Metropolitan Board of Works have given their consent to the Samaritan Free Hospital bringing forward their frontage 12 ft. Perhaps your Lordships would like to know very shortly the facts of the case. In October last application was made to the Metropolitan Board of Works by the Committee of the Samaritan Free Hospital to advance their frontage about 30 ft. The matter was thoroughly gone into, and in consideration of what that Hospital had done, and what it was likely to do when the facilities for its good work was extended, the Board gave their consent to an advance of the frontage, not by 12 ft., but by 30 ft. There were many representations made, and the Committee of the Hospital came again into communication with the Metropolitan Board, when they showed their appreciation of the opinion and the wishes of the public; and after a long conference with the Metropolitan Board, instead of trying to go against public opinion, they said they would be very glad to bring in an amended plan. They did so, and asked only for 12 ft. advance, and that was an advance which only affected the gardens, which practically belonged to themselves. There was no infringement at all on the road, which is 50 ft. wide. I confess I was never more astonished in my life than when I heard all this tumult, and also the Question of the noble Earl. I think that the Metropolitan Board of Works have done their duty in giving their consent to that advance. I may say, further, that the Metropolitan Board have the greatest possible respect for those who are coming after them; but if the noble Earl thinks that I am or that my colleagues are going to abrogate the position we hold, and to be afraid to carry out our duties as long as the Metropolitan Board exists, I must tell him that he is very much mistaken. We intend, as long as we have a duty to perform, to carry it out in the most thorough and efficient manner. We have done everything in our power in no way to infringe on the duties of the new County Council; and as I see my successor (Lord Rosebery) sitting opposite to me, I think that noble Earl will endorse the statement that we have shown every desire to avoid infringing in any shape or form on the functions of the County Council. But at the same time the Metropolitan Board intend to discharge the duties imposed on them, and I am not afraid, here or anywhere else, to defend my colleagues in what they have done or are doing. The noble Earl (Earl Fortescue) asks whether I and my colleagues will not postpone action in this matter? I and my colleagues have tried to act within the law. We took legal opinion, and we cannot make or recommend those to whom we have given permission to give it up. It was signed and passed by the Board, and whatever the County Council like to do they can do. I believe that they have sent a letter—I do not know what the letter is, or what was the answer to it—but the Committee of the Samaritan Free Hospital are acting on their rights if they come forward 12 ft. The Metropolitan Board cannot act against the legal advice that has been given them; and, as we shall die very soon, the County Council may take what steps they please in the matter.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I must confess that I know very little about the particular matter referred to in the Question of the noble Lord, but I must say that I have been very much struck by the doctrine enunciated by the noble Lord the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, which I must say does not accord with my view of what is the duty of a public body in the position now occupied by that Board. In my opinion, whenever a public body is so near extinction, it is bound, on a due consideration of the public interests, not to do any act that is not urgent, or that could, without public disadvantage be postponed. For instance, I may say that the magistrates of my own county, acting on that principle, have postponed a variety of things entirely within their jurisdiction until the County Council could deal with them, on the ground that, as a moribund body, it was not right for them to take too rigid a view of their duty, and do things of which their successors would not approve. If the matter was one which it was necessary should be decided without delay, and the public interests would suffer by its postponement, the Metropolitan Board of Works would be justified in their action; but I hope that they are not going, in these matters, to stand on their strict legal rights, and to think it a patriotic duty to exercise them fully to the very last day of their existence.

*LORD MAGHERAMORNE: Perhaps I may say, in reply, that this matter came forward first of all last September, so that it must not be accounted one of the things done by the Board on the very eve of its dissolution. The noble Earl who last spoke commenced with the observation that he did not know anything about this matter, and I must say that the observations that he has made show that he has not studied it in such a way that his comments upon it are of any advantage to your Lordships.

*EARL FORTESCUE: As I put this Question to the noble Lord, perhaps I may be permitted to say that, as the building operations of the Samaritan Hospital cannot commence till the spring, and the London County Council take over their jurisdiction on the 1st April, the notion that this is a pressing matter is really the most extraordinary view that even the Metropolitan Board has ever taken.

House adjourned at half past Five o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 11th March, 1889.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON STANDING ORDERS.

Ordered, that the Select Committee on Standing Orders do consist of Thirteen Members.

Ordered, that Mr. Sydney Buxton be added to the Committee.—(Sir John Mowbray.)

NOTIFICATION OF INFECTIOUS DISEASES.

Ordered, That an Address be presented for Return, showing the Districts wherein Local Acts for the notification of Infectious diseases are in force in (1) England and Wales and (2) Scotland respectively; the Return to give in tabular form the name of the District, the Country in which the same is situate, the population of the District according to the Census of 1881, and the year in which the Act affecting the same was passed, with the total populations according to that Census of such Districts in (1) England and Wales, (2) Scotland, and (3) Great Britain respectively.—(W. F. Powell.)

ENDOWED SCHOOLS SCHEMES.

Ordered, That an Address be presented for Return of the Schemes submitted to the Education Department by the Charity Commissioners under the Endowed Schools Acts during the year 1883 and subsequent years, including 1889, up to the date of the Return, with the dates at which each Scheme was (1) sent to (2) approved by the Department, or otherwise dealt with (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 80, of Session, 1888.)

QUESTIONS.

COLONIAL MONEY ORDERS.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) asked the Postmaster General if he could state the number of money orders and their value received from Australia and New Zealand last year; the like information regarding the United States; the like information regarding Canada; and the like information regarding South Africa, including the Cape and Natal.

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, University of Cambridge): The number and amount of money orders advised to this country in 1888 from the various parts of the world referred to by the hon. Member was as follows:—Australia and New Zealand—Number, 129,761; amount, £447,612. United States—Number, 391,662; amount, £1,041,948. Canada—Number, 78,340; amount, £207,667. South African Colonies—Number, 35,493, amount, £128,771. I must apologize to the House for thus often inflicting upon it such scraps of statistics as are required by the Hon. Member, and I would venture to suggest that public time would be saved if Questions of this sort were addressed to and answered by the Department.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON gave notice, in consequence of the answer, of his intention to move, on going into Committee of Supply, that an Intelligence Department be established in connection with the office of the Postmaster General.

POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS AT BELFAST.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.) asked the Postmaster General whether he was aware that after the closing of the post and telegraph office in Waring Street, Belfast, it was found necessary to reopen a branch post office there; and whether, considering that the new general post office affords no convenience to the district of Waring Street for the despatch of telegrams, and that a telegraph office is more urgently required there than the post office, he will now take steps to have a telegraph office established in connection with this branch post office as soon as possible?

*MR. RAIKES: On a review of the whole case, I have decided that, as soon as arrangements can be made, telegraph business may again be transacted at Waring Street, as an experiment for one year, at the end of which time the matter will be reconsidered.

MR. CECIL ROCHE.

MR. JOHN ELIIS (Nottinghamshire, Rushcliffe), asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, on Monday, 25th February, at Ennis, Mr. Cecil Roche, R.M., sentenced Thomas Bermingham to two sentences of six months each, for assaults on two officers of the law occurring at the same time, during the struggle leading to his eviction.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I am informed that Thomas Bermingham has been sentenced at Ennis to a term of six months' imprisonment for violently resisting the sheriff in the execution of his duty, and to a second term of six months for violently assaulting a police-constable on the same occasion. The man has appealed.

MR. J. ELLIS: Is the House to understand that if a man comes in collision with a dozen persons, and endeavours to defend himself and his property, he may be sent to prison for six years?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot answer that question, but I believe that under the Act of 1882 there was a case in which a man got cumulative imprisonment amounting to one year for sending threatening letters.

ARREST OF POLICE CONSTABLES.

MR. JOHN ELLIS asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, whether, early in February, two police constables were arrested by District Inspector Brett, R.I.C., and by him charged with having cut the tail off a cow belonging to James Byrne, near Carron Burren, county Clare, and also damaging some hay belonging to him.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: District Inspector Brett reports that it is not the case that he either arrested two police constables or charged them as alleged in the question. James Byrne stated that his property was injured in the manner indicated, and that he was fired at on pursuing the persons. The constables were brought up at Petty Sessions on the charge of James Byrne that they had fired at him. The case was dismissed on the merits, the magistrates at the same time stating that the constables left the Court without the slightest stain on their characters, and that they considered Byrne's swearing to be of a most reckless description.

Mr John Ellis

MR. J. ELLIS: Will the right hon. Gentleman give the name of the magistrate?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not acquainted with it, but if the hon. Member will give notice of the Question I will ascertain.

EVICTON AT ABBEYFEALE.

MR. T. M. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it was true that in December, 1888, the Sheriff of Limerick, with a body of police under the command of Major Rolleston, R.M., visited the lands of Michael Moloney, of Abbeyfeale, and evicted him therefrom; under what colour of legal authority was this eviction carried out; were the facts as follow, namely, that, on 9th February, Molony was served with an eviction notice by his landlord, the Rev. Conyngnam Ellis, of Cranbourne Vicarage, Windsor, for a year's rent, £21 17s. 5d., converting him into a caretaker; that, on 31st July, Moloney sent a cheque for the amount to the agent, R. D. O'Brien, 16, Mallow Street, Limerick, who sent a receipt for the rent due, dated 3rd August, and that this payment redeemed the lands, as the six months for redemption would not expire till 9th August; if so, upon what warrant did the sheriff act; was a magistrate's order for the eviction of a caretaker obtained under Section 86 of the Land Act, 1860, or was even a summons to show cause served on Moloney; upon whose requisition were the forces of the Crown supplied for the eviction, and what was the number and cost of the force; did Major Rolleston, R.M., or any official, take any trouble to ascertain whether the eviction was legal or illegal, or examine the sheriff's authority before setting out on the eviction expedition; did Moloney warn all concerned that his rent was paid and the land redeemed, and why did the authorities pay no attention to his protests, but insist on turning him out; and, if the Government were advised that the eviction was illegal, will they make the tenant any compensation for their share in the transaction?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said: Michael Moloney was one of several tenants evicted in December, 1888, a force of police being present at the requisition of the sheriff for his protection, but I am informed that the Resident Magistrate had not arrived at the time of Moloney's eviction. Moloney stated at the time, and still alleges, that his rent was paid. If this is so, he has, of course, his remedy at law for any wrong he may have suffered. I understand that proceedings are threatened at the suit of Moloney against the sheriff and agent, and it would be therefore improper for me to enter into any discussion of the circumstances of the case.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Surely the right hon. Gentleman can say whether, as a matter of fact, before the forces of the Crown were supplied for the purpose of carrying out the eviction, the authorities took the trouble to ascertain whether the eviction was legal or illegal, or examine the Sheriff's authority before setting out on the eviction expedition?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As far as I know, the usual practice was followed. If the hon. and learned Gentleman desires further information, he should give notice of a Question.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I only ask that the right hon. Gentleman shall answer the Question on the Paper, of which he has had notice for some days. I want to know by what authority the forces of the Crown were employed for an illegal purpose?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know that the purpose was illegal, and I presume that the ordinary practice was followed.

MR. T. M. HEALY again read the Question upon the Paper, and remarked that it was clearly the duty of the right hon. Gentleman, for the performance of which he was paid a salary, to obtain the information that was necessary to enable him to answer the Questions of hon. Members.

THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND CATECHISM.

MR. COLMAN (Norwich) asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether the teaching of the Church of England Catechism was, or has hitherto been, included in the curriculum of the elementary school at Holme-next-the-Sea, Norfolk, the same being a Board school; whether a lately-appointed mistress of the school, on learning the fact, informed the School Board that she could not conscientiously give religious instruction except from the Bible, and that, if she were required to teach the Catechism, she would be obliged to give notice of resignation; whether the Board thereupon accepted her resignation; and, whether the Education Department will take steps to prevent the violation of the law by the further use of the Church Catechism?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL ON EDUCATION (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): I am informed that the teaching of the Church Catechism was for some time included in the religious instruction given at the School named, but without the knowledge of the School Board, who state that they left the matter in the hands of the teachers with the understanding that nothing should be taught in contravention of the Act. The Board's reason for accepting the late teacher's resignation was that she objected to the examination of the school by the diocesan inspector, and this practice, the Board—upon which there are two Nonconformists—were not disposed to abandon. The teaching of the Catechism has now been discontinued, and I do not think it will be necessary to take any further steps.

HOUSING OF THE WORKING CLASSES ACT, 1885.

MR. FRANCIS POWELL (Wigan) asked the President of the Local Government Board whether, having regard to the complicated character of many provisions in "The Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1885," and the consequent difficulty of giving due effect to that important Statute, he will cause to be prepared and circulated among local authorities, in the course of the present Session, a memorandum explaining their powers and duties under the Act; and whether, if so, he will lay the document upon the Table of the House?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's-in-the-East): When the Housing of the Working Classes Act was passed the Local Government Board addressed circular letters to the several urban and rural sanitary authorities throughout England and Wales, directing their attention to the Act and explaining its provisions. I have no doubt that the authorities are fully aware of the powers which they possess under the Act referred to. If I had reason to believe that it was not so. I should be quite prepared to act on the suggestion of my hon. Friend.

CITY OF LONDON VOLUNTEERS.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK (University of London) asked the Secretary of State for War whether, in any re-organization of the Honourable Artillery Company, he could obtain for the City of London Volunteers (as successors of the London Train Bands), the right of drilling in the Artillery grounds?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): This question was fully discussed in 1873, and an opinion was given by the then Attorney General, the present Lord Coleridge, that, subject to the rights of the Commission of Lieutenancy and the Militia, the Honourable Artillery Company are entitled to the exclusive use of this ground. But, personally, I am entirely in sympathy with the object of my hon. Friend; and I think that if the Company could see their way to granting to the Volunteers of the City a reasonable use of their drill ground, they would render a service to the force, and would materially strengthen their own claim to public sympathy and support.

THE COMMISSARIAT.

MR. WHITLEY (Liverpool, Everton) asked the Secretary of State for War whether it is a fact that certain Officers of the late Commissariat, of many years' service, and of irreproachable character, have been passed over, and their places offered to young men of only a few months' departmental service; whether it is a fact that many of those officers not selected for the new corps have hitherto been officially reported upon most favourably; and whether he can state to what causes the rejection of these officers is due?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: It is quite incorrect that the places of any senior officers have been offered to young men of only a few months' departmental service. A vacant step in the rank of Colonel in the Army Service Corps has been filled by the selection from the next junior rank of the first officer in the list considered fitted and qualified for the position. This selection was made in accordance with custom, and the express provision of the Royal Warrant under which the old Commissariat and Transport Staff are now serving. Permanent appointments in the new Army Service Corps were offered to some 52 out of the 70 officers already seconded from their regiments for temporary service with the Commissariat and Transport Staff, and of that number only some 30 have accepted them; but the whole of the officers so serving have been given the option of continuing to serve with the Army Service Corps for the same period, and under the same conditions, as those of their original appointments to the corps. The number of permanent appointments offered was fixed with due regard to the best interests of the public service, and the rights of officers who were serving with the Commissariat and Transport Staff have been carefully guarded.

DRAINAGE CHARGES IN IRELAND.

MR. T. M. HEALY asked the Secretary to the Treasury: Is it true that, by the system of drainage charges put in force by the Board of Works, a landlord, named Christopher Reynolds, of Abbeylara, county Longford, has been deprived, without compensation, of the whole of the small property owned by him; is it the fact that, without giving Mr. Reynolds any previous notice of a charge, he was served in 1881 by the Board of Works with a final award for the Upper Inny Drainage, amounting to £20 15s. 6d. per annum, although the total Government valuation of the land is only £12 10s.; can any explanation of this levy be given, and of the failure to serve notice of it on the owner; is there any precedent in the history of the Board of Works for a levy of nearly double the valuation for drainage of lands, and is this founded on their estimate of the improvement effected by the drainage; is he aware that the tenant of the lands went into the Land Court, and got the fair rent fixed against Mr. Reynolds at £20, and that the Chief Commissioners, on account of the drainage charge, raised the fair rent to £24, and expressed their amazement at the action of the Board of Works; did Mr. Reynolds, finding himself unable to get anything out of the land through drainage charge and taxes, leave payment of the charge go by default; did the Attorney General thereupon proceed against him at suit of the Board of Works; is he aware that the County Court Judge expressed his regret at being compelled to make a decree in favour of the Board of Works, which must rob Mr. Reynolds of his little property; did the Board thereupon appoint Colonel Dopping as Receiver over the lands, and thereby deprive Mr. Reynolds of his only means of support; was this action by the Board sanctioned by the Government; and, what security will landlords or tenants have against similar treatment if the three Government Drainage Bills become law, and is it the Board of Works which would carry them into effect?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. W. JACKSON, Leeds, N): The drainage scheme in question was carried out with money advanced by Government by the Drainage Board of the district, consisting of local proprietors, and on its completion an award was made by the Board of Works under the Drainage and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Act, 1863, by which 62 acres 1 rood and 6 perches of the lands of Derragh, the property of Mr. C. Reynolds (and now in the possession of Peter Early, judicial tenant, at a rent of £24) was charged with £16 17s. 6d. per annum, to repay £337 10s. 8d., the proportion of expenditure due on his holding; (2) The annual instalment payable under award is £16 17s. 6d., none of which has been paid by Mr. Reynolds, though his tenant had paid him up to May 1887, and was processed for rent to May 1888; (3) The Board was compelled by the Act, on the completion of the works, to make the award, and they published the requisite notices of lodgment of draft award; (4) The award is not founded on the Board's Estimate of the improvements effected by the Drainage, but on the sum expended by the Drainage Board under the supervision of their own Engineer. The original Estimate made by the Proprietors for the entire district was £41,691 12s. 2d., while the actual expenditure, including interest, was £86,553 12s.; (5) The County Court Judge fixed the rent at £20, which the Commissioners increased on appeal to £24. The Board are not aware of any expression of opinion made by the Land Commissioners; (6) Mr. Reynolds paid the Board nothing; (7) Decrees were, therefore, taken out in the County Courts, and Returns of nulla bona made. The Board had no option then but to proceed for a Receiver and sale; (8) There is no record of any such statement being made, a decree could not affect the property; (9) and (10) Colonel Dopping as a District Receiver was appointed by the Law Judge; (11) The drainage of the district was, as I have already explained, carried out, not by the Board of Works, but by the proprietors in the district. The Barrow and Bann Drainages will be carried out by a Board locally elected. The Shannon works alone will be carried out by the Board of Works, the charges to be imposed being primarily assented to by all who have to pay them.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I gather that the substance of the answers is that a particular landlord has had his property confiscated for no fault of his own, and that the Government do not intend to grant any compensation.

*MR. JACKSON: The Board of Works have simply carried out a duty imposed upon them by Act of Parliament.

MR. T. M. HEALY: As the hon. Gentleman is unable to say that the Treasury will make compensation, I beg to give notice that I will call attention to the extraordinary facts of this case upon the Vote for the Board of Works.

THE OLFHER EVICTIONS.

MR. T. M. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if it was true that the Government have changed to County Fermanagh the venue of the prisoners charged with resisting eviction on the Olphert Estate in Donegal; had the Crown served notice on the Sheriff for a panel of 200 special jurors; was it the case that the special juror class in Fermanagh is so limited, that out of a population of 84,879 persons only 212, according to the 1887 Return, are special jurors in that county; and was it true that all the prisoners are Gaelic-speaking Catholics, and that there is no Catholic on the special jury panel, while a large number of the special jurors are Orangemen, and many are landlords and agents?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The reply to the inquiry in the first paragraph is in the affirmative. A notice was served on the Sheriff for a panel of all the special jurors in Fermanagh. The figures appear to be substantially as stated in third paragraph. I have no information as to the language or religion of the persons charged, or as to the politics, religion, or avocation of the special jurors.

CULLINANE, THE INFORMER.

MR. COX (Clare, E.), asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether Cullinane, the informer, is till within the jurisdiction of Her Majesty's Government; if not, on what date he left the country; from what source he obtained the money to take him out of the country; where he was last residing before he left; and whether the police authorities can furnish any information as to his present whereabouts?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must decline to answer any questions of this character across the floor of the House with regard to the movements of informers. I have already told the House that I do not know where Cullinane is. If I did know I should not say.

MR. SEXTON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the charge in this case is that Cullinane organized the commission of outrages which were charged against the National League before the Royal Commission and elsewhere; and, whether, as the right hon. Gentleman has promised facilities to all parties before the Commission, and has given facilities to the Times, by placing in the hands of an informer documents of State, he will give information as to when Cullinane left the country, where he went, and whether the money which enabled him to go was provided by his employers out of the public purse?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not propose to answer the highly argumentative question of the hon. Member. If information of that sort is desired from the Government, it should be applied for in the ordinary way.

MR. COX: What is the ordinary way?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: To write a letter to the Irish Government and sign it.

ST. PANCRAS BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

MR. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.) asked the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the following case—Boothby v. Robinson and others—an action tried before His Honour Judge Stonor and a special jury at the Marylebone County Court, on Tuesday, 5th March, the facts as reported by the Press being as follows:—The Plaintiff was ordered by the St. Pancras Poor Law Guardians to pay for his wife's maintenance, which he declined to do, on the ground that the wife had failed in her covenant—

“He was then ordered to be detained until the money was paid, was taken to the casual ward, and an attempt was made to undress him for the purposes of a bath. Seeing the filthy state of the casual inmates the Plaintiff declined, though this cost him a severe struggle with the attendants. Ultimately, after being detained about eight hours, he paid a portion of the money, and was released without any explanation. Plaintiff had lost his situation through this act of the Guardians. His Honour, in addressing the Jury, drew attention to the high-handed manner in which Plaintiff had been treated. The Jury retired, and returned almost immediately with a verdict for Plaintiff, damages £100. Because the case had been remitted from a Superior Court, costs on the scale of the High Court were allowed;”

and whether he will issue instructions to prevent such proceedings by Boards of Guardians in future?

*MR. RITCHIE: I have communicated with the Guardians of St. Pancras, and it appears that the main facts stated in the Question are substantially correct. The detention was obviously illegal, and the result of the action against the Guardians, with a verdict of £100 damages, I think is likely to be much more effective than any suggestion which might be made by the Local Government Board.

PRISON CHAPLAINS AND SURGEONS.

MR. CRAIG SELLAR (Lanarkshire, Partick) asked the Secretary to the Treasury whether, having regard to the undertaking given by him on 15th November, 1888, that the question of the disproportion of salaries of the prison chaplains and surgeons in England and Scotland respectively should be considered before February, he can now state what steps, if any, Her Majesty's Government are going to take with a view to adjust this matter?

*MR. JACKSON: In accordance with my undertaking, I have examined this question in connection with the Scotch

Mr. A. J. Balfour

Prison Estimates for the next financial year. The conclusion that I came to was no case had been made out for raising the pay of the Scotch prison chaplains, but I propose to invite the Secretary of State to consider whether the English rates should not be revised. There is, on the whole, very little inequality between the salaries paid to the Scotch surgeons and those paid in England, and the only case that appeared to me to require revision was that of the surgeon at Barlinnie, whose scale will be improved.

MINING LOCK OUT.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanarkshire, N.W.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been directed to the lock-out of 60 miners at Busbyhead Pit, near Crosshouse, for refusing to sign a scale of deductions proposed by the manager; whether the workmen offered to submit the proposed scale to arbitration, as provided in Clause 12 of the Coal Mines Act; whether the manager refused this and all similar proposals; and, whether this is a breach of Section 12 of the Coal Mines Act.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I have obtained a Report from the Inspector on this matter. I am informed by him that it was the manager, and not the men, who wished to submit the proposed scale to a neutral person mutually chosen, but this the men would not agree to. The owners thereupon drew up a scale of deductions, and intimated to the miners that each man must sign it before being allowed to work. The men refused to sign this agreement, and have not been at work since the 27th ult. I cannot see that there has been any breach of the Act.

WESTERN AUSTRALIA.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether since last Session the Secretary of State for the Colonies has proceeded any further with negotiations for the establishment of responsible government in Western Australia, and the transfer to the hands of white Colonists there of the control over the lands in the temperate part of the Colony, which are the only temperate lands now under the control of the British Government for the purpose of colonization?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, Toxteth): The Bill has been read a second time in the Legislative Council of the Colony, and a General Election has since taken place; but, as the hon. Member was informed at the end of last Session, legislation in this country must take place before responsible government can be established in Western Australia, and I can add nothing to the previous answers given in the House.

A LENIENT SENTENCE.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, at Manchester Assizes on 4th March, John Matthews was convicted of manslaughter (the killing his wife by a kick); whether John Matthews had been previously convicted 23 times, three of these convictions being for assaults on the woman he killed; whether the said John Matthews was sentenced to two months' imprisonment with hard labour; and whether he will lay upon the Table the record of these various convictions?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir, this prisoner was convicted as stated. I have not at present the particulars of his previous convictions, but I am informed by the Clerk of Assize that there was a long list of previous convictions against him, and that he had been two or three times convicted of assaulting his wife. The jury after a long deliberation accompanied their verdict of manslaughter with a strong recommendation to mercy, on the ground that they did not think any serious mischief was contemplated. He had kicked his wife on her leg, which had varicose veins, one of which was ruptured, and she bled to death. The Judge acted on the view of the jury, and punished the prisoner for the mere assault. I do not think any useful purpose would be served by laying the prisoner's record on the Table of the House.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Is it the fact that the jury who recommended this man to mercy necessarily knew nothing of his previous convictions, which were only before the Judge, and that one of those convictions was for an assault upon his wife, for which he was sentenced to two months' imprisonment?

MR. MATTHEWS: I told the hon. Gentleman that I have no information in regard to the previous convictions.

THE SUBMARINE CABLE COMPANY.

MR. PINKERTON (Galway) asked the Postmaster General, whether the staff of the Submarine Cable Company are to be placed upon the established staff of the Central Telegraphic Office; and, if so, as the maximum of a telegraphist in the Submarine service is £150 per annum, whether the Submarine Officers in receipt of their maximum will be placed upon the minimum scale of the senior clerks of the Central Telegraph Office (£150 to £190), to the detriment of the telegraphists of the first class of the Central Telegraph Office, many of whom have already been waiting two years for promotion from the maximum of their class £140; and will he take such steps as will prevent any injustice being done to officers who have been many years on the establishment?

*MR. RAIKES: In reply to the hon. Member all that I can say is that in any arrangements that may be made for the transfer to the Post Office of the staff of the Submarine Telegraph Company care will be taken to prevent injustice being done to officers already in the service of the Department.

DIRECTOR GENERAL OF 'TELEGRAPHS.

MR. DONAL SULLIVAN (Westmeath S.) asked the Under Secretary of State for India when Sir Albert Cappel, who completed his five years tenure of office as Director General of Telegraphs on the 14th June, 1888, will be required to vacate that appointment; and whether Colonel Molloch, the officiating Director General, will revert to military duty on attaining the age of 55 years next April, in accordance with the usual practice?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): Sir Albert Cappel, who is on leave, will vacate his appointment in March, 1890, up to which date he is entitled to furlough. Colonel Malloch will vacate his appointment in April, 1890.

IRISH EDUCATION OFFICE.

MR. DONAL SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is a fact that the Irish Education Office is the only Department of the Civil Service in Ireland where the system of fining clerks for late attendance is carried out; if so, will he state upon what grounds are those clerks subjected to this exceptional practice; and whether he will give directions to discontinue the system?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe the fact is as stated. I understand the practice has been approved by the Treasury, and has been in force in the Department for a very long period. I will communicate with the heads of the Department on the subject.

THE ATHY UNION.

MR. LEAHY (Kildare, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Local Government Board of Ireland have yet come to the decision of ordering an election of Guardians for the Athy Union, in accordance with the wishes of the ratepayers; and, if so, when will the notice be issued?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No decision on the subject of restoring the elected Guardians in Athy Union has yet been come to; but the matter will be taken into consideration towards the end of the present month. The elected Board can be restored at any time, and passing by the General Election (held annually on 25th March) does not necessarily keep them out of office till March, 1890.

MR. SEXTON: May I ask whether the object of delaying the reconstitution of this Board of Guardians is to prevent the giving of out-door relief?

There was no reply.

EMPLOYMENT OF CARMEN.

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney) asked the First Lord of the Treasury whether, owing to the great loss the present short hours entail on carmen and others, he will cause to be altered the time of opening and keeping open of the docks and other bonded warehouses from eight o'clock a.m. until six o'clock p.m. in summer, and from nine o'clock a.m. until six o'clock p.m. in winter?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand): I have had no notice of the Question, and am therefore unable to answer it.

COUNTY COURT JUDGE BISHOP.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS (Merionethshire) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the attention of the Lord Chancellor has been called to the strictures made by Lord Coleridge on the conduct of County Court Judge Bishop in not entering the verdict as given in writing by the jury in the case of the Rev. Richard Jones versus Roberts and others, which was heard on appeal on 17th December, 1888, before Lord Coleridge and Mr. Justice Manisty; and whether the Lord Chancellor has taken any action in the matter?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Lord Chancellor that the proceedings in the case before Judge Bishop have been submitted for his consideration. The learned Judge seems to have come to a conclusion, erroneous in point of law, but which, if it were sound, would have made the findings of the jury immaterial. After careful consideration the Lord Chancellor cannot find anything in the case calling for his interference, which, as the hon. Member is aware, is only applicable where a Judge has been guilty of misconduct.

MR. T. ELLIS: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman to lay on the Table the shorthand notes of the remarks of the Lord Chief Justice?

COAL WEIGHING.

MR. SPENCER BALFOUR (Burnley) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been directed to the decision, given on Wednesday last by the Queen's Bench Division, affirming that the exemption granted by the Home Secretary under the Act of 1872 from the provision that coal should be weighed where the amount of wages depended upon the quantity of mineral got, was valid under the Act of 1887; and, as to what course he proposes to take in view of such decision?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have seen the decision in question. Before taking any active steps I shall consider the representations of the parties interested, whether employers or employed. I may say that the inclination of my opinion is that all weighing exemptions inconsistent with the Act of 1887 should be revoked, unless the workmen as well as the employers desire their continuance.

THE NAVAL PROGRAMME.

MR. DUFF (Banffshire) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty if he would state the number of guns above nine inches diameter that will be required to complete the armament of the vessels proposed to be built under the new programme of naval defence?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The number of guns above 9 in. in diameter that will be required for the armament of vessels proposed under the new programme is as follows:—13½ in., 67 tons, 32; 10 in., 29 tons, 8; 9.2 in., 22 tons, 18—total, 38. This is independent of the reserve, which is in the proportion of one-eighth to the armament afloat.

RAILWAY SHUNTING.

MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth) asked the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been drawn to the danger to life and limb reported in the Official Returns (General Report to Board of Trade, C. 5474, for 1887) incurred by railway shunters; that, in the year 1887, 124 were killed, and 1,207 injured, in the various shunting operations of railway service; that, in the 10 years ended 1887, the casualties in shunting amounted to 1,180 killed, and 12,459 wounded, and that, out of a staff of 6,261 men engaged in coupling and uncoupling vehicles, 3,594 had been killed or injured, whereas in the United States, since the compulsory adoption of automatic couplings by Act of Congress, dated 4th May, 1884, according to published Returns, there have only been 5 men killed for every 100 in the United Kingdom; and whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a Bill this Session to mitigate the dangers to which railway shunters are unnecessarily exposed?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS-BEACH, Bristol, W.): The figures quoted by the hon. Member are not quite accurate, and the number of railway servants killed or injured in coupling or uncoupling vehicles must not be compared with the total of a staff of 6,261 men, as some servants besides shunters are employed for that purpose. I do not know to what returns the hon. Member refers as to similar accidents in the United States. As at present advised, I do not think it would be possible to compel the adoption of automatic couplings by Act of Parliament, but I am now endeavouring to obtain information on the various systems adopted, with a view to early legislation on the subject.

EMIGRATION FROM IRELAND.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrona, S): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to an article in the Nineteenth Century by Mr. James Hack Tuke, giving a highly satisfactory account of the emigrants who left Mayo, Galway, and Donegal under his auspices in the year 1882-4; whether Mr. Tuke was right in saying that the cessation of family emigration from the congested districts in Ireland is not due to want of funds, there being a balance not far short of £20,000 of the grant voted by Parliament still untouched; and whether in view of the statement by Mr. Tuke that he is in receipt of "very numerous applications" for assistance from the congested districts, there are any reasons for withholding from him the money voted by Parliament for that purpose?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: In answer to my hon. Friend I have to state that the unexpended balance is £18,000. I am firmly convinced of the advantage, both to those who go and those who stay, of emigration from the congested districts of Ireland; and I should gladly avail myself of any aid Mr. Tuke can give me in carrying out the intentions of the Act of Parliament.

THE LIMERICK GUARDIANS.

MR. FINUCANE (Limerick, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether Mr. Drury, Local Government Auditor, recently surcharged three of the Limerick Guardians the sum of £9 1s. 6d.;

Sir M. Hicks-Beach

whether this surcharge is the result of an order made by the Limerick Guardians nearly two years ago directing Mr. John Ryan, solicitor to the Board, to take the necessary legal steps to prosecute 12 armed policemen who invaded the Limerick Workhouse grounds and who refused to leave when ordered to do so by the Guardians; whether the order directed Mr. Ryan to engage special counsel; whether he is aware that Mr. Ryan's bill of costs was taxed, and only reduced by £1, and that Mr. Ryan was obliged to engage special counsel at a fee of £20, and whether that was the exact fee paid by the Government to Mr. Carson in all prosecutions under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act; and whether the powers of an auditor are limited to ascertaining whether any order of a Board of Guardians involving expenditure is illegal or not; and, if not illegal, whether the expenditure is in excess of what ought to be paid?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The facts are as stated in the first paragraph, with the exception that the amount surcharged was £9 6s. 6d. The surcharge was in connection with a resolution adopted by the Board of Guardians in October, 1887, for the prosecution of a party of police for entering the workhouse grounds and refusing to leave. This attendance of the police was, it appears, in consequence of a request made by one of the Guardians, a magistrate, and that police protection had been afforded at previous meetings at the desire of the Guardians themselves. The direction was that the solicitor employ counsel as he may deem fit in the case. The case came before Petty Sessions, and the sergeant in command was fined one farthing for trespass. The original bill of costs was not taxed; but a second one was prepared and submitted to taxation by Mr. Ryan, which, however, the auditor felt himself unable to recognize. The auditor reduced the fee from 20 guineas to 15 guineas, and likewise made some other disallowances to the amount of £4 1s. 6d. I understand that no fixed fee is paid to Mr. Carson, the amount being measured according to the magnitude of the case. The auditor has full power to strike out all charges he may deem illegal or unfounded, and also reduce such as he may deem to be exorbitant.

CAPPOQUIN PETTY SESSIONS.

MR. P. J. POWER (Waterford, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) whether cases entered for hearing at Cappoquin Petty Sessions on 24th January, and requiring the attendance of two magistrates, were adjourned to 7th February as only one magistrate attended; (2) whether, on 7th February, such case were again adjourned to 21st February as only one magistrate attended; (3) whether, on 21st February, another adjournment again took place for the same reason; (4) what prevented the Resident Magistrate attending Cappoquin ordinary Petty Sessions on the days in question; (5) and, whether any steps can be taken to prevent the inconveniences to professional gentlemen and their clients that follow such adjournments?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The facts are as stated in the first three paragraphs. The district Resident Magistrate was unable to attend on any of the occasions in question owing to his having been engaged on other duties.

THE HIGHLAND LAND LEAGUE.

DR. M'DONALD (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to a recent criminal trial at Stornoway, against Mr. Donald MacRae, schoolmaster of Balallan, and others, for the expulsion of intruders from a meeting of the Highland Land League, after notice had been given to the said intruders to retire; whether the Sheriff dismissed the complaint as unfounded, and characterized the alleged offence as unknown to the law of Scotland; whether the Procurator Fiscal, or his deputy, at whose instance the complaint was raised, are agents for Lady Matheson, the proprietrix of the Island; whether, in view of the fact that the complaint was instituted either from ignorance of the law or otherwise, any notice has been taken of the conduct of the Procurator Fiscal or his deputy; and, whether, as the machinery of the Criminal Court has been improperly set in motion, it is intended to make any compensation or redress to Mr. MacRae and the other defendants?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): The persons mentioned in the question of the hon.

Gentleman were tried summarily on a charge of assaulting a man in Balallan School by seizing hold of and compressing his throat, to the effusion of blood and injury of the person, and tearing his coat and forcibly ejecting him from the school. The Sheriff did not characterize the offence thus alleged as unknown to the law of Scotland, and such a decision would have been manifestly untenable. The accused were acquitted on the ground that the evidence did not sustain the charge. The man alleged to have been injured had declined to withdraw from a meeting which had desired him to do so, and the evidence related to the degree of pressure with which that request was enforced. The case had been reported to the Fiscal by the police in the usual way. The Procurator Fiscal and his deputy are in partnership as solicitors, and I am informed that they are sometimes employed professionally by Lady Matheson, as well as by other residents in the district, including one of the persons prosecuted on this occasion. The assumptions upon which the last two questions rest being incorrect, no action is called for in either of the directions suggested.

IRISH CESSPAYERS AND-GRAND JURIES.

MR. PINKERTON (Galway): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been directed to the evidence given before the committee of the grand jury of the county of Antrim, wherein it is clearly shown that an exorbitant rate is charged for the collection of the county cess, although competent men with ample security are willing to collect it for half the amount; and whether he will urge upon the Government the advisability of entertaining at an early date a measure to put an end to the present anomalous system which prevails in Ireland whereby the cesspayers are almost entirely unrepresented on the grand jury?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no direct knowledge of the evidence referred to by the hon. Member, inasmuch as the action of grand juries in Ireland in regard to the appointment of cess collectors is in no wise under the control of the Executive Government. Having, however, caused the question to be brought before the secretary to the tual criminals of every kind, to exercise, for instance, with persons guilty of garotting, and with two soldiers, who having deserted, were convicted of committing several burglaries?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman asks me whether there is only one yard. I cannot answer that without notice. He also asks whether it is the case that prisoners exercise at different times. I gather from the answer supplied me that that is the case. It appears that rev. gentlemen are exercised alone. It also appears that there is a distinction between persons convicted more than once and persons convicted for the first time.

MR. W. REDMOND: Does the right hon. Gentleman state definitely that different classes of prisoners are exercised at different times? Such is quite contrary to my experience.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman is a little unreasonable. I have given him all information in my power. If he desires further information and will put down a Question I will do my best to answer it.

DENBIGHSHIRE CHARITIES.

MR. T. ELLIS (Merionethshire): I beg to ask the hon. Member for the Penrith Division of Cumberland, as one of the Charity Commissioners for England and Wales, when the Report of the Assistant Commissioner appointed to inquire into the charities of Denbighshire will be issued; and when a similar inquiry into the charities of other counties will be instituted?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: It is not proposed to issue the Report on any one parish until the work of inquiring into all the parishes in the county of Denbigh is completed. It is not expected that this work will be completed before several months. The Commissioners have not at present been furnished by the Treasury with the requisite authority for such an expenditure as would be necessary for the purpose of holding similar inquiries into the charities of other counties.

THE WELSH LANGUAGE

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether, having regard to the saving provisions in the first section of the Statute Law Revision Act, 1887, the repeal by that Act of the 20th section of 21 Henry VIII., imposing certain disabilities on persons who use the Welsh language extends to disabilities incurred before the Act was passed; and, if not, whether he will take steps to extend that repeal to such last-mentioned disabilities?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I gather from the Question of the right hon. Gentleman that he is under a misapprehension. The section to which he refers is, in fact, section 17 of the Act 27 Henry VIII., cap. 26. It is not repealed, and if he will refer to the Statute Law Revision Act, 1887, and the revised edition of the Statutes there referred to, he will find this section printed at length. The mistake arises from the section being numbered 20 in some editions of the Statutes. I understand, with reference to questions which have been put to me upon this matter, that the formal proceedings of coroners' courts, municipal corporations, and other public bodies in Wales have been and are recorded in English; and, as I have already said, no difficulty has arisen from the necessity of occasional interpretation.

IRELAND—THE SPECIAL COMMISSION.

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Mayo, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the statements made by certain prisoners as to temptations held out to them by policemen, prison officials, and others, to induce them to concoct false evidence against Members of this House and others, he will afford a suitable opportunity for examining into the truth of these allegations—viz., by a public investigation upon oath?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no ground for believing that these statements, if they have been made, are otherwise than false and malicious. Any witness examined before the Commission can, I suppose, be cross-examined on oath in respect to these charges. If there has been any conspiracy of the kind indicated, it can be punished under the ordinary law.

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN: Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether he expects to vote for county councillors; whether he has declared that it is the intention of the Local Government Act to place such persons on the Register; and what steps the Government will take to remedy this omission?

*MR. RITCHIE: I have not declared that it was the intention of the Local Government Act that farm servants, as such, without reference to the circumstances, should be placed on the Register of Voters. It is obvious that the question as to the right of any farm servant in this matter must depend upon the actual facts in the particular case.

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck): Is it not a fact that in answer to a question as to whether a workman living in a house belonging to his employer, the occupation of which is counted as part of his wages, was entitled to vote, the right hon. Gentleman said that such a workman would be so entitled.

*MR. RITCHIE: The answer on this point which I previously gave to the hon. Member for the Wansbeck Division was that if a labourer is not required to reside for the purposes of his service, but merely has the cottage as part of his wages, he would, in my opinion, be entitled to be registered as a voter under the County Electors Act.

IRISH LACE MANUFACTURE.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY (London-derry): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he will be so good as at once to communicate with the Irish Government in Dublin, to whom applications have been addressed for Mr. A. Cole to visit the lace making centres this month, in order that the visits may be paid without further delay?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: I shall be glad to make any communications to the Irish Government that may facilitate this work in Ireland.

ELEMENTARY SCHOOLMASTERS.

MR. DILLWYN (for Mr. CONYBEARE): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, whether it is permissible for head masters of elementary schools receiving Government grants to act in the capacity of paid registration agents to Parliamentary candidates?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: The principal teacher is not allowed to undertake duties not connected with the school which occupy any part whatever of the school hours or of the time appointed for the special instruction of pupil teachers; but beyond these limits it is not for the Department to determine how he may employ his spare time.

THE REV. FATHER CLARKE.

MR. W. CORBET (Wicklow, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is the fact that a number of prisoners convicted of disgraceful crimes, pick-pockets, burglars, and others, have been transferred from Dublin to Wexford, and is it intended to require the Rev. Father Clarke to take exercise in the same yard and at the same time with such criminals?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Certain prisoners convicted of larceny and other crimes have, in ordinary course, been transferred from Dublin to Wexford Prison. Two of the prisoners so transferred having been convicted for the first time, one for "false pretences" and the other for "assault police," are such as the Rev. Mr. Clarke was ordered to exercise with. He has not been, and would not be, required to exercise with the prisoners convicted of larceny, who were transferred from Dublin (inasmuch as it appears they had all been convicted before), nor with any habitual criminals. As a matter of fact, the Governor reports that "the Rev. Mr. Clarke was exercised by himself on the medical officer's recommendation previous to his removal to hospital, where he now exercises alone."

MR. W. REDMOND: Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that there are different classes for exercise?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand from the answer supplied to me by the Prisons Board that there is a distinction made between persons convicted for the first time and those persons properly described as habitual criminals.

MR. W. REDMOND: But is it not a fact that in this prison there is only one yard, and that all prisoners are required to exercise at the same time, no matter what their class? Is it not a fact that when I was in that prison I was called upon to exercise with habitual criminals of every kind, to exercise, for instance, with persons guilty of garrotting, and with two soldiers, who having deserted, were convicted of committing several burglaries?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman asks me whether there is only one yard. I cannot answer that without notice. He also asks whether it is the case that prisoners exercise at different times. I gather from the answer supplied me that that is the case. It appears that rev. gentlemen are exercised alone. It also appears that there is a distinction between persons convicted more than once and persons convicted for the first time.

MR. W. REDMOND: Does the right hon. Gentleman state definitely that different classes of prisoners are exercised at different times? Such is quite contrary to my experience.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman is a little unreasonable. I have given him all information in my power. If he desires further information and will put down a Question I will do my best to answer it.

DENBIGHSHIRE CHARITIES.

MR. T. ELLIS (Merionethshire): I beg to ask the hon. Member for the Penrith Division of Cumberland, as one of the Charity Commissioners for England and Wales, when the Report of the Assistant Commissioner appointed to inquire into the charities of Denbighshire will be issued; and when a similar inquiry into the charities of other counties will be instituted?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: It is not proposed to issue the Report on any one parish until the work of inquiring into all the parishes in the county of Denbigh is completed. It is not expected that this work will be completed before several months. The Commissioners have not at present been furnished by the Treasury with the requisite authority for such an expenditure as would be necessary for the purpose of holding similar inquiries into the charities of other counties.

THE WELSH LANGUAGE

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether, having regard to the saving provisions in the first section of the Statute Law Revision Act, 1887, the repeal by that Act of the 20th section of 21 Henry VIII., imposing certain disabilities on persons who use the Welsh language extends to disabilities incurred before the Act was passed; and, if not, whether he will take steps to extend that repeal to such last-mentioned disabilities?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I gather from the Question of the right hon. Gentleman that he is under a misapprehension. The section to which he refers is, in fact, section 17 of the Act 27 Henry VIII., cap. 26. It is not repealed, and if he will refer to the Statute Law Revision Act, 1887, and the revised edition of the Statutes there referred to, he will find this section printed at length. The mistake arises from the section being numbered 20 in some editions of the Statutes. I understand, with reference to questions which have been put to me upon this matter, that the formal proceedings of coroners' courts, municipal corporations, and other public bodies in Wales have been and are recorded in English; and, as I have already said, no difficulty has arisen from the necessity of occasional interpretation.

IRELAND—THE SPECIAL COMMISSION.

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Mayo, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the statements made by certain prisoners as to temptations held out to them by policemen, prison officials, and others, to induce them to concoct false evidence against Members of this House and others, he will afford a suitable opportunity for examining into the truth of these allegations—viz., by a public investigation upon oath?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no ground for believing that these statements, if they have been made, are otherwise than false and malicious. Any witness examined before the Commission can, I suppose, be cross-examined on oath in respect to these charges. If there has been any conspiracy of the kind indicated, it can be punished under the ordinary law.

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN: Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether he expects us to look on calmly while the Government are carrying on their conspiracy against us?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether District Inspector Newall, of Tralee, has been in attendance at the Commission Court for several months, was only examined on 28th January, and is still here in constant communication with the Times solicitor; whether Sergeant Faucett, of Cork; Head Constable Stretton, of Listowel; and Acting Sergeant C. O'Brien, of Tralee, were examined before the Christmas Adjournment, but are still here, and in constant communication with Mr. Soames; whether Constable Kenny, Listowel, has been for months attending the Commission in plain clothes, but has never been called, and is in constant communication with Mr. Soames; whether Sergeant Clark, of Tralee, was examined on 13th December and is still here; whether Superintendent Mallon, of Dublin, has been here since the Commission began, or for several months, and has never been called; whether District Inspector Webb, Kilkenny, came over shortly after the Commission opened, and was only examined on 6th March to prove arrest of Mr. W. Redmond, being meanwhile in constant communication with Mr. Soames; Detective Sergeant Humphreys, of Queenstown, was brought over, kept here for several weeks, never examined, and only allowed to return a few days ago after several consultations with Mr. Soames; whether eight Royal Irish Constabulary men in uniform, ten Royal Irish Constabulary men in plain clothes, five District Inspectors of Royal Irish Constabulary, and four members of Dublin Metropolitan Police in plain clothes, are still here without being examined, although the Commission was obliged to adjourn till Tuesday for want of witnesses; whether they or any of them have been in frequent consultation with the Times advisers; what are they doing in London if they are not to be called; and, why do not police witnesses who have been examined return to their duties in Ireland?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: District Inspector Newall was examined twice. He left on the 7th, the day after his second examination; was also here to give other evidence, which was dispensed with, and these circumstances rendered his attendance for a lengthened period necessary. The men named in paragraph 2 were examined before Christmas, but were detained for the purpose of giving further evidence. Sergeant Faucett was subsequently examined. Head Constable Stretton has returned to Ireland. Sergeant Faucett and Acting Sergeant O'Brien are still here as witnesses. Constable Kenny was here for a considerable time without being examined. His attendance has now been dispensed with. The members of the Royal Irish Constabulary in London on subpoena wear plain clothes unless when actually going to be examined, and Constable Kenny followed the usual practice. Sergeant Clark, of Tralee, is not still here. He was examined on the 13th of December; but it appears he was detained for further cross-examination if required. His attendance was dispensed with on the 7th inst. Superintendent Mallon, of Dublin, has been here for several months without being examined. He was subpoenaed to produce documents which were afterwards admitted. During part of the time of his attendance in London he has been occupied both at the police-court and at Middlesex Sessions as a witness against Patrick Malloy. He returned to Dublin on the 9th inst., after his services in connection with the latter case were dispensed with. Mr. Webb is a retired Constabulary officer, who was examined, proved that Mr. William Redmond had been at one time going about under an assumed name distributing "No Rent" manifestoes, &c. There is no such person as Detective Sergeant Humphreys, of Queenstown; but Head Constable Humphreys, of Liverpool, who was stationed at Queenstown some ten years ago, was in attendance on subpoena for several weeks, and was not examined, as the branch of the case to which his evidence referred was not gone into. There are two District Inspectors and 16 men of the Royal Irish Constabulary still in attendance at the Commission, in obedience to their subpoenas. There is no such distinction as indicated in the Question as to men in uniform and plain clothes. All members of the force, when being examined before the Commission, wear uniform. There are no members of the Dublin police here at present. Several members of that force were over recently in connection with the proceedings against Patrick Molloy. Of the 16 men alluded to, the attendance of some has now been dispensed with, and several others have only recently arrived. When called upon, no doubt, all witnesses supply any legitimate information in their power. And so far as the Government are concerned, they have been left at perfect liberty to supply such evidence as they could, and to dispose of their time for that purpose as they thought proper. They have all been in attendance in obedience to their subpoenas, ready to give evidence when called, and every effort has been made, in the interest of Irish administration, from time to time to have their attendance dispensed with at the earliest possible moment. Let me add that, while this is, I believe, a full and accurate account of what has occurred, I by no means commit myself to the proposition that, under no circumstances, ought an Irish constable to be in London for the purpose of aiding the investigation now going on before the Commission except under subpoena.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman if he has any information as to whether Head Constable Preston is in town or not?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: This question is not on the paper. I endeavoured to obtain information as to every matter on the paper.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR: I desire to ask the Attorney General whether Faucett and O'Brien, who are said to be still here, are remaining to be examined by the Times?

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: Is the Chief Secretary aware that an Inspector named Siddel, who has returned to Ireland and who was here since before Christmas, has not been examined, and that an officer of the name of Tierney has been in London attending the Commission up to the present and has not been examined at all?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY: I am afraid I do not follow the proceedings of the Commission with the attention that I might, and therefore I cannot answer that question.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

SIR W. HARCOURT: The Attorney General having stated the other day that the communications with these Irish officials have been made at his request through Mr. Soames, may I ask whether the attendance of all these persons was ordered at the request of the Attorney General through Mr. Soames?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed, and I have no doubt informed correctly, that the police constables in question attended in London on subpoena from the Court. I know nothing about the matter more than that.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The right hon. Gentleman is aware that the Court does not order a subpoena except upon the application of someone. What I wish to ask is whether the persons subpoenaed were subpoenaed at the instance of the Attorney General communicated through Mr. Soames?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no doubt that they were subpoenaed at the instances of Mr. Soames.

SIR W. HARCOURT: That is not my question.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Well, I do not know anything more about it.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is there now any officer from Ireland in charge of these police, and can the right hon. Gentleman give his name, and tell us how many officers there are left in London?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think I gave the information in my answer; but if the hon. Member will put a question on the paper I shall be very glad to answer it.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is there any officer in charge of them?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe there is.

MR. W. REDMOND: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is the fact, as reported in some quarters, that circulars have been sent to Constabulary officers all over Ireland ordering them to seek information and evidence likely to be useful to the Times?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman will put the question down in the usual course.

CRIMINAL APPEALS.

SIR JOHN SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Her Majesty's Government will grant a Return of Sentences which have been increased on appeal from one court to a higher court during Her Majesty's reign in the United Kingdom?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): Appeals in England from the decisions of magistrates to Quarter Sessions are given by Statutes which, it is believed, universally give to the Court of Appeal no power except to reverse or confirm the sentence below, and, therefore, no cases of increase or diminution of sentences can have occurred. The better opinion seems to be that the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, c. 49, Section 31 (5), does not give to the Court of Quarter Sessions the power to increase the sentence. The Return asked for cannot, therefore, be given.

SIR J. SWINBURNE: Am I to understand that there are no instances in Great Britain of sentences being increased? And will the First Lord of the Treasury be kind enough to grant me a Return showing how many sentences have been increased in Ireland on appeal during Her Majesty's reign?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon Gentleman asks us to search the Records for a period of over fifty years. That is a very serious undertaking, but if he will put down what he requires, and the information has not been already furnished to the House, I will consider if it can be granted.

THE SALT UNION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the question of the legality of the Salt Union (Limited) on the face of their own prospectus and advertisements has been referred to the Law Officers of the Crown; and, whether the Government will agree to a Committee to inquire into the subject of this and other combinations of capitalists with the avowed object of raising the price of articles of consumption?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. Gentleman appears to be of the opinion that the Salt Union is guilty of an infraction of the law. If he holds that opinion, it is perfectly open to him or to any other person in the United Kingdom to take proceedings in support of that view, but I retain the opinion I expressed a few days ago that the inevitable result of a combination to raise prices is to stimulate production and competition, which must bring down prices to a lower level than that from which they originally started. The events of the last few days furnish abundant evidence of the absolute certainty of such a result, and I have no doubt, if the hon. Gentleman lives long enough, he will see salt at a lower price than that at which it stood before the Salt Union was formed. With these views I have only to say as to a Committee, that it is for the hon. Gentleman to make out a case for any Motion he may put on the paper, and he must support it by facts and arguments which will convince the House of the necessity of such a Committee.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: The right hon. Gentleman has given a very argumentative answer to questions I have not asked him. Will he be good enough to answer the question I have put—whether the opinion of the Law Officers has been taken?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have given abundant reasons why I should not answer that question. If this combination is illegal it is open to any member of the public to take action.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: May I assume that the opinion of the Law Officers has not been taken?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. Member must not assume anything of the kind.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask whether, in the event of the combination coming under the Joint Stock Companies Act, and bearing in mind the recently decided case against raising the price of the necessaries of life, it would not be the duty of the Government to prevent the registration of such a Company?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: That is obviously a question of which I ought to have notice.

SCOTCH BILLS.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if the Government will agree to the appointment of a Standing Committee for the consideration of such Bills relating to Scotland as may by an order of the House, in each case, be referred to it?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am unable to give the hon. Member the assurance he desires, but he may be certain that if any Bills relating to Scotland are referred by order of the House to a Standing Committee, the assistance of Scotch Members in dealing with the Bills will be invited in addition to the ordinary Committee, which it is to be presumed will contain, by its original constitution, that proportion which Members for Scotland bear to the whole House.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I beg to give notice that, on an early occasion, I will call attention to the subject.

THE CARRYING OF REVOLVERS.

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I have to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government propose to take any steps to restrain the indiscriminate carrying of revolvers in public places?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The question is an extremely difficult one, but I can assure my hon. Friend it is receiving the careful consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

STEAMING IN WEAVING SHEDS.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Lancashire, N.E., Darwen): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the strong feeling among the cotton weavers in certain parts of Lancashire upon the subject of sizing and steaming in weaving sheds; and whether the Government will consent to the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the question?

MR. H. BYRON REED (Bradford, E.): Before the right hon. Gentleman answers that Question, may I supplement it by asking whether the Government will extend the inquiry asked for by the noble Lord to the question of factory inspection generally?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think my hon. Friend will see that his Question has really no relation to the Question on the paper. But while it is extremely reasonable that both Questions should be inquired into, the subjects are entirely separate. In reply to the noble Lord, I have to say the Government will consent to the appointment of a Committee, if my noble Friend will move for it.

THE WELSH LANGUAGE.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS (Merionethshire): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the published opinion of Mr. Attorney General, that the Act 27 Hen. 8, c. 26, s. 20, as amended by 50 and 51 Vic. c. 55, is in force, and that the provisions of "The Local Government Act, 1888," have not removed from the members of the County Council the obligation to carry on their proceedings in English; and, if so, whether he will introduce a Bill to repeal or modify the section of the Statute thus rendered obsolete?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: In answering a Question of the right hon. Member for East Denbighshire, I stated that Section 20 of the Act 27 Henry VIII., c. 26, was repealed, and this answer was correct as regards one edition of the Revised Statutes, but Section 17, to which reference was intended to be made, has not been repealed. The question is one that will be dealt with in the next revision of the Statutes, but I may remark that it would be a matter of serious inconvenience if the proceedings of any public body were carried on entirely in Welsh.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): May I ask whether Her Majesty's Government will take steps to repeal this Act, seeing it is practically obsolete?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have taken steps to bring it under the notice of the Statute Law Revision Commission.

THE SAMOAN CONFERENCE.

MR. WILLIAM M'ARTHUR (Cornwall, Mid. St. Austell): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can state to the House the name of the Representative of this country appointed to the Conference on Samoa shortly to be held at Berlin?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: As the date of the Conference has not yet been fixed, no appointment has been made.

THE ENGINEERS OF THE ROYAL NAVY.

GENERAL SIR WILLIAM CROSSMAN (Portsmouth): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he is aware that great dissatisfaction exists amongst the Officers of the Engineer Branch of the Royal Navy, as regards their rank and emoluments; and, whether, considering the very important duties and great responsibility now thrown upon these officers, he will appoint a Committee to inquire into the grounds of such dissatisfaction?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: I am not aware that great dissatisfaction exists among the officers of the Engineer Branch of the Royal Navy as regards their rank and emoluments, neither has any representation to that effect been made to the Admiralty through the proper channels of communication. A Committee was appointed, in 1885, on which the Engineer Branch was represented to inquire into the relative rank of the several branches of the Service, and effect was given to their recommendations. I do not propose to re-open this question by the appointment of a fresh Committee.

MATABELELAND.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, West): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, in view of the character of the concession said to have been recently granted by the Chief Lo Bengula to Messrs. Rudd and Rhodes, by which, in consideration for a sum of £1,200 a year, together with 1,000 rifles and a hundred thousand rounds of ammunition, these gentlemen are reported to have obtained sole rights of prospecting and working for minerals in a territory the size of Italy, Her Majesty's Government will take any steps to call the attention of the Chief to the disadvantages and dangers to the peace of the country incident to such a monopoly; and, whether, in the event of Her Majesty's Government extending at any future time a protectorate over the Colony now under the sphere of British influence, they will refuse to recognize the concession in question, or any similar concession that may be contrary to the interests of the Chief and people of Matabelland, and likely to lead to complications and to a breach of the peace?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: Her Majesty's Government have hitherto abstained from interfering with any concession granted by Lo Bengula, as that Chief is not under their protection, is independent, and has not, till lately, asked for advice. He has now by his messenger asked for advice, and that someone may be sent to him by the Queen. It is not clear whether he desires to have some officer permanently resident with him, or only temporarily for the special purpose of advising him upon the present state of affairs. But Her Majesty's Government are prepared to send some officer to Lo Bengula should he still desire it, and should he agree to any arrangement proposed by Her Majesty's Government in respect of such a mission. In the meantime I may state that Her Majesty's Government do not approve of that term in the concession referred to which provides for the supply of arms and ammunition, and they would advise Lo Bengula to have this altered. If at any time a Protectorate were declared at Lo Bengula's request over his territory, Her Majesty's Government would discountenance any concession containing such terms, or any concession of the kind referred to in the concluding words of the question.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Then have the Government changed their mind since they told me in answer to a similar Question that they thought this concession was to the advantage of the country?

*BARON DE WORMS: I think the hon. Member misunderstood the answer. I said the Government had not expressed an opinion either way, but the Governor of the Cape had used an expression implying that he approved the policy.

H.M.S. "SULTAN."

SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): May I ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he has received any further information with regard to Her Majesty's ship Sultan?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: I have not received any news to-day, but late last night I received a telegram informing me that the first attempt to tow the Sultan off had failed, but that they were hopeful to get her off on the next attempt.

ATTEMPTED MURDER IN IRELAND.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask whether the Chief Secretary for Ireland can give the House any information as to the attempted assassi-

I am sorry to hear that the Government have decided to postpone the discussion of the Army Estimates until after the Christmas holidays. I am sure that the House will be glad to hear from the Secretary for War on this subject.

I am sure that the House will be glad to hear from the Secretary for War on this subject. I am sure that the House will be glad to hear from the Secretary for War on this subject.

I am sure that the House will be glad to hear from the Secretary for War on this subject. I am sure that the House will be glad to hear from the Secretary for War on this subject.

I am sure that the House will be glad to hear from the Secretary for War on this subject. I am sure that the House will be glad to hear from the Secretary for War on this subject.

Mr. WILKINSON: The hon. Member making reference to the Question.

Mr. T. M. HILLY: The reason I put the Question without notice was, I thought it probable that any statement made by Mr. Geo. Wyndham is on the authority of the Chief Secretary and is backed by him.

THE ARMY ESTIMATES

THE SECRETARY FOR WAR (Mr. H. BRANDE, Lincolnshire, Horn-castle): May I by the leave of the House make an appeal to the noble Lord (Viscount Wolmer) and the hon. Member (Sir G. Campbell) who have notices on the paper to be moved upon going into Committee of Supply, to allow the House at once to go into Committee on the Army Estimates? I do not for a moment dispute the importance of the subjects raised by the notices, but, unluckily, the time at our disposal is very short, and there is a strong feeling in many quarters in favour of deferring the discussion on them until after the Christmas holidays. I am sure that the House will be glad to hear from the Secretary for War on this subject. I am sure that the House will be glad to hear from the Secretary for War on this subject.

I am sure that the House will be glad to hear from the Secretary for War on this subject. I am sure that the House will be glad to hear from the Secretary for War on this subject.

THE HON. HARRIS PETERS: I am sure that the House will be glad to hear from the Secretary for War on this subject. I am sure that the House will be glad to hear from the Secretary for War on this subject.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy): A burnt child fears the fire; but after the strong appeals that have been made to me I do not feel justified in pressing my Motion, although I hold it is necessarily preliminary to the Estimates. I hope the statement to be made by the right hon. Gentleman will shadow forth a scheme for dealing with the defences of the island as a whole.

DR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is intended to proceed with the Supplementary Estimates to-night?

MR. HANBURY (Preston): May I be allowed to put this Question? If we allow you to go into Committee, will there be opportunities for further discussion of the Estimates, instead of their being postponed for an indefinite period?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I wish to say it is the desire and intention of the Government to give an early day for the further consideration of the Army Estimates, and not to drive them off. I am afraid there is no chance of reaching the Supplementary Estimates to-night.

VISCOUNT WOLMER: Of course it is distinctly understood that a general discussion will be in order in Committee.

MR. E. STANHOPE: On the Vote for the men there is perfect liberty for a general discussion. Sometimes by favour of the House it is allowed also on a later Vote.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Before the House adjourned last year I intended to raise a discussion in reference to the Channel Islands Militia. I should not like to be excluded from raising it to-night, and, therefore, I wish to know if I shall have an opportunity of doing so? I do not, of course, want to hinder the right hon. Gentleman making his statement.

MR. E. STANHOPE: I am sorry the hon. Member did not tell me of his desire. The difficulty is that the Channel Islands Militia do not come under the War Office; but I certainly will raise no technical objection to an early discussion of that question?

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o—

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made and Question proposed,

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I do not think it would be seemly on my part if I did not offer, first of all, my hearty thanks and those of the Government to those hon. Members who have been kind enough to make way in order that we might get into Committee, and that the House might have an opportunity of hearing the full statement of the Government upon the Estimates now before the Committee. The Committee will have observed that I propose this year to revert to the old practice of explaining in the House itself the general policy of the War Office, as expressed in the Estimates of the year. The written Memorandum, which during the last two years has been published with the Estimates, though in some respects convenient, seems to have entirely failed in one important respect. Very few people read it, and throughout the year all sorts of curious mis-statements have cropped up, which a cursory perusal of the Memorandum would have immediately exposed. I have, therefore, to ask the Committee to grant me its kind indulgence if—I fear at some length—I attempt to give a comprehensive account of the work being done. It is not, indeed, to be hoped that the present Estimates will satisfy those who think they can measure progress by the amount of money spent. Some increase was and is undoubtedly necessary for causes which I shall explain. But for a large part of the improvement which our Military Forces undoubtedly require we must look not to money, but to continuous advance in organization, carried out upon a definite and well-considered plan. More than that, every Vote has been most carefully scrutinized, and every item not considered to be essential has been questioned by the Financial Department. And, secondly, it is necessary to point out that everything cannot be done at once, and that out of many services undoubtedly most important, which the fierce competition in the improvement of weapons of destruction now going on all over the world render necessary, many considerations, of which one only is economy, compel us to select the most urgent only for immediate execution. And, thirdly, I should like to say, in justice to the War Office, that our uniform policy and practice is to give the preference in every respect to the requirements of the Navy, and to postpone, if not to abandon services, if they interfere in any way with the execution of demands for the sea service. And now, Mr. Courtney, as I am anxious to explain with perfect frankness our existing state of preparation, will the Committee allow me to test it by briefly indicating the principal steps which would have to be taken on the occurrence of a grave emergency? The Militia would be at once embodied. It has been customary to give 15 days' notice, but in real difficulty they would be called up in a very much shorter time. Those assigned to garrisons could proceed at once to their destination. The Reserves would be called up. Experience has, on a former occasion, shown that many of the men presented themselves within 48 hours, and I have no reason to doubt that the bulk could be obtained in about four days. The arms necessary for the Reserve men are now being stored at the depôts, and will be stored at the points of concentration. Then the Volunteers and the Yeomanry, or such part of them as the emergency might require, would be called out. We rely, in the event of the danger being prolonged, upon half of the men being able to be present on duty at one time; but in the actual crisis not only would nearly all enrolled Volunteers be in the ranks, but they would be swelled by offers of service from many who have passed through the force. We come now to the disposition to be made of these forces. In the event of an emergency the first duty which devolves upon the Land Forces is the protection of our ports and coaling stations, and orders would be at once issued to lay down submarine mines. The military ports at home and abroad are now all provided with the necessary buildings and stores. The coaling stations and nearly all the commercial ports to be defended by submarine mines are already furnished with a large proportion of these stores, and the general result would be that almost every port selected to be defended throughout the Empire could be provided with a substantial mine defence in ten days, while a considerable amount of protection, sufficient to have a very deterrent effect on the enemy's cruisers, could be laid down in three days. The Submarine Miners for this service have already been raised in almost every case, and are composed, according to the circumstances of the port, of Royal Engineers, of Militia or Volunteer Submarine Miners, supplemented, where necessary, by native auxiliaries or by hired labour. This service alone has involved an enormous amount of preparation, and its very advanced condition justifies us in attaching great importance to it in our scheme of defence. The next step in organization is the provision of garrisons. The whole of the garrisons for our fortresses and commercial ports at home are told off.

Mr. E. Stanhope

In the latter case, they consist exclusively of Militia and Volunteers, but the total strength of these garrisons for our home ports alone amounts to no less than 124,000 men. The particular duties to be performed by each corps have been laid down by the General Officers commanding in their schemes of defence. And, among the many changes in details of administration which have been introduced, I do not think any greater improvement can be found than that which places the whole defence of the Thames under the control of a single General Officer, instead of dividing it, as has hitherto been the case, between several districts. Upon the armaments I shall have a few words to say separately. The question of providing adequate garrisons for the fortresses and coaling stations abroad has undergone the most careful consideration, and the establishment of the Army has this year been increased in order to deal with it. Every case has been considered upon its merits, and dealt with after consideration of the probable dangers to be incurred and all other circumstances affecting it. The whole garrison, which would be necessary in war time, has not been completed in cases where its reinforcement would be comparatively easy, or where the climate is such as to be dangerous to the lives of Europeans. But in others, especially the very distant stations, the garrison has been increased, and is being supplemented by native auxiliaries. This is especially the case at Hong Kong and Singapore. At Gibraltar the garrison is already sufficient; but considerable reinforcements are to be sent to Malta, where also it is hoped to raise a regiment of Militia, and hut accommodation for the increased force is in course of construction. The general policy will be pursued of utilizing native auxiliaries as far as it is possible and prudent, and so of minimizing the constant drain which is involved in maintaining a large European force in the Colonies. And I may add that, in return for the increased protection afforded, additional contributions towards the expenditure may fairly be expected from some of our Colonies. But, in attempting to facilitate and to quicken the rapid mobilization of our defensive forces in this country, we were confronted by two grave difficulties, with both of which I have endeavoured to grapple. The first was the deficiency of horses. Like every foreign country, we must rely, on the outbreak of emergency, on obtaining, as quickly as possible, a large additional supply of horses. Abroad, it is universally accomplished by requisition. And we have now, for the first time in this country, under the National Defence Act of last year, full legal powers for this purpose. But we have not stopped there. We have established a system of registration, by means of which, at a very small cost to the public, we have a list of horses on a register, which can be obtained at the shortest notice. I have before alluded to the very cordial co-operation which we have met with from many large horse owners in the Metropolis and elsewhere. Last year we took powers to register 7,000 horses, and it is satisfactory to know that a very considerable number are suitable for the Cavalry, and all broken to bit and bridle. This year we ask for a large increase of that number—no less than 14,000; and there is little doubt that in this manner, backed, if necessary, by the use of our compulsory powers, we can obtain in case of emergency even a much larger number of horses. We hope, therefore, that this primary necessity has been to a large extent overcome. But before I leave the subject of horses, as to which we are much indebted to the able and energetic action of General Ravenhill, I should like to add that the Remount Establishment is working most satisfactorily, and with marked economy. We can without difficulty obtain, within the United Kingdom, an ample supply of horses for the normal requirements of our remounts. The second of the grave difficulties to which I alluded is the excessive centralization of our stores. Partly from motives of economy, and partly because no general scheme whatever existed for the mobilization of our troops, there has been a constant attempt to crowd everything into Woolwich; and, unless a remedy had been applied, the consequences, in the event of a sudden order to call out all our available defensive forces by land and sea, must have been grave delay, if not something much worse. Decentralization is now actively going on. The places where, for convenience and rapidity of concentration, stores should be placed have now been for the most part selected. Some buildings have been acquired or adopted for the purpose; in other cases new storehouses are being built. Many of our arms and accoutrements have already been decentralized, and the work is rapidly proceeding. But we have also borne in mind the safe and economical custody of the stores. Some which from their nature are perishable or require very careful attention must be specially provided for. But the great object has been that, within the limits so imposed, the officers responsible for the various sections of our defensive forces should know what stores to ask for, and where they are to be obtained without delay, with as little reference as possible to any central authority. Into this great work of decentralization, with all its enormous mass of detail, the present Quartermaster General has thrown himself with his well-known energy and business capacity. Putting aside these preliminary difficulties, therefore, which are, I hope, in a fair way of being overcome, and are, indeed, already partially surmounted, we are at present in this position with regard to our Regular Forces. The Reserve being called up, we could put into the field at short notice for home defence a force of 80,000 Regular troops, with a proper proportion of all arms of the Service, with the exception of certain small units advisedly left to be organized on mobilization, but the machinery for creating which has been worked out under Regulations already compiled. Lists of officers to fill all the commands and Staff posts have been prepared. Any deficiency in horses, not provided under our system of registration, would be made good by requisition. Ten days should, therefore, suffice to assemble the men and horses and distribute clothes and arms. There are more than sufficient stores in hand for the requirements of this force operating at home; but until the process of decentralizing the stores is completed, I cannot accurately estimate the time required for their issue. When it is completed the issue will be exceedingly rapid, and the greater part of the operations required for mobilization would take place automatically on the order being given, without requiring instructions from headquarters. This Field Army would be at once concentrated at railway junctions or other points which have been carefully chosen, with the view of affording the greatest facility for moving the troops at a few hours' notice to any point that may be threatened. And every detail required for this operation is gradually being laid down. After providing for this Field Army, there will still remain a small force of Regular troops of all arms, together with a good many regiments of Militia, for which the same preparations are not yet complete. But they would be mobilized and utilized according to the circumstances of the particular danger that may arise. Besides these, there remains a large body of Volunteers. Part are assigned to the duties of purely local defence, the remainder, consisting of a force which at a crisis could be at least doubled in number, will be mobilized in defence of the point or points principally threatened, and especially of London. The Volunteer Infantry assigned to these duties has been formed into brigades under officers selected for military capacity and personal influence amongst their men. The system is developing itself far more rapidly than could have been hoped last year, and many of the brigades, having in the interval taken active steps to improve themselves locally, will be tested in joint operations before long. I sometimes hear it objected, "What is the use of all this force without any transport?" Well, that is one of the questions which we have thoroughly taken in hand, and our experience conclusively proves that by a simple system of registration the necessary transport can be kept in a sufficient state of readiness to be easily available in the time of emergency. We have now also 67 batteries of Volunteer Artillery with 268 guns. I have noticed a good many attempts to decry the value of these guns. Well, all I can say is that more than half of them are powerful breech-loading guns of a far heavier calibre than any invader could bring against them; and all, though not of course of the newest types, are perfectly suitable for the purpose for which they are required. The duties assigned to these brigades and batteries in the event of emergency are of the most important character. I do not think I can be accused of understating the value of the Volunteers. I have been and am doing my best within the limits created by the peculiar circumstances of the force, to organize and utilize it to the utmost extent of which it can be made capable. But its best friends will not deny that it is of unequal merit. Some battalions, I am assured by competent military critics, fully rival any Line regiment. Some batteries of Artillery are conspicuous for efficiency, and show signs of continuous improvement. But there are other corps, both of Infantry and Artillery, that undoubtedly could not be prudently manœuvred in the field against a well-trained and disciplined army. How, then, can they best be utilized for the defence of the country and of the Metropolis? This leads me to the subject of the plan which we have formed for this purpose. And, first, let me say at once that neither officially nor unofficially, neither by the officers of the Department nor by the malign influence which has been ingeniously suggested as at work, has any plan been brought before me for building permanent fortifications for the defence of London. Such a scheme is extravagant, visionary, and wholly unnecessary. Indeed, the only definite proposal of this sort of recent years which has been brought to my notice was that officially put forward by no less an authority than General Sir Andrew Clarke, who, in a Minute when Inspector General of Fortifications, which I have before me, proposed to build, besides others, four permanent fortifications for the defence of London at a cost, for three alone, of about £350,000. I am aware that that officer has subsequently modified his views: and indeed on this subject, not only is there agreement among my military advisers and the other distinguished officers who have been consulted, but there is absolute unanimity of opinion as to the principles of the scheme. Everyone hopes and thinks that our first line of defence should be strong enough to defend this country from the possibility of invasion, and the scheme now adopted is an additional security, necessary only in what may be a remote contingency. But in that contingency some part of the battle would have to be fought by troops insufficiently drilled, and from various causes inferior, not in courage or physical strength, but in knowledge and preparation, to the troops to which they would be opposed. It is, therefore, necessary to prepare and strengthen the position they would occupy, so as at once to protect the defenders and to make up for their necessary deficiencies. There are certain strategical positions round London commanding roads and railways which are essential to its defence. These have been carefully examined by our most experienced officers, and places have been marked out, where, upon the occurrence of grave emergency, certain steps, arranged in every way beforehand, could at once be taken. Every preparation will be made for enabling the work to be executed without delay. And these are the positions on which, on London being threatened, the defenders of London would in a few days be concentrated and intrenched. The House will understand that it is neither desirable nor necessary that I should enter into a detailed description. But this must be added. Almost all this work is to be left to be rapidly carried out when the emergency arises. There are, however, a few sites of specially urgent importance which we deem it essential to acquire at once. It is the intention to establish ordinary field works in the form of intrenched camps, which would form the backbone of the defensive line, and in which certain articles which would be required at the shortest notice could be stored, and where it will be possible hereafter to exercise some of the defenders in the actual place which they might have to defend. The cost of these precautions will be inconsiderable. We have hitherto been met by the owners of property affected in a reasonable and patriotic spirit; and the result will, therefore, as we hope, be that the security of the Metropolis will have been assured at a very moderate outlay and with the least possible disturbance of private interests. The negotiations are pending for these essential sites, and I have accordingly included in the Estimates a sum of £20,000. I have now stated with some frankness, but without entering into detail, the general preparations that have been made for the concentration of our forces. They may be described as incomplete. I am the first to admit their incompleteness. But when it is remembered that two years ago none of these preparations were in existence, and that neither for our Regular nor for our Auxiliary Forces was any plan in operation for making the most effective use of them in emergency, I am entitled, at least, to claim that considerable progress has been made. In the evidence before the Committee on Army Estimates there were some strong recommendations in favour of calling out the Army Reserve for some form of annual training; and, in the discussion in Committee of this House, I promised, while pointing out some of the grave difficulties to be encountered, to consider whether some partial and tentative scheme could not be adopted this year. A very close examination of the subject has led me to postpone that proposal. I found that many large employers of Reserve men, while ready to make any sacrifice at the time of national emergency, plainly intimated that anything like an annual training, which took the men away from their ordinary work, would compel them to discontinue the employment of Reserve men. I found, too, that large exemptions would be necessary. Men in the police, for instance, could not be called out; and if men in Government employ were generally exempted, the objection of private employers would naturally have been much intensified; and the feeling against employing Reserve men, which has of late years been so happily and so largely overcome, might have been increased to an extent sufficient to endanger the whole system of an Army Reserve. Perhaps the simplest form of keeping the Reserve up to the mark—which will become more important when the new rifle is issued—would be by the requirement of a certain amount of musketry practice, and it is in this direction that I hope to find a solution of what is a most difficult problem. The question is sometimes asked whether it would not be possible to put military organization to some practical test? It is suggested that an Army Corps should be mobilized without notice, and it is pointed out that a similar experiment was tried in France last year. To mobilize that Army Corps nearly 6,000 horses had to be requisitioned, and the total extra cost of the experiment was a quarter of a million sterling, and yet that took place in a limited area, within which a large proportion of the designs were quite unsettled. The whole question of the construction and mounting of heavy breech-loading ordnance was in an experimental state; and delay arose, to be aggravated by other causes for which less excuse can be made. In the case of the lighter armaments and quick-firing guns, the greater portion of the work has been done, and even with the heavier armaments good progress is being made. The remaining armaments of Hong Kong and Singapore—the delay in which has naturally given rise to indignation—ought to be completed, as they are promised, within the year; and some, indeed, of the heavy guns ought to be ready next month. At the Cape the works are being carried on by the Colonial Government; one big gun is in position, and the remaining guns for Table Bay and Simon's Bay ought to go out this year. In the case of what are technically termed the Imperial ports, at home and abroad, good progress is being made. The defences of Portsmouth, both on the land and sea side, though it would not be right for me to go into detail, have been materially strengthened during the year, and some very powerful guns have been mounted. Since last year the whole defence of the Thames has been reconsidered, and a scheme, involving larger additions of armament than had been originally intended, has been recommended by the military authorities. The necessary works are in active progress, including the remodelling of some of the existing armaments, and the present year ought to show a most substantial addition to the defences. Special attention is also being paid to Malta and Gibraltar, which, though heavily fortified, require additional guns of modern type. Here, too, great progress will be made during the present year. A good deal has been said during the year about the defences of our commercial ports. The Committee will, no doubt, recollect that I circulated last year the Report of a very able Committee which inquired into this matter with myself. The proposals of that Report were adopted in the Imperial Defence Act of last year, and are being carried out; and, in further compliance with them, I offered to certain ports that we would mount some breech-loading guns of modern type, if the localities would show a willingness to co-operate in the work of their own defence. These proposals have been criticized as inadequate. But every scheme of defence must be judged of in respect of its inadequacy to meet the particular danger to be anticipated. And I have, at least, very high naval authority for saying that guns of this description, which can be fired much more quickly than heavier guns, are—in addition to the submarine mines, protected by quick-firing guns—amply sufficient to meet the sort of attack to which these ports are liable to be subjected by the chance visit of a cruiser. For any additional defence they must rely upon our naval resources. I propose to lay upon the Table at the close of the financial year a Report from the Director General of Ordnance Factories upon the work of his Department. The magnitude of their operations will be shown by the fact that the turn-out for the year will be about two and a quarter millions in value; but there is every reason to believe that the amalgamation of all the factories under a single head is producing good results in the direction of economy and efficiency. I am unwilling to detain the Committee by dwelling upon the various branches of this work which might be of interest at the present time, and I will, therefore, only allude to one or two weapons. Since the adoption of the design for the new magazine rifle, a step, I am happy to say, characterized by complete unanimity, good progress has been made with the preparations for its manufacture. Rifles will be turned out by the Government factories at Enfield and at Birmingham, and by the trade in London and in Birmingham. The fact that all the parts of a military rifle are in this country with obvious advantage made interchangeable makes the time necessary for producing them with complete accuracy longer than it would otherwise be. But the work is being pushed steadily on, and it is satisfactory that the trials of the rifle in India, which had not completely reached us when the pattern was selected, have been in all respects very favourable to the new weapon. And in order that the two Army Corps, which will be the first to receive the rifle, may have only one sort of ammunition to carry, provision has been made in the Estimates for Maxim guns and for carbines of the same calibre. The question of the powder has been one of great difficulty and anxiety. With the first issue of the rifle compressed pellets of black powder, which have been found to possess the necessary qualities, will be used, and this will be a considerable advance upon the present state of things. But it is also confidentially believed that a chemical powder has been found in all respects suited for our purposes, and possessing what many chemical powders now being tried abroad do not possess—stability under all conditions of climate; and to us, perhaps more than to any other country, this condition is absolutely essential. By the use of this powder the power of the new rifle will be considerably augmented; but, even with the compressed black powder, it will be possible to fire it without raising a sight at a range of 500 yards. It will be sighted up to 2,800 yards. I should like to take this public opportunity of expressing our hearty thanks to the Small Arms Committee, presided over by Major General Philip Smith, who brought so much ability and perseverance to the task of choosing a magazine rifle. This very difficult work has been performed with perfect fairness towards all inventors, and has produced a rifle which promises the most satisfactory results. Further experiments with the high explosive which recently showed such destructive results at Lydd prove that it can, in various forms, be employed with perfect safety for heavy guns, and that it may probably be made available for shells for our Field Artillery guns. During the past year the examination of all the arms in the hands of the troops has been continued. New arms have been issued to the men comprised in the First Army Corps; and in the case of the remainder of the Regular Army in this country unserviceable weapons, whether rifles, carbines, swords, or bayonets, have been withdrawn. Commanding officers of regiments have been made responsible for the mode in which all arms issued to the troops under their command are kept. I should like to add that the result of the examination has conclusively proved that the work was not undertaken a day too soon. Considerable neglect in certain cases, and in others weapons deteriorated by long use or by other causes, have been discovered; and though it is even now probable that defects may occur from time to time, the chances of such failure have, at least, been enormously reduced. It will lead to better care of weapons issued, and to improvement, where necessary, of patterns. In one case, that of the swords known as of the pattern of 1885, it is admitted that the attempt to secure lightness has probably led to undue weakness in one part of the blade. Much has been said recently about swords of German and English manufacture. It is only fair to my Predecessors, who ordered swords from Solingen, to say that it has hitherto been difficult to get them in large numbers anywhere else, and that the results show that they have not failed to pass the tests imposed to any greater extent than the English swords. Now, however, we are having all our swords and bayonets made in England. Large numbers are being made at the Government Factory at Enfield. The contract with Messrs. Wilkinson is being executed in London, and two more contracts are about to be entered into, which will give the workmen in Birmingham and Sheffield full opportunity of showing the quality of their work. And now, if the Committee will pardon me for the length to which my remarks have extended, there is one other subject of grave importance as to which I shall also have some proposals to make to Parliament. They intimately concern the health and comfort of the private soldier. I do not allude to the daily ration, which was, as the Committee will perhaps recollect, referred to an independent Committee to investigate. That Committee has directed certain experiments to be made, and is not yet in a position to make a final Report. But, in the meantime, steps have been taken, in fulfilment of the pledge given by me to my hon. Friend the Member for Mr. Preston (Mr. Hanbury), to increase the supervision on the supplies of contractors, and on the mode of issue of the meat ration to the troops. But beyond this question of food there is another, even of greater importance, to which I have given special attention during the past year—I mean that of barrack accommodation. The evidence before the Select Committee on Army Estimates last year brought out very clearly the exceedingly unsatisfactory condition of our existing barracks from more than one point of view. Some of them, originally acquired for temporary purposes, have never been suitable for permanent occupation. Others are in a very bad state of repair. The huts in our great military camp at Aldershot were built of wood after the Crimean War. They were intended to last 20 years, and they are now in such a state of decay that it is with the greatest possible difficulty we can keep some of them up at all. They cost £5 a-year to keep up, and will soon be past repair. Other barracks have been erected or acquired in localities which may have been suitable to the circumstances of the moment, but which are exceedingly inconvenient for the purposes of concentration in time of emergency, because the subsequent development of our railway system has brought other centres into prominence. Some of them are situated in districts where no rifle range is obtainable, and great cost must be incurred in moving detachments to a distance for their annual practice; and, lastly, they are insufficient in accommodation. The lodging allowance to soldiers, for whom barrack accommodation has not been provided, costs no less than £250,000 a-year. These difficulties have increased and become intensified year by year. The great demands upon the Estimates, especially in the direction of new armaments, and the increasing sums necessarily required for repair of rapidly deteriorating works, have led to the gradual contraction of the sum assigned to new construction, so that we are year by year getting into a worse position. Added to this, the requirements of modern sanitation, and of modern comfort, especially in the matter of recreation rooms and gymnasiums, have helped to absorb whatever money has been available. Nor is it too much to say that the question of barrack accommodation has never been looked at as a whole. The large expenditure upon barracks authorized by the Military Forces Localization Act in 1872 was entirely directed towards the erection of the 69 dépôt centres for the establishment of the territorial system; and Mr. Cardwell strictly limited his object to the erection of barracks for this purpose. The great cost of putting all our barracks upon a proper footing—estimated before the Committee at four or five millions sterling, has naturally proved a serious obstacle. But, on the other hand, it would be hopeless, within the lifetime of the present generation, to complete such a task out of the ordinary Estimates. The reconstruction of our camps alone, if carried on upon the scale attempted during the last few years, would not be completed within that period. I approach the question, therefore, from three points of view, and first upon the ground of economy. The present system is distinctly wasteful and extravagant. A moderate capital expenditure in certain well-selected cases would largely reduce the lodging allowance, the cost of transport, and the enormous annual charge for repairs. I approach it, secondly, on the ground of military efficiency. To break up a battalion by sending it in detachments into isolated quarters is disastrous to this efficiency, while the concentration in our great military camps of larger bodies of troops would tend to their greater utility for the support of the Civil power, if required, and to their more complete preparation for times of emergency. And, lastly, it can hardly be asserted that we are justified in exposing our soldiers to the discomforts, and, in some cases, to the dangers, which prevail in some of our existing barracks. For these reasons we have examined the barrack accommodation of this country as a whole; and though the scheme of this year will not profess to deal with all parts of it, it will include the more important cases from the three points of view which I have mentioned. It will be embodied in a proposal which will shortly be presented to Parliament; and though it would not be right to detain the Committee by dwelling upon its details, I have already indicated the lines upon which we propose to work. We shall put forward no fancy schemes of reconstruction and no wild Estimates, but only such proposals as can confidently be recommended to the House as absolutely necessary, in our opinion, to remove the present grave causes of complaint, or to improve the efficiency of our Army. And now, to deal generally with the whole subject, it is true that this year we have to ask, in peace time, for a considerable increase of our Estimates. I have attempted to give the Committee a full explanation of our grounds for this demand. And this, at least, we may urge in our own support—for two years we have had no Supplementary Estimates. It proves, as I venture to urge, that we have prepared our Estimates with care and foresight, and administered the funds intrusted to us with economy and prudence. The experience of the past is an earnest for the future, and we look with confidence to the general acceptance of proposals which are, in our opinion, essential to the proper land defences of the country.

*MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): I merely rise to ask whether the scheme for new barrack accommodation which the right hon. Gentleman proposes to lay before Parliament—a scheme involving large expenditure—will be in addition to the Army Estimates of the year?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Proposals will be made to Parliament; I cannot say the amount of expenditure just now, and it is not proposed to make a charge upon the Estimates.

VISCOUNT WOLMER (Hants, Petersfield): In the remarks the Secretary for War has addressed to the Committee, the right hon. Gentleman has almost entirely confined himself to the organization and reconstruction of the military system. He has—and I imagine purposely—not gone into the question of the personnel of the Army, the Militia, or the Volunteers. With the permission of the Committee I will draw attention to a few points connected with the Militia. The Militia Force of the country occupies a very prominent part in any scheme of National defence, and its efficiency is therefore a matter of National importance. The Secretary for War must be perfectly aware the condition of the Militia is not satisfactory, although the Reports of Inspecting Officers may not, on the face of them, bear this appearance. I would say by way of preface to my remarks that I do not believe the question of the efficiency of the Militia is one of expenditure of money at all. Officers and men are perfectly well paid—it is a question of administration and properly utilizing what we already possess. In the first place I find that, according to the Returns for 1888, there were 383 vacancies in the commissioned ranks of the Militia; and, quite apart from the very serious nature of these figures, what is the actual state of military efficiency of the officers who do hold commissions in the Militia? They have a limited knowledge of drill; but I do not believe that Militia officers, as a body, are so highly skilled in military science as Volunteer officers. If I look to the Army List, I see that very few have qualified in examinations on tactics; and as for the higher branches of military training, field intrenchment, outpost duty, and the general operations of war beyond mere barrack parade movements, the Militia officers are on the whole, I believe, utterly ignorant. Now, is this a healthy state for officers of the Militia to be in? Turning from officers to men, the number of vacancies on the Establishment is even larger. At the same date, the training of 1888, there were no fewer than 17,827 wanting to complete the Establishment; that is equal to 20 strong battalions. Now, I observe, both in the Report of the Inspector General on Recruiting and in the Memorandum the right hon. Gentleman has laid before Parliament that Militia depôts are going to be revised, and it is quite obvious that that is necessary. It is absurd that the same Establishment should apply to regiments having their depôts in the great centres of population and to regiments which have their depôts in the middle of an agricultural county of large acreage and sparse population. It is quite possible that a great deal may be done in recruiting for the force by taking off the numbers in thinly populated districts and increasing the size and even the number of regiments in districts thickly populated. For example, I turn to the Annual Return for 1888 of the 3rd and 4th battalions of the Sutherland Highland Regiment. I find 266 men short in the 3rd battalion, and only 5 in the 4th battalion. What is the reason for this? The 3rd battalion is recruited in Stirlingshire, in mountainous or purely agricultural country, while the 4th battalion is recruited at Paisley, in the middle of a thickly populated district. Yet for years you have had the same estimate—800 men for each. This should not continue; the battalion with unfavourable opportunities for recruiting should not be placed in an inferior position to the town battalion. Again, speaking from some experience in this matter, I offer another suggestion for consideration. I believe a great deal can be done in agricultural counties by localizing the companies. I am speaking not from theory, but from practical knowledge of the non-commissioned officers, privates, and the permanent staff. At present there is no encouragement for what I may call camaraderie in the Service. If two lads enlist from one village, in an agricultural county, it is almost certain that they will be divided, one in one company, one in another. The Militia training is hard work for 27 days, and it would be made far more pleasant and interesting to the men if this spirit of camaraderie existed in the company. I have made inquiries of men in my own company and asked, "Why don't you bring men to join you from your own neighbourhood?" The answer is, "So we would, only we know there is no chance of a friend coming into our company, and we should not have a chance of seeing each other during training." Not only that, but very often country lads are brought into the closest proximity with town recruits, with whom they have nothing in common. Different strata of the population are tapped in the towns and in agricultural districts. The agricultural recruit will probably be a well-conducted, steady young countryman, but the town recruit will very likely be drawn from the class of "roughs." If you put these together in the same room and the same bed—because, as the Secretary for War may not be aware, in all cases where men are billeted out two sleep in one bed—it very often happens, when the country lad finds himself in the uncongenial company of the low rough, he gets disgusted, gets a sovereign any way he can and buys himself out of the Militia. You might obviate this by localizing the companies drawn from a certain circle of villages round a country town, and the roughs might form a company of their own. This is not such a bad arrangement as it might appear at first sight, for although you have the rough town element, you also get the most intelligent non-commissioned officers from town, and the one element would counteract the other. I offer this suggestion for the right hon. Gentleman's consideration. I would also ask him to look carefully into the statistics in the Report, because I think a little examination will cause him to feel a doubt whether the non-efficiency is not entirely caused by want of zeal or capacity on the part of some of our public servants. If he will turn to the record of the two battalions of the Rifle Brigade—the 5th and 7th—he will see that the 5th battalion has only 13 men wanted to complete it, while the 7th wants 114 men. Yet both these battalions are Tower Hamlets Militia, the one wanting 13 men for completion having its headquarters in Victoria Square, the other in Dalston. How is this to be explained? If you turn to the figures and make a similar comparison in the matter of absenteeism, you find that the total number in 1888 was 9,084. These are not the men who receive their 10s. on recruiting and never return; they have gone through their 56 days' training and have cost the country £10 a head, and the amount lost—clean gone, thrown away—is nearly £100,000. I know this question of absenteeism has received much attention, and underlying it is the question of how far want of supervision by officials is responsible. Here are three counties side by side—Hampshire, Dorsetshire, and Wiltshire—and you find the absenteeism is in Wiltshire 646, Dorsetshire 544, and in Hampshire 133, in a battalion of 1,093. My explanation is this—in the first place, the getting a sufficient number of men, and seeing they are of the right class, depends upon the zeal and capability of the recruiting officers, but much also depends upon the adjutant, who often looks upon the appointment as a good shunt, from which he looks forward to four weeks' hard work and eleven months' hunting and shooting. The result is, we have a deficiency of 17,000, and absentees nearly 10,000. I believe a really efficient adjutant could reduce the percentage of absenteeism to a minimum. My complaint is, there is no difference made at the Horse Guards between the zealous and the careless officer. Whether an officer does or does not bring up his regiment to a state of efficiency, saving the country money and producing an efficient fighting force, seniority on the roster is only taken into account, and it often happens that the incompetent officer gets promotion sooner than the zealous, hard-working man. Some thing should be done to give encouragement to the latter, and this is a matter well worth looking into at the Horse Guards. All these matters, which, after all, are vital to the Service, are supposed to be looked into at the annual inspection. But what is this? The General Officer comes down, the regiment is put through a series of absolutely useless parade movements, and whatever the regiment does, everybody is complimented on the performance, the General Officer goes to lunch with the regimental officers, then he goes through a perfunctory examination of the books, and all agree there never was a finer regiment. Perhaps he remarks in conversation, "I hope you have not many absentees?" The Colonel replies, "Well, it is a most extraordinary thing, but there are so many." "Dear me. Well, I hope you will not have so many next year." But never is any inquiry made why there are so many absentees. One of the precautions provided by the War Office against absenteeism is to require any man of doubtful appearance to produce a character. Well, I have looked through many of these and found them most transparent forgeries. Is it conceivable that a proper system should allow such things to go on? I would respectfully press this question of the Militia, as one not of money, but of administration, and I would urge the right hon. Gentleman to appoint a Committee to inquire into these regulations and the manner in which they are carried out, to revise the system of training, and generally to look into the system of Militia administration, and I believe, if the subject were dealt with with that ability with which the field exercises for the Army were recently laid down, there would certainly be a great gain to the country. Now, a word on the training of the men, because, after all, that is the way to make them efficient in a short period. I say nothing of the equipment, though that is not all that might be desired. I say nothing about the absolute want of Commissariat or Medical Staff required to make the Militia an efficient force. What I would draw attention to is the training, and I am bound to say a great deal of the 27 days is lost time. A competent committee should decide exactly what is to be done in the 27 days, and everything not of the first importance should be omitted. I am quite certain that if this were looked at by some of the officers who drew up the "Field Exercises" recently brought out, very great changes would be made in the training. There is a general instruction that almost all the drill book should be turned through in 27 days, but no planning at how to get the best results from the time at disposal. To nothing does this apply so much as to musketry. What is the use of a militiaman who has never fired a shot in his life? Yet in the figures for 1887 I find 5,000 who never handled a rifle, and 7,000 supposed to be trained had never been near a target. I make these suggestions which, if I had had the opportunity, I would have made the subject of a Motion. I have touched on various matters of organization and administration but slightly, but if they were gone into by a competent committee I am sure valuable results would follow the inquiry.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL (Paddington, S): I think the noble Lord will admit that it would be hardly fair to the Secretary of State, after the very interesting statement he has made, to allow the attention of the Committee to be diverted to a question, no doubt of great importance, but more suitable to the Militia Vote than to a general discussion on the Army. I would not have ventured to take part in the discussion had it not been that, having been a member of the Committee which sat on Army matters, I had certain opportunities of making myself acquainted with questions which unfortunately were not open to many Members of that House, but which are of great value for the purpose of obtaining knowledge as to the manner in which War Office matters are conducted. In commencing my remarks I have great pleasure in expressing my own opinion, and I think that of nearly every one present, as to the extremely satisfactory character of the statement made by the Secretary of State on the Army Estimates. I have listened to similar statements since I have been in Parliament, but never to one more interesting than that with which the Committee has been favoured, or on the whole more satisfactory. It is perfectly clear to me that the War Office have been exceptionally energetic in the last year, and that they have done their very best to organize and utilize all the resources and forces at their disposal; and I think the Secretary of State would be inclined to admit that his hands in all this work have been greatly strengthened by the proceedings of the Committee of last Session and the year before. That Committee brought to bear not only Parliamentary influence but public opinion upon the somewhat rusty machinery of the War Office, and now we see in the evident signs of activity and originality in the proceedings of the War Office the effect of the pressure of that Committee upon public opinion. I gather that the Government do not intend to reappoint the Committee on the Army Estimates this Session. I do not complain of that; I think the Committee went as far as it is possible for a Committee to go, and that it would be detrimental perhaps to departmental efficiency if the Committee were to be reappointed. All I would say is that if we are not to have a Committee, I hope the Government will provide, with regard to the Army and Navy Estimates, that there shall be a regular and continuous discussion in the House of Commons, and that the House will not be satisfied with merely this night's debate and then forget all Army questions, but that the Government will initiate, and the House carry on and conclude, full and regular discussions on these subjects before the Session has reached a very advanced stage. I desire to say a word now on a scheme which I believe I was the first to suggest—namely, the practice of the Secretary of State for War issuing to Parliament a prefatory memorandum before the annual presentation of the Estimates, containing a general review of Army affairs, which used formerly to be left solely to the speech of the Minister. The Secretary of State appears to intimate that he does not much admire this new practice, and that it may be discontinued. I hope it will not. I myself attach the greatest importance to this memorandum, which binds the Department more than any speech, which is readily acceptable, which can be more easily referred to than the pages of Hansard, and from which there can be no escape on the ground of omissions or mis-reports.

Therefore, I venture to express the opinion, that much the right hon. Gentleman told us to-night might have been conveniently embodied in a memorandum similar to that which was issued last year. The Estimates show an increase of expenditure, but, though I deplore an increase of expenditure on armaments, justice and common sense compel me to admit that this increase could not be avoided, being due mainly to the increased provision for colonial garrisons, and to the re-arming of our troops with the new rifle. The policy of fortifying our stations abroad was adopted by Parliament—perhaps somewhat lightly—a few years ago, and the increase of the garrisons now proposed is only part of the same policy. It is therefore impossible for any Member to quarrel with the increased expenditure proposed for the purpose, seeing that the policy is one which was deliberately adopted by Parliament. As to the new rifle, that was inevitable. It is only to be regretted that the War Office have been so very deliberate about it. I do not think there is any economy in postponing what must be done, and it would have been better for the country and for the Army if the decision with regard to the new rifle could have been come to earlier. Against this increase, however, I am willing to give the War Department credit for the disappearance during the past two years of Supplementary Estimates, and I hope they will never again reappear, save in the case of emergencies which could not have been foreseen. The Secretary of State omitted from his speech certain subjects on which I imagine the Committee would like to have information. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the provisions made for the defence of our ports at home by means of submarine mines, and plans for having 80,000 men in readiness for the defence of any point that might be attacked. I presume that he means militia and regulars combined?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: No; regulars alone.

LORD R. CHURCHILL: It is a point to be considered how far the right hon. Gentleman is strengthening the hands of his colleague at the head of the Admiralty by this statement, for our means of defence on land must, of course, have some bearing on the regulation of our naval force. What I desire to point out is that the right hon. Gentleman has omitted to mention whether these 80,000 men are to be in addition to the two Army Corps to which in last year's statement the right hon. Gentleman devoted the main portion of his memorandum. I should like to know whether these two Army Corps are in existence ready to be mobilized for the use of the country, and available to be sent wherever they may be wanted at reasonably short notice, and also whether, besides these two Army Corps and these 80,000 men, provision is also made for reinforcements in India in the event of India requiring military reinforcements. These are points which require elucidation if the Committee is to be placed in possession of what is our full military strength. Then there is another subject upon which the Secretary of State did not say much—namely, the provision of new Artillery for the Forces in the field. I should be glad to learn to what extent the Artillery is being armed with the new 12-pounder field gun.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I stated that before long there will be 45 batteries armed with this gun.

LORD R. CHURCHILL: Then I will leave that subject, apologising for my mistake, and I will go to another question of the greatest importance of all, namely, the supply of Heavy Ordnance. The First Lord of the Admiralty, the other night, stated that steps had been taken, in conjunction with the War Office, to remove what has been called the block in the supply of guns. This is a satisfactory statement; but it would be more satisfactory if we could be told exactly what these steps are. I think the Secretary of State has informed the House, on more than one occasion, that he has taken a new departure, and that he is now relying less upon Woolwich and more upon other sources.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I mentioned that we had entered into contracts with four firms.

AN HON. MEMBER: Give their names.

LORD R. CHURCHILL: I think this is a matter upon which the Secretary of State should supply the Committee with a little more information. I think the Committee are entitled to receive a full and clear statement as to what steps the War Office have taken in regard to the supply of guns, and generally, what are the sources to which we can look for supplying the country with such guns as we may require. I now come to another matter, which is also a matter of great importance, and upon which the Secretary of State touched towards the conclusion of his remarks—namely, the important subject of barrack accommodation. After hearing the evidence given before the Committee that sat some time ago—especially that of Sir Lothian Nicholson, the Inspector-General of Fortifications and Barracks—I am convinced that the House of Commons must be prepared for a large expenditure in the provision of better barrack accommodation. Most of the present accommodation is insanitary, detrimental to the health, and certainly, in a still greater degree, to the comfort of the troops. Many barracks are in such bad repair that it would be almost more economical to rebuild them. By far the most advisable plan would be to build large barracks in central places, where troops could be congregated together, instead of barracks dotted all over the country. This would be far more economical, and the facilities of railway communication obviate any objections that might otherwise be urged as to the necessity of military force being available to support local authority. I do not know what the demands of the Secretary of State may be. Sir Lothian Nicholson estimates the cost at four or five millions; but my own advice to the right hon. Gentleman would be to be bold and frank with the House of Commons, and make such a demand as would give a guarantee that the question would be dealt with in such a manner that it would not have to be taken in hand again largely for one generation or even two. Though I deprecate all expenditure which is in any degree unnecessary, I have never opposed and never will oppose wise expenditure, and I am certain that an improvement of the barrack accommodation of the British Army is absolutely required, and would be productive, if wisely carried out, of very great economy. There is only one further remark which I desire to make. I recollect an observation which was made by the right hon. Gentleman about eighteen months ago, that by a Royal

Warrant he had thrown on the military authorities the duty of preparing the Estimates for the year. I want now to ask the Secretary of State whether Estimates have been prepared by the military authorities, for which they may be held responsible, and which they consider necessary to secure the efficiency of the Army and the safety of the country, because, if so, it marks a reform in our War Office administration for which I have long been anxious—a reform, namely, in the direction of throwing financial responsibility on the professional heads of the Army. I hope that on that point also, the Secretary of State will deal frankly with the Committee, and subject to that interrogatory and the remarks I have made, I have again to tender to my right hon. Friend my hearty congratulations on the satisfactory statement he has made.

*SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I listened to the noble Lord, as I always do, with great pleasure; but I witnessed his sitting down with some dismay, because I thought we should have got some sort of a speech from him of a different nature from that with which he has favoured the Committee. I will tell the noble Lord why. The noble Lord expressed satisfaction with the policy of the Government, and, in one respect, I cordially endorse that remark. I agree with the noble Lord that, taking our military organization and our system as it is, there never was a time when the work of the War Office was done more intelligently or more strenuously; but in another point I cannot agree with the satisfaction the noble Lord has expressed. As an economist, the noble Lord was very much dissatisfied with the Estimates last year.

LORD R. CHURCHILL: In what respect?

*SIR G. TREVELYAN: I remember some remarks of the noble Lord with regard to the provision for two Army Corps at an enormous expenditure. With those remarks I thoroughly agree; and it is most important that every one who reads the speech of the Secretary of State should see to what a point of expenditure we are rapidly going, apparently to the satisfaction of everybody concerned. With some of the causes of increase I thoroughly agree; but I wish to point out that the system under which our Army is conducted is such that an extremely able staff of administrators at the War Office, adding very few men to our fighting strength, are obliged to increase our Army Estimates from £16,000,000 to £16,700,000. The noble Lord said last year that for this gigantic expenditure we only got two Army Corps that could be sent on foreign service; and he asks why we have heard no more of those two Army Corps. Personally, I am very glad that the Committee have heard nothing more of them; for I believe the enormous disproportion of result and expenditure on our Army is derived from the fact that our military organization under the right hon. Gentleman and all his Predecessors has been laid down on false lines—that is, the idea that the military necessities are of the same nature now as they were 70 or 80 years ago, when we could throw 30,000 to 40,000 men on to the Continent, who might really turn the tide of war, whereas now, I believe, our true policy is boldly to recognize the impossibility of our ever again placing Army Corps in line with the great Continental armies, and to apply the ability of our administrators to moulding together all the branches of our Army, the Militia, and Volunteers for the purposes of home defence, the defence of India, and our maritime Colonies. Just see what is the result of what we are doing now. These Estimates amount to £16,700,000. I take off £2,000,000, as representing the cost of the Volunteers and the Militia, and that is making a very large deduction. I am willing to take off whatever the right hon. Gentleman wishes, but I find that, even with that large reduction, we are brought face to face with the remarkable fact that, for an expenditure of £14,000,000 a year, we can only place in the field of battle in our own country 80,000 Regular troops.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: No, no.

*SIR G. TREVELYAN: The right hon. Gentleman told us that those 80,000 would be composed of Regulars alone, and I want to know what force we can place in time of battle. Foreign countries, such as France and Germany, with Estimates hardly larger than our own, could place 500,000 in the field, at the very least. I presume that the 80,000 includes the Army Reserve, with the Garrisons, but I do not know whether it also includes the Militia Reserve. That, however, is a very important point. If it does, I must call the attention of the Committee to the state which we are in at the present moment. It means that we must in time of crisis take 30,000 men from the Militia, which would ruin it as a fighting force. I believe that the military authorities drifted from the true military system when they amalgamated the English and the Indian Armies. There never can be a proper military system until there is an Army for home defence, an Army of short service, an Army which would always remain inside the country—every man of it. If the home and the foreign Army are divided, it will be possible to deal with the great question of the difference between the two great classes of men who desire to join the Army. In old days, the Indian Government had never any difficulty in getting recruits. They appealed to that peculiar and numerous class of men who wished permanently to take up a military career, and not to stop at home in their native villages. But there is the still more numerous class who have a taste for a little drill, and who would join the Army if they could leave at the end of three years, and might rely on not having to leave the country for unhealthy climates. From these classes may be provided an Indian and Colonial Army of professional soldiers and a home Army of citizen soldiers. If there were behind these the Militia Reserve and the Volunteers, dangers from an invader would be at an end. It would be the invader who would have to be pitied. Let us have two Armies, so that we may know how many men we can rely upon in each quarter of the globe, and then our Army will be on that natural footing from which alone some large economy can be hoped for. In addition to that, we shall feel that if the first line of defence—the Navy—is broken, we shall be in a good position to meet an invader. Now, I was much disappointed that economy did not form the subject of a very large part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech. Let no one think that there are not economies to be made in the Army. I watched the Committee which sat on the Army Estimates with the greatest interest as an Army reformer of 20 years' standing, and I found, to my great delight, that more progress was made in six months by means of the exertions of that Committee than had been made in the 20 years previous. But although on a most important point the Committee had come to a most important conclusion, nothing of it has been heard from the right hon. Gentleman. I have never been in the War Office, but from my long experience in the Admiralty I know perfectly well that economies cannot be suggested from the outside, but must be made from the inside. [Lord R. CHURCHILL: Hear, hear!] But the removal of one tremendous abuse, unparalleled in any other service in the world, can be suggested from the outside. On pages 96 and 97 of the Estimates it will be found that the list of active generals eligible for employment is 151, whereas the number of generals actually employed is 83. In a well-organized service rank ought to mean employment; unless that is the case the service cannot be in a healthy condition. The Committee reported that the present state of things should be put a stop to; but more important than the Report of the Committee was the evidence given before it. In his defence of the system His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge admitted that in Germany there was a much larger Army, and there were comparatively few generals unemployed. "But," he added—

"in Germany every two regiments of cavalry have a brigadier, every two regiments of infantry have a brigadier, and every four regiments of infantry have a general of division, so that they can employ many more than we can."

This sounds well; but we must remember that a German regiment consists of three battalions. Does anyone believe that if we had six English battalions employed on active service there would not be a brigadier to command them; or if there were 12 English battalions employed on active service there would not be a general of division to command them? His Royal Highness continued—

"Our armies go all over the world, and climate has a good deal to do with it. If you send a man abroad upon a foreign station he breaks down in health very soon in some cases, so that you must have a large number (of generals) for all requirements, taking into account India, the tropics, and the Colonies."

Warrant he had thrown on the military authorities the duty of preparing the Estimates for the year. I want now to ask the Secretary of State whether Estimates have been prepared by the military authorities, for which they may be held responsible, and which they consider necessary to secure the efficiency of the Army and the safety of the country, because, if so, it marks a reform in our War Office administration for which I have long been anxious—a reform, namely, in the direction of throwing financial responsibility on the professional heads of the Army. me a direct question, he asks whether they are the Estimates of the military authorities, or my own. I answer him equally directly, and say they are the Estimates of the Government not of the military authorities. The military authorities, according to the rule now in force, have submitted to me what they thought would be necessary for the services of the year; but I do not at all wish to shrink from my responsibility. This year we have had what appeared to be special opportunities for considering these Estimates and of satisfying all demands. A Committee of the Cabinet specially charged with the examination of the question has been sitting out the winter, and I can safely say that every representation made by the military authority has been thoroughly examined by myself and my colleagues, and the result is that the Estimates we present proceed from the joint authority of the Government, and are what we believe essential for the defence of the country. Then my noble Friend asks me as to the two Army Corps for Foreign Service. Well, I have certainly not desired to dwell on that point to-day, because the point to which I have specially directed attention during the past year has been the organization of the Army for home defence. Of course I do not ignore, and have not forgotten, the necessity that might arise for sending a portion of that Army abroad, but I admit frankly and freely to the Committee that our preparations for this purpose are not so forward as those in relation to home defence. I fully admit the importance of the point raised, but my attention has been specially directed to making the Army thoroughly efficient for home defence. I have not lost sight of the other question, though I fully admit that we could not without delay, I will not say considerable delay, but a delay longer than I care to contemplate send two Army Corps on foreign service. Then I am asked as to what has been done in reference to guns to remove the block there has been on the supply. We have thoroughly examined this matter, and we have satisfied ourselves that by the new arrangements made, and about to be made, we can provide against this block and enable guns to be supplied for both the Army and Navy without any inadequate delay, and with a certain punctuality for land and sea service. Of course the noble Lord does not wish me to refer to the special conditions of contract.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Are they not known?

*MR. STANHOPE: Not yet. The Committee will understand my reluctance to offer special encouragement to any one firm, and I may say that we require specific assurance before we accept all that is said in respect to offers. But I think on reviewing the whole position the difficulty is removed. Guns are coming in steadily and well, and throughout the course of the year they will be coming in in increasing numbers. Even the guns asked for in the near Naval Programme are insignificant in number compared with the total number to be provided for the land and sea services. I think it has been mentioned that the number is only 58 big guns required for the sea service.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: No; but I do not think that is a very large proportion—it is equal, I am told, to another eighth. But it is not a very formidable programme; the only formidable matter was the production of the very large guns and this we are prepared to meet. We understand what the gun-producing power of the country is not only in the Government factories, but by private firms, and we are convinced of our ability to provide the whole of the guns required for the Navy within the time laid down by my noble Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty. I don't think I need detain the Committee any longer just now.

*MR. PICTON (Leicester): I think it is only right that the attention of the Committee should be invited to a point of view different to any yet taken, and which, perhaps, will scarcely commend itself to the sympathies of the majority in the House. I had hoped that the noble Lord, the Member for Paddington, would have assumed a more critical tone than he has thought proper to adopt. I was one of those who sat on the Committee under his able presidency. Surely he cannot have forgotten the portentous facts that were brought before us in evidence, some, indeed, he has alluded to. He cannot have forgotten how we learned that for a cost very little exceeding what we are called upon to pay the Empire of Germany is enabled to put three-quarters of a million of men into the field; that under the German system no man is ever appointed to the position of general until he has a general's work to do and can do it; that our paymaster system is most extravagant; nor can he have forgotten the grave defects in our Intelligence Department, which is nearly starved. There are more materials in the evidence than have been made use of, and I think the noble Lord would have done good service if he had pressed these points on the attention of the Government. But I am not going to dwell on these details. I listened to both statements made by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stanhope), and they were both marked with ability; but I must honestly say I liked the second and shorter speech better than the former and more elaborate speech. In it he showed himself more decidedly the advocate of administrative reform, which we know him to be. I am rejoiced to find that he hopes to bring before the House in a short time a scheme for a reduction of that intolerable surplus of General Officers under which we groan. I only wish that he had added that he could see his way to adopt a system, which I believe obtains everywhere else that no one shall be appointed to the position of general until there is a general's work for him to do. The more laborious statement of the right hon. Gentleman lacked nothing in clearness or interest, and I am glad to join with others in admiration of its ability—business-like it undoubtedly was, but I think it was somewhat cold and unfeeling when we think of the dreadful preparations with which he was dealing. I believe we shall never deal rightly or fairly with the dreadful business of war until everyone who has to bring forward any proposal for increased armaments shows that he personally regards such a necessity with pain and even horror, and regrets the misappropriation and waste of the resources of the nation. The right hon. Gentleman, in defence of the increase he proposes, alluded, among other things, to the fierce competition going on among the nations of the world. But what have we to do with this fierce competition? They are competing for nothing which we have the right to keep, or for our Possessions. [An hon. MEMBER: Yes.] They will not meddle with us if we meddle not with them. If we show ourselves antagonistic to their natural aspirations or are determined to meddle with their intrigues one with the other, of course they will take revenge by showing us they can do us damage in some remote quarter of the Queen's dominions; but apart from that what foreign Power desires to compete for any of our Possessions? I contend we have nothing to do with the fierce competition going on among the nations of the world. We ought to stand absolutely apart, serene and secure on our own peaceful policy and sound commercial doctrine. Our position should be like that of the United States, whose people have better sense than to waste their wealth on preparations that may never be needed. The increase the right hon. Gentleman proposes I am prepared to dispute, and I shall take a division on it. From the way in which the right hon. Gentleman spoke we might imagine ourselves on the eve of a great European war. He talked of arrangements to meet great emergencies, of the possibilities of invasion, and the necessity of defending London by field works. But I see nothing in the state of the world affecting us to justify such a tone; and I am afraid speech and action such as this tends to make peace less secure. The right hon. Gentleman assured us that forts would not be necessary for the defence of the Metropolis, and I am glad to hear that. But he went on to say that field works might be necessary, and the land, to enable such to be readily thrown up, would cost £20,000. Now, is not the use of money in such a way absolute waste? Who, in the case of actual invasion, would question that any Government would be absolutely justified in taking any land required for such a purpose? But it is a far-off and almost impossible contingency. What excitement, grumbling, and denunciation there often is if a School Board in a large town proposes to spend £20,000 on a school building; but here is money to be devoted to the preparation for shedding blood, and no one seems to complain about it. I know this sort of thing is, to a certain extent, popular, and I much regret it. How-the officers' horses and chargers, and amongst the "casualties" I have referred to I include the men who have to be instructed in various classes, and these I put down at 25 per day. I knock off 5 per cent to cover the sick list; the number wanting to complete 1 per cent; cooks, 11; men for officers and sergeants' mess, 5; canteen, 2; barrack police, 2; guard, 4; staff sergeants, 6; tradesmen, 8; orderlies, 2; riding establishment, 11. I reckon that altogether there are 245 men who do not require a horse to ride on any given day. Well, subtracting these 245 men from 670, it leaves 425 men for whom I suggest there should be an establishment of 470 horses. It may now be asked, "Why, after what you have said, provide more horses than are necessary for the men to ride?" The answer to that is that 50 is a very moderate number of horses to provide for casualties, which must always occur amongst horses. Some horses will be sick, some will be kicked, and about 25 are, generally speaking, throughout the year what we call young horses in training. So far as regards the establishment of the regiments I may be told we have a reserve. Well, I know we have a reserve, but speaking from my own experience on the matter, this reserve is a delusion and a snare. Men serve in a cavalry regiment for four or five years, when they pass into civil life. When they have ceased to be soldiers they take what employment they can get, and that is, mostly, situations as drivers, or situations in which they have to do with horses, but very few of them ever have to get outside a horse, and the consequence is that they very soon lose their riding and become stiff, and though they may be retrained yet they would not be fit for immediate service in any campaign. The Germans acknowledge this thoroughly, and have a cavalry reserve, as we have, but they do not reckon on that as available in any occurring campaign. They send them to the cavalry depôts to be retrained in the event of a war lasting more than a year. My object in this matter is to serve the interests of the cavalry and the nation, and in conclusion I repeat again that I believe—nay, I know I am positive—that this nation would be far better served by having 15 regiments always effective and ready with full strength for war than by having seven regiments not really fit and 12 regiments not only not really fit, but which could not possibly be made fit in time for any sudden emergency.

*MR. KENRICK (Birmingham, N): Being a civilian. I do not propose to go into questions affecting the Army and its administration in any detail; but there is one point upon which, I think, I may be allowed to speak, and upon which I think I may ask for an announcement of principle from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. Before I come to that, however, I desire to congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on what I understand to be the prospective arrangement as to the Volunteers. I have always regarded the Volunteers as a very useful force, and one not made so much of as it might be; but I admit that it must always be considered as an ineffective force until it is mobilized and has its transport and commissariat. As I understand the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State, his proposition, in future, is to mobilize the Volunteer Force; and, if that be so, I congratulate him on turning this valuable arm, from an arm not thoroughly effective, into a comparatively effective one. The point I wish more particularly to deal with is as to the supply of warlike stores, and I am glad to find the Secretary of State for War sees the advantage of having a number of manufacturers for the supply of the new magazine rifle in this country. He is now drawing very largely from the Royal factory at Enfield, from the Royal factory at Birmingham, and he is also drawing from the private factories of Birmingham and London, and he says he does not find these means of obtaining the rifle too many for the supply he requires. Then he laid down a principle with regard to swords and bayonets, which appears to me, in connection with the Army, to be a sound principle. There are two principles upon which you may obtain a supply of any material you want, warlike or otherwise, and one is the economical one of going to the cheapest market, regardless of any other circumstance, and the other is the one now to be laid down, I understand—namely, that with regard to warlike stores, reliance shall be placed upon British labour to supply the needs of the country, and that we shall not go outside the British Empire to give contracts to foreign nations. Well, if that is the principle to be relied on, what I have to say is that it should be carried out to its logical conclusion, and that we should no longer go to Solingen for sword-blades or bayonets. I do not blame the right hon. Gentleman for going to Solingen in the past, for it has been necessary to do so. I have taken trouble to inquire into the matter, and I find that the number of swords required in ordinary times by Her Majesty's Government has been so few that their supply would not have kept one sword forger in any one factory in Birmingham in full work. All orders hitherto, it seems, had been sent, I do not say to Solingen, but to London sword cutlers, who themselves imported the blades from Germany and fitted them with handles. Our patriotic officers in the Army and Volunteer Forces have apparently been under the impression that they have been buying English swords when, as a matter of fact, they have been purchasing German weapons fitted with English handles. I am glad, however, to hear in the interests of what I may even call the security and safety of the State that in future the Government intend to encourage manufacturers to manufacture these warlike arms and stores within the United Kingdom. But it seems to me that in the first endeavour to do this, they have not been altogether successful. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War referred to the contract given to Messrs. Wilkinson, of London, but we know now, owing to a question put in this House, that there are no such persons as Messrs. Wilkinson, but that the firm trading under that name have a branch at Solingen, and that they employ German artizans in this country. The impression amongst the English artizans engaged in the cutlery trade is that all these sword bayonets ordered by the Government are being imported from Germany though supplied by what purports to be an English firm. If this is the case, I contend that it would be much better to send the order direct to Germany, as in that case the action of the Government would not give rise to false expectations, and so avoid the sense of injury which in some instances the working classes labour under in this country at present. I maintain that it is desirable that there should not be the shadow of a shade of an excuse for jealousy in these matters. There is an impression that in high quarters in the Army there is a prejudice in favour of German arms. ["No, no."] Well, I do not say that that is the fact, I only say that such an impression exists. It is unfortunate that while the Government are professing to act on the principle that these warlike stores shall be manufactured in England, there is some doubt, after all, as to whether they are not manufactured in and exported from Germany. I hope the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War will be able to set this doubt at rest. I can assure him that it has caused a good deal of apprehension and irritation not only in the constituency I have the honour to represent, but also amongst the workmen generally throughout the country.

CAPTAIN SELWYN (Cambridge, Wisbeach): I am glad that good progress has been made in the preparation of the plant for the manufacture of these new magazine rifles. I would venture to ask whether we may expect to get a supply of these rifles soon and also whether the cavalry may expect to get their carbines at the same time? I do not want to press the question, as we shall have other opportunities of doing so, but if we are informed how soon these rifles will be forthcoming and how much each rifle is to cost, those who are interested in this question will know better what course to take when we come to vote upon this particular part of the Estimates.

*MR. ROUND (Essex, N.E., Harwich): I do not agree with the remarks of the hon. Gentleman opposite who a short time ago said that an increased Vote for the army is always popular in this House, or even in this country. In my opinion the only reason we vote increased supplies is because they are necessary, and no Government would be worthy of the name if it proposed a Vote for the increase of the Army on any other ground. I was glad to hear the remarks of the noble Lord opposite with regard to the Militia. As an old Militiaman, I trust that the points urged by the noble Lord on the Secretary for War will not be lost sight of. I do not think the noble Lord gave sufficient credit for the improvement in Militia officers, for I think there has been a great and marked improvement in the condition of the men and the efficiency of their officers during the past 20 years. With regard to the prevalence of absenteeism in a number of regiments at the present time, I am of opinion that stricter inquiry should be made into the characters of recruits when they come up for enlistment. I am specially grateful to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War for his proposals to improve the barrack accommodation in some parts of the country. The principal military centre in the county which I have the honour to represent, is Colchester, where there are excellent cavalry and artillery barracks, and very good quarters for the married men; but where the infantry huts, which have to accommodate a very large number of men, are of a very inferior description. They were built, I believe, before or during the progress of the Crimean war, for the reception of the Belgian Legion, and were only intended to last a short time, being made of wood; but from that day to this they have never been properly reconstructed, though, no doubt, the expense of merely repairing them has been enormous. I sincerely hope that Colchester will not be forgotten when the time comes for the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State to carry out his plans.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I am glad to see the Financial Secretary to the Treasury present, for he was one of the most regular attendants at the Committee on the Army Estimates, presided over by the noble Lord the Member for Paddington. The Secretary of State for War stated on the question of guns, that there were, besides the Government Departments, three large factories, which supplied those guns, and four large firms which supplied the steel of which those guns were made. Could the names of those firms be supplied to us, and could the Secretary of State for War announce to us on what principle those factories have been selected? I think it will be in the recollection of the Financial Secretary that in the debate which we had last year I said that all this raw material should be put up to open contract as far as possible. I do not complain of guns—or parts of guns—being put out to private business firms; but I think it would be well if the Secretary of State would throw these contracts open to public competition, so that any one who likes may come forward. It is extremely necessary that manufacturers should be encouraged when a new system of manufacture is about to be entered upon; but very great care should be taken in deciding what firms should be encouraged, and the amount of orders to be given out ought to be definitely stated. If not, considerable trouble is likely to arise. I remember that about seven or eight years ago the then Secretary of State for War entered into arrangements with certain manufacturers for the supply of steel for Woolwich Arsenal, and he gave encouragement to certain men. I pointed out what a dangerous course he was entering on, and the results justified my warning, for there subsequently appeared to be an uncertainty as to who had actually been encouraged to put up new machinery, and subsequently the Secretary for War pleaded in this House that he was, in consequence of the claims of these firms, obliged to give them contracts. I think the present Secretary for War should, therefore, be very careful whom he encourages to put up machinery for the production of these guns, and he should make it clear to them what amount of orders firms putting up machinery are likely to have, so that they may re-imburse themselves, and future Secretaries of War need not be hampered by their claims. I come next to the question of the inspection of warlike stores. The result, the Committee will remember, of the deliberations of Lord Morley's Committee was to institute a fresh system of inspection. Now the public mind has been much moved of late by the reports as to bad swords and bad bayonets. But I never paid much attention to these reports, because I hold that swords and bayonets are not likely to be such important factors in the battle fields of the future as they have been in those of the past. I hold that the proper construction of the rifle is a thousand times more important. I think that our present system of inspection is dangerous. With regard to the inspection of warlike stores, the Secretary of State informed me some time ago that we must not hope to get cheaper stores, on account of the system of inspection which has been adopted; and I saw in a paper the other day that considerable confusion has been caused by the rejection of stores by the inspectors. It is quite possible that the want of knowledge on the part of the inspectors, combined with too much zeal, may lead to difficulties; and, of course, if inspectors are over strict and condemn too many articles, the prices of stores will run up. Bad articles should not be passed, but there is a danger to be guarded against in the other direction, and I think the authorities should see to it that these inspections are not carried out with too much zeal. In regard to the field guns I differ from the view of the Director General of Artillery as to the necessity of getting new batteries complete, with guns, carriages, and waggons all new, when a new gun is adopted. I think that is doubtful economy; and I hold it would be sufficient to get the new guns and gun carriages as quickly as possible, and deal with the question of the waggons afterwards. With regard to the smaller, but not less important, question of the rifles, I think the Secretary of State for War might have given a more definite statement. For instance, I should like to know a little more about the allotment of orders between the factories in London and Birmingham. It is also a matter of enormous importance to know when the new magazine rifles will be turned out. Unless they are ready quickly there is something inconsequential in the conduct of the Government. The increase in the Army and Navy Estimates can only have one meaning, if the matter be judged favourably to the Government, and these questions I do not regard from a Party point of view. It does not mean that the Government is thinking of war, but that Great Britain's preparations cannot be allowed to fall too far behind those of other Powers. An excellent pattern has been adopted for the new rifle—probably the best in Europe, because it is the last. But, as far as I know, not a single rifle, except a few for experiment, has yet been issued to the Army. France has close upon half a million at the present time, and the other great Powers are far in advance of England in this matter. What is the use, then, of increasing the Estimates, if the production of the new rifles in England is so slow?

I hope the Secretary for War will give us some information as to the number of rifles likely to be turned out in the course of the next twelve months, for I really look upon this as a question of State policy. It is idle to urge it would be indiscreet to give such information to the world, because the power of production of the factories is in all probability, known to every foreign Government. Again, the Secretary of State for War has touched very doubtfully on the question of smokeless powders, and has said that, while undoubtedly they are an improvement in many respects, the Government intend for the present to adhere to the ordinary black powder. These chemical powders, which are smokeless, undoubtedly produce better shooting, and that is a very important point. Scientific witnesses have urged that time is required to test their adaptability to various climates. No doubt time would be the best test to apply; but, in the meanwhile an emergency might arise and pass before the question is settled. Surely chemical tests could be applied which would approximately indicate the real value of the powders under all circumstances. You must anticipate the action of time, and I believe chemists could tell you more as to the reliability of these powders in different climates. I, therefore, trust that the Secretary for War will reconsider his verdict on this matter. I now come to the question of the personnel of the Army and that of the Army Corps. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton congratulates the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War on having said very little about the Army Corps. Well, I never considered this was a pressing question, but it is mixed up with the question of efficiency. In my opinion, it is very doubtful if the Army Corps system is suitable for the British Army. It is to the interest of the military party to insist on two Army Corps, because, having obtained them, they will at once point out how useless they will be without a third. I do not think that an Army Corps organization is necessary or desirable for a small Army, like that of Great Britain, of under 100,000 men. I admit you must have Army Corps when you get beyond a certain number of men; but I am afraid that our own Secretary of State for War has been too much at the mercy of his professional advisers in dealing with this matter; for, as I have already pointed out, they prefer the system for reasons of their own. I wish the Secretary of State for War had noticed a little more the question of the rations served out to the soldiers. We had the subject before the Committee of the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord R. Churchill, last year, and it seemed to be generally agreed that the rations were insufficient, and it was stated, at the same time, that the soldier would not bear any reduction from his pay in order to give him better rations. There has been this year a falling off in recruiting, which is to be very much regretted, although we cannot, of course, regret the cause of it, which is, of course, the great improvement which has taken place in the trade of the country. It seems to me that the difficulty as to recruiting can only be got over by improving the condition of the men, and one of the most essential improvements to be effected is in the matter of rations. No doubt at present there is a large amount of criminality amongst the soldiers, and the character of the troops in many cases requires a large number of men to be told off for guard duty, being in that way kept away from instruction in drill. I do not believe in the allegation once made by an officer that one-half of Her Majesty's Army is occupied in keeping the other half in the guard-room, but no doubt there is an improvement to be effected in the character of the men, and I hold that if you make the condition of the men better, and improve the rations and pay, you will raise the character of your soldiers, and it will become then a punishment instead of a reward for misconduct to turn a man out of the army. A very vexed question was introduced by the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Bridgeton Division of Glasgow (Sir G. Trevelyan) in regard to the Indian Army, and I think his general argument was, in the main, extremely sound. I perfectly agree that the Army at home should not be regarded merely as a gigantic dépôt for the Indian Army. The more you divide Her Majesty's forces into an Indian Army and Colonial Army on the one hand, and a home Army on the other, the more efficient will your

Army become. You would get more efficient Indian and Colonial troops by keeping the men longer than you do at present in India and the Colonies — though, of course, the evil is to be avoided of cutting the men off from England altogether, and teaching them to forget their connection with the home army. But I do think the service would be vastly improved if a soldier could say "I am enlisting for two or three years' service at home, in a particular county; I can almost choose the town I shall be in; and at the expiration of two or three years I can leave and join the Indian Army, if I like." That would be a much better system than the present, and it would, I am sure, prove attractive to the men if they could enlist three years in the infantry, and a little more in the cavalry and artillery, knowing that they would not be compelled to go to India or the Colonies, except in a case of emergency. Another matter on which I feel strongly, is this: I think the Secretary of State should do everything in his power to try and increase the Reserves, this being a point on which continental armies are so much superior to our own. Our present system springs in a great measure from the necessity of sending men to the Colonies and to India, and in order to do that you have to enlist your men for seven years. There is an exception to that rule, and that is in the case of the Guardsmen, who are only enlisted for three years. No doubt their Reserves are in a much more satisfactory state than the Reserves of the line regiments. If you enlist men for three years and allow them to go to the Colonies or to India, if they like, afterwards, you might run up your Reserves very much. You might run them up from 25 per cent of your Army to 100 per cent, a number which I believe it perfectly possible to obtain. This I hold to be one of the most important questions in connection with the personnel of the Army. It takes very little time to educate a man to fight, and, therefore, I am in favour of short service enlistment. It is true it takes a man a long time to learn to ride a horse, but to teach him to fire a gun and get from column to open order and back again is a thing which can be done in a few weeks. Of course I do not allude to making a man a smart soldier, teaching him to trim and dress and bear himself well in barracks, and so on; but these things, although they are the pride of officers, are not required in actual warfare. What a soldier actually wants to know to be an efficient fighting man is very little. I say, cut down the time for which you enlist the men. If you do not adopt the German system, at any rate cut the time down to two or three years, in the manner of the French system.

GENERAL FRASER (Lambeth, N.): I regard this subject as one of vital importance. Two years back an appeal was made to the Secretary of State for War of the present Government to abstain from crippling the Royal Horse Artillery. This question was in every soldier's heart and on every soldier's lip. We wanted to know whether the highest military authority we have—namely, the Commander-in-Chief—approved of the reduction which had taken place in this force; but the etiquette of the Army, its sense of discipline, and the respect felt for the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State prevented any of us from asking a question on the point. However, we now have the answer of his Royal Highness given before the Committee on Military Estimates last year, and for fear of making a mistake I will read his statement word for word. His Royal Highness said:

“As to the Horse Artillery, I think it very desirable that they should be restored to their full strength.”

Now, after the reductions carried out last year nine batteries only of the Royal Horse Artillery remained on the strength of the Home establishment, and they were all attenuated batteries—cadres. We had to bow to the action of the authorities; but we relied to a great extent upon the words of the Secretary of State two years back this week. On the 14th of March, 1887, the Secretary of State for War, speaking in this House, said:

“Our object is to have no longer a large proportion of attenuated batteries. We hope to have a few organized in the most effective manner, ready to be produced whenever they are wanted.”

How grand and hopeful was this promise, and yet to-day, after the lapse of upwards of a year, not one man—not one horse—has been given to any one of these nine batteries to raise them from their state of attenuation and prostration. With regard to reserves, the Commander-in-Chief in his evidence said:

“The artillery is a very delicate arm, and I certainly should not have confidence in a horse artilleryman after he has been away a year.”

And, further, His Royal Highness said:

“I think that the cavalry and artillery should be kept at the fullest strength at which they can be maintained.”

While other countries are increasing their mobile artillery, we are decreasing this arm. I will not trouble the House by repeating the evidence brought forward two years ago as to the absolute necessity of a mobile artillery, but irresistible evidence has been adduced from incidents in history and from the opinions of the most distinguished and experienced soldiers in European and Indian warfare proving the absolute necessity for an adequate force of horse artillery—evidence that shows that this arm, by its extreme mobility, can turn the tide of battle, and that an army in an open country without horse artillery and cavalry is impotent; that its troops will have no rest by night or day, and that its leaders, however intrepid, will command without confidence or prospect of success. I do earnestly hope that the request of His Royal Highness will be attended to. As an old soldier, I must say I was deeply grieved to hear from the opposite benches the remarks which fell from the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Bridgeton Division of Glasgow (Sir G. Trevelyan), although I have no doubt he considered them just and right. The right hon. Gentleman ignored the shabby way in which the country has behaved to its officers. There are hundreds of men who staked their fortune in the army—who put all they had in the hands of the Government, the Government keeping the money. I hope the present Secretary of State will recognise fully that the country is indebted to its officers—to many of them to the extent of £4,000. Many young officers have complained that the Government have got the £900 they received from them and yet other officers who had paid nothing were running up side by with them for protection. With regard to the question of the unity of the service, I am sure that I have not said a word to prevent all my life and have been suffered to say that I am sure to say that the war service was performed at Dungeness. From at Dungeness we obtained various other manufacturing in this place for a long time the service in the British Army has been made better. One of the great advantages of the service is that on the occasion that the bill of the Government was found inconvenient to the Government of the day an order was issued for changing the pattern of the bill to the usual one as offered without spending £10 upon each Member. The same was done to effect the change with the least and in the interest of the country.

THE (HON.) CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy). The speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War as delivered was exceedingly clear, as his speech always are, so far as it went. I could not help, however, regretting that it did not go farther. I regret some things that he did not say. I regret that the right hon. Gentleman did not forestall what I had intended to say had I been able to bring on my Motion on going into Committee. However, the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Bridgeton Division of Glasgow (Sir George Trevelyan, forestalled a great deal of what I had intended to say, as also did the hon. Gentleman the Member for Leicester (Mr. Picton). I desire to support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Leicester, though I am not sure that I shall do it on the same grounds that he proposed it. I am not one of those who feel quite easy about our present position, and I am one of those who believe that we are by no means safe from invasion. I am very much a man of peace; and I hope that should there in the future be great wars in Europe we shall not be involved in them. On the other hand, however, I cannot disown from myself that we are a proud and rather a suspicious and not an aggressive people to some extent and therefore to me and my wife might appear in the form of a war impending in the Continent we are anxious might not our position be prejudicial and is a matter of fact we never know what we might be doing and ourselves. Well, I am sure that in fact we are in a position which is better protected and I therefore desire to see the money being expended in the defensive and not for offensive purposes. I will, therefore, submit to the House these propositions—first, that we should provide for defence and not offence. For my own part, I rather wish to keep down the Regular Forces, and that whatever Army we have it should not be one which would enable us to vie with any Continental nation as a great military Power. I do not want the two Army Corps that are spoken of, for I think they will probably lead us on to mischief. We are much better without them. I am of opinion that we should provide for defence at home, which is a primary object, rather than provide for the defence of our Colonies, which is a secondary consideration. As regards our foreign possessions, my belief is that our self-governing Colonies are now pretty well able to defend themselves. India can defend herself, with certain reciprocal assistance between herself and this country; and, as I say, with regard to the Colonies, though I do not deprecate our possession of them, I do not, I must say, regard our connection with them as vital to our strength. The principal object of the Motion I put on the Paper is to urge that we should have a complete plan for the defence of these islands. The right hon. Baronet the Member for the Bridgeton Division said that we want a scheme which shall combine the Army, Militia, Volunteers, and all our Forces; but I want to combine not only the land, but the naval and coast defences. The next proposition I wish to submit is that, under the present conditions of service, no regular Army which we can have is sufficient for the defence of these islands. The Secretary of State hopes to be able to put in these Islands a regular Force of 80,000 men. I apprehend that includes Ireland; if it does, the force for the defence of Great Britain is greatly diminished. Then the Secretary of State gave his reasons why the Army Reserve is not a force easily available. He told us how unwilling employers are to let their men go; indeed, I think the right hon. Gentleman proved the case that the Army Reserve, as it stands, is not a force on which we can rely. I do not think we shall ever be secure in these Islands until we have a thoroughly reliable citizen force. There is another proposition I have to submit, and it is that the system of armed citizens to defend our homes is the greatest possible security for peace. The Regular Services are always crying out for war and for aggressive policy. ("No, no!") Well, perhaps I am wrong. I admit that there are many sensible men in the Army and Navy, many men who, having seen service, would be the last to precipitate war. But there is among younger men in both services a spirit encouraged by popular feeling in favour of war. But in the case of a citizen army, people do not like to see their husbands, sons, and lovers sent out to risk their lives. We have a Volunteer Army of which we may be proud, and a Militia which in many respects is efficient; but there is no sufficient organization and combination of these forces with the Regular Army so as to be able to meet a sudden invasion. According to the statement and speech of the Secretary of State, there is a falling off in the Militia and Volunteers, and I cannot see that the right hon. Gentleman has suggested anything sufficient. The Volunteers ought to be treated more liberally. I hear on all sides that the officers of Volunteers are not able to keep up the force, though they spent large sums on it out of their own means. It is very unreasonable to expect them to do so. With regard to our coast defences, the Secretary of State has not put the subject in a sufficiently prominent shape before the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman told the Committee that arrangements have been made for garrisoning the ports; but what provision has been made for the general coast defence of the kingdom I do not know. Kirkcaldy, the constituency which I represent, is one of the most exposed in the country, and I should like to know what preparations have been made for its defence. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will tell us what he means when he says he proposes to assist those localities which assist themselves. The town of Kirkcaldy has assisted itself as largely as it could be expected to do. The people have not only a good show of Rifle Volunteers, but also of Artillery Volunteers. In addition, the county of Fife has a very large and efficient force of Artillery Volunteers. Under these circumstances the Secretary of State may be prepared to give us sufficient guns to destroy any cruisers which may come to blow us to pieces. At present there are in Kirkcaldy only a few guns, not more formidable than pop-guns, while the garrison only consists of three men. Now, with regard to the question of Colonial contribution, the Secretary of State proposes, according to the statement he has circulated, that there should be an additional contribution of £30,000. I cannot help thinking that the Colonies have been treated with such indulgence that they will try to evade the payment of every farthing you propose to put upon them. Malta may be a very important station, but I am not quite sure that we should not be better without it; at any rate, its possession is not at all so important as our home defence. The contribution from the Colonies is miserably inadequate. I find that in the Colonies, exclusive of Egypt, we maintain 30,640 men, at a cost of £1,986,352. In addition, there is the cost of arms, ammunition, barracks, sea transport, and the non-effective Services. In reality, the real cost of the 30,000 men is nearly £4,000,000 a year. What is the contribution of the Colonies towards this sum? At present it is £114,000; if you get the proposed addition it will only be £144,000. I say that this is miserably inadequate. I protest against treating the Colonies with the excessive indulgence accorded to them. I do not see why rich Colonies should benefit by the protection of this country, and practically pay nothing for it. Newfoundland, Bermuda, Halifax, the West India Islands, contribute nothing, neither does Cape Colony. Natal pays £4,000; Mauritius formerly paid £18,000, but now only pays £15,000; Ceylon used to pay £43,000; it now pays £34,000. The Straits Settlements pay £35,000, instead of £44,000 as formerly. I think these facts justify me in saying that the mother country is not being treated fairly in this matter. Now there is one other very important question which has not been touched upon in this debate, and that is, the utilization of the non-effective force. I want to see a large portion of the non-effective force available for the citizen army which I wish to see organized. Enormous expense is incurred by the provision of retiring allowances for officers who are comparatively young men. I do not by any means grudge the retiring allowances, if, at the same time, the officers are utilized in connection with the citizen army. It is notorious that we have not a sufficient supply of officers for the Militia and the Volunteers, and, therefore, I believe that by the introduction of a judicious system those officers who will willingly engage in serving their country in this way may be utilized. I hope something will be done to make an arrangement of this kind. Just one word with regard to a question which has already been mentioned in the debate—namely, the great necessity which exists for dividing the Army into a real short service Army and a real long service Army. I do not agree with the suggestion that a separate Army for India is desirable; there are great dangers in having a European Army for India alone; but I certainly desire two classes of soldiers—one which does not wish to go abroad, but which is anxious to perform military along with civilian duties, and another class which will make soldiering a profession. The noble Lord the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington) made a serious beginning in that direction, and I am somewhat disappointed that nothing is said on the subject in the present statement of the Secretary of State for War. I am sure that is the way in which to make the Army fitted to meet the exigencies of the country. I heartily agree with what has been said as to the necessity of providing better barracks. When I compare the barracks provided in this rich country with those provided in a poor country like Switzerland, I am ashamed of England in this respect. As to the Horse Artillery, I entirely disagree with the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Hampshire (Sir F. Fitz Wygram). I have always thought the Horse Artillery a most expensive force, and I am very glad it has been reduced. I have nothing more to say except that I hope we shall have from the Government some statement as to what they propose to do with regard to the defence of these islands. Holding the views I do I must vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Picton).

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR DEPARTMENT (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey): The hon. Gentleman the Member for Kirkcaldy took a very comprehensive view of the requirements of the country, but at the same time he protested vigorously against any increase of the Colonial forces. I do not gather whether he meant that the Colonies should look after themselves.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: To a reasonable extent.

MR. BRODRICK: The hon. Gentleman considers that the Colonies are not vital to us, and that their contributions are miserably inadequate. In short, he led us to understand that in his opinion it would be better if we looked after our own affairs and left the Colonies to look after theirs. I think the hon. Gentleman was a party to the expenditure on the coaling stations in which the House of Commons entered unanimously two or three years ago. I do not think any policy could be more ridiculous than that of providing armaments and fortifications and not providing men to serve them. The hon. Gentleman regretted that there was a reduction in the Militia and Volunteers, but surely he did not notice that the Volunteers, having come under a different standard of efficiency, are stronger in every particular than hitherto.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: There is a large decrease in the number of efficient.

MR. BRODRICK: The decrease is something like 3,000 in 225,000, and the men are forced to make a certain number of points in shooting. I think it is necessary that hon. Members who are to occupy the time of the Committee at length on military subjects should recognise the conditions under which military efficiency is to be gauged. When hon. Members talk of a great decrease of Volunteers, they ought to recognise that if we fix a very much higher standard of efficiency, and the Volunteers attain it to the extent of something like 97 per cent, there is really an increase of strength and not a decrease. It is only due to the Volunteers to make this remark, because the way in which they have responded to the call of my hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War is one which reflects the greatest credit on the Force. The hon. Gentleman referring to the statement that there will be 80,000 men available for garrison duty, asked how we shall provide for the garrisoning of Ireland. The hon. Member will be surprised to hear that the garrisoning of Ireland has been provided for without counting on the 80,000. If the hon. Member, instead of limiting his attention to the defence of Kirkcaldy, were to carry it a little further south and west, and notice the city of Edinburgh meeting the Secretary of State for War half way by providing the land for fortifications; if the right hon. Gentleman provided the guns, he would be doing very good service to the town of Kirkcaldy as well as to the Firth of Forth. Nothing is more important than that the different localities should do something for themselves. The hon. Member does not see things in the light we do. Does he want all ports to be made military ports, like Portsmouth?

SIR G. CAMPBELL: No. I only meant to say the offer of the Government was not liberal enough; they have not met the ports half way.

MR. BRODRICK: I do not know what the hon. Member would consider half way. The towns have gone no distance at all.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: More than the Government.

MR. BRODRICK: The Government offer to find works and guns if the town will find the land on which the guns are to be placed; and this, I think, is as far as the House of Commons can be expected to go. Then I pass to the extremely interesting speech of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan). He spoke at some length on the provision made for guns; and asked us what promises or pledges we had given to contractors to induce them to supply guns within a definite time, and he expressed his preference for definite orders, instead of indefinite pledges, such as were given, I believe, by Mr. Brand under the Government of 1884. He will be glad to hear that the contracts we propose to give will be definite contracts. It would be useless to expect the putting up of expensive machinery by indefinite promises of employment. They will be definite orders, as the noble Lord (Lord Randolph Churchill) was informed an hour or two ago, to fill the requirements of the Navy, as foreshadowed in the speech of the First Lord of the Admiralty. We see our way to giving these contracts for adequate performance within the specified time; but the hon. and gallant Member will excuse me if I do not go absolutely into this question; it is better that this should not be pressed just now. The hon. and gallant Gentleman asked for open competition—open competition in the matter of big guns. Now, I am sure those who have had any experience at the War Office will know the risk we should undergo in anything of the kind, and will have in mind the enormous issues at stake; but we have gone as far as we can to ascertain the number of firms who could compete, their terms, and what their requirements are. And upon this information my right hon. Friend will found satisfactory contracts. Then there were several questions put in reference to the Magazine rifle and the time when its distribution will take place. Well, we have every hope that the distribution of the rifle will begin before the close of the present financial year. Progress with the rifle has been delayed no doubt until very recently through matters arising before the Royal Arms Committee, but now every hitch is removed. The departments at Enfield and at Birmingham are at work and as I said, the distribution will commence before the close of the financial year.

COLONEL NOLAN: How many will be distributed?

MR. BRODRICK: Seventy thousand or eighty thousand during the financial year will be manufactured for us and for the Indian Army. Their order will be executed parallel with ours.

COLONEL NOLAN: How many for India?

MR. BRODRICK: About 30,000. There is one point I must not forget; it was raised by the hon. Member for North Birmingham (Mr. Kenrick). He expressed his belief that the Government were rather more inclined to favour Germany than England in the matter of sword manufacture.

MR. KENRICK: I simply said that that was the impression abroad. I did not say that it was my own.

MR. BRODRICK: Speaking from his position and from his trade knowledge, I feel that, coming from him, it is a point that I cannot pass over. There is no desire whatever of that kind, and if the hon. Member wants anything else to disabuse him of that idea, he has only to turn to the Estimates which are now before the House, and he will see that there is provision made for a great increase of workmen and expenditure on works proposed to be undertaken at Enfield and Birmingham during the next financial year. At Enfield, for instance, it is proposed to make an increase from 220,000 to 250,000 on that account; and at Birmingham, where the hon. Member has special interest, from 35,000 this year to 65,000 in the coming year. This is in addition to the contract given to Mr. Mould, of Birmingham. He has received an order to the full extent of his own tender for 15,000 swords and bayonets to be delivered, I think, at Enfield the next financial year, or very soon afterwards. There is every desire to encourage the manufacture not only at Government establishments like Enfield and Sparkbrook, of rifle swords and bayonets, but also among private firms, and I may say that if we can get any one single thing we need from the United Kingdom, we would infinitely prefer to get it there than from abroad. So far as this sword industry can be developed in Great Britain we shall lose no opportunity of doing our utmost to promote it. There is one other question which has been touched upon by the noble Lord the Member for Hampshire (Viscount Wolmer). He spoke with great knowledge of the Militia, and he made several very valuable suggestions, pointing out how in his view the loss in the Militia could be lessened, and suggested, among other things, the localization of companies. He showed how recruits came from country and town districts, and of the latter the noble Lord did not seem to entertain a very high opinion. I confess there is great force in the arguments he used, and I am quite sure the Department will be ready to consider his suggestions. He also spoke of improving the system of recruiting, and found fault with the present permanent staff, saying that the relative success in obtaining efficiency was not sufficiently regarded. It is a suggestion that ought to be considered, and if it has not been considered it must be the fault of the commanding officers; they have only themselves to blame. But, of course, it was impossible for the noble Lord to bring forward definite instances. One thing I can say, that the sole reason why the present system was adopted and maintained—that of taking men actually in regiments of the Line and sending them to serve as adjutants in the Militia and Reserve Forces—was to preserve a class midway between the Army and the Reserve; that a man should have a stimulus, and not conclude—because his service in the Army was expired—that no more would be heard of him, but that he might serve in the Reserve Force and get promotion. I have no doubt that the remarks made by the noble Lord will bear fruit after the attention which he has directed to the subject. Certainly, the state of the Militia is not satisfactory in regard to numbers; but, of course, there is the difficulty always to encounter that recruiting falls off when employment becomes more brisk. My right hon. Friend will have no objection to consider what form an inquiry, such as that suggested, should take. Several other points have been raised, upon which, I think, I need not now dwell. In regard to the Amendment by the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Picton), I think it has been made so clear by my right hon. Friend that the sole object of the increase made this year is to provide efficient forces for the protection of those works the House of Commons has already sanctioned, that I need not further detain the Committee in justification of that.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): I listened with interest and pleasure to the statement of the Secretary of State for War, and I must join with others in expressing my admiration of the activity, energy, ingenuity, and ability with which he and the distinguished officers who assist him have, so far, under the conditions that were imposed upon them, developed the military resources of the country. But the main feature of the Estimates which arrests most attention and excites no slight degree of surprise and disappointment is the proposal to increase the total expenditure upon the Army by no less than £600,000. At a time when the Government are recommending a large development and expansion of our naval strength, involving a heavy burden on the taxpayer, we might naturally expect that in the other branch of warlike expenditure there would have been prominently displayed a more than usually vigorous effort to effect savings which would, in some degree, afford compensatory relief. That surely would be the course taken by a prudent administrator under ordinary circumstances, and we anxiously scrutinized the Estimates to find the trace of such an effort. I find no such traces, however, but on the contrary, the most prominent feature is this increase of £600,000. But there is more than this, because in the course of his speech, and in a quiet and casual way, the right hon. Gentleman informed the House that this was not the whole Military Budget, and that there were other financial proposals of an alarming kind which the Government would have to submit by-and-bye to the House. I agree that the condition of much of our barrack accommodation is deplorable; that it is desirable that the location of our troops should be reconsidered; and that they should be concentrated so as to conduce to greater economy and efficiency; but I object to what was foreshadowed—namely, that the work will be effected by means of a loan, and I maintain that the House should be informed now what approximately will have to be paid for these needed reforms, the cost of which ought to be provided for out of the annual Estimates and not by means of a loan. It would have been better if the right hon. Gentleman had followed the example of his colleague the First Lord, and disclosed the whole demand, whether it was to be met by loan or by the taxation of the year. There is, I have said, little trace of saving in these Estimates. I am well aware, from personal experience, of the enormous difficulty of curbing the expenditure on these laudable and patriotic services, and as long as the system and organization of the Army remains as at present this difficulty will continue. I know how one object after another is urged upon the Minister, and supported with overwhelming arguments by his professional advisers, and it is almost impossible to say which should be allowed and which refused. But a limit to expenditure must be found somewhere, and in such a year as this that limit ought to be applied with more rigour than usual. Before making any general observations upon military policy, I will ask the Committee to consider the decreases and increases shown in the Estimates. In the statement on page 3 of the Estimates a distinction is drawn between those which are automatic and those which are due to policy and administration. The decreases due to policy are set down at £92,300; but I notice one of the items is £14,200 for Non-Effective Services in India; but surely that is automatic and in no way due to policy? The rest of the reductions are, I am bound to say, of a satisfactory character. The reduction in the Army Pay Department is a matter upon which I may specially congratulate my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary. The establishment of a system of station paymasters is an object that has been desired for twenty years. I hope that the change may be carried a little further, and that these officers may be interchangeable with others in the Accountant General's Department, so that they may have experience in turn in discharging pay duties at out stations, and also in administration at headquarters. The increases which are due to changes of policy and administration amount to £612,000, of which the increase of the Army accounts for £100,000, and stores for £400,000. I do not object to the particular addition to the Army because it provides Native Corps and Lascars for the garrisoning of coaling stations. But the £400,000 increase under the head of stores includes £342,000 for guns, carriages, ammunition, and small arms, and it will be observed by looking at Vote 12 that this increase occurs upon an expenditure, for these sub-heads, of £1,000,000, which is a large provision to begin with. Without saying which particular item might be curtailed, there was surely here a wide field for that squeezing and pressure by which alone savings can be effected. I am too cautious and wily to point to particular services that might have been reduced, because the irrefutable arguments which have already been used by the Military Authorities for the purpose of convincing the right hon. Gentleman will immediately be advanced for my discomfiture. But I point to these large sums as, at least, offering a favourable field to a Minister anxious to make economies with a view to meet increases in other directions. Speaking of what formerly took place when the War Office Estimates included a provision for Navy guns, the right hon. Gentleman said it was a scandal when the Admiralty demand was cut down by the War Office, and this had been put an end to. It may have been a bad system, and I always advocated a change; but the right hon. Gentleman was inaccurate in speaking of the Admiralty claim as being cut down "by the War Office;" if it was reduced it was with the assent of the First Lord, and it was done by him and the War Minister conjointly. Besides, so long as the War Office had to bear the charge, perhaps the Admiralty was induced to make demands in excess of actual requirements; and "scandal" is certainly a strong term to apply. And now a word or two on another knotty point—the supply of swords. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of an order given to Solingen by one of his predecessors, and I believe that predecessor was the First Lord of the Treasury. [Mr. E. STANHOPE: I said "several."] Well, I was speaking of the latest, and if I recollect rightly what occurred was, that Mr. Mole undertook to make a certain number of swords, and the order for the remainder that were required was given to Solingen. Mr. Mould, however, was unable to supply all he had contracted for, but he offered to make the hilts if the Department would accept Solingen blades; whereupon the Department said, if they were to have Solingen blades after all, they might as well have cheaper swords direct from Germany at once. This incident explains what has puzzled a good many people in the country—that, owing to a great demand being exceptional and rare in England, the sword-making trade had almost vanished, and therefore we were obliged like the rest of the world to go to Solingen for swords. I am, however, glad to learn that this industry is now reviving. Well, Sir, there has been another source of saving pointed to—namely, the Generals' List, with which the right hon. Gentleman says he intends to deal. This is matter for congratulation; but I am even more suspicious about the Lieutenants' List, because when once a man appears on that list he is practically guaranteed a career, vested rights cannot be touched, and it is an expensive matter to keep the flow of promotion going for all these. If you want to reduce the charges for officers of the Army, what you have to do is to limit the entry of junior officers. I am afraid that of late, though not in the last year or two, there has been a tendency to unduly increase the subalterns' list. I was glad to gather from the observations of the right hon. Gentleman that in future promotion to the Generals' List will only be given those who hold or have held the command of a General. This is indeed the sound principle of promotion from one end of the Service to the other, that there should be no promotion to rank alone but that rank should accompany selection for duty. I look back with satisfaction to the fact that during the short time I was at the War Office, I for the first time introduced that principle in regard to promotion to the rank of Colonel, and this did something to check the number of those officers, who were multiplying and replenishing the earth at an inordinate rate. I was glad to find in the War Office at that time a disposition to act on the principle that officers should only be promoted to the rank of Colonel who held appointments as Colonels, and I hope it will now also be acted on in regard to Generals. But, Sir, the case for adverse criticism of these Estimates seems to be stronger than I have as yet put it. What is the position assumed by the Government as represented by the statement the other night of the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty. They make an assertion to the House, and to the world, that the provision at present made for the defence of these shores and of our commerce and of the Empire at large is inadequate, and they found on that assertion their new shipbuilding policy. Now this is not the time to express any opinion with regard to that statement, but I would point out that the defence of the Empire is partly naval and partly military, and it would appear to an unsophisticated mind that, in this composite undertaking, in proportion as the naval element is strengthened, it might be found practicable to modify and reduce the military element. But there is more than this. Let me recall to the recollection of the House what occurred at this time last year. The hon. and gallant Member for Sussex (Sir W. Barttelot) brought forward a Motion for the appointment of a Commission to inquire into and report upon the requirements for the protection of the Empire. This Motion was largely supported, especially by hon. and gallant Members opposite, but Her Majesty's Government in my judgment very rightly opposed it, as any such Commission of Inquiry would have been in derogation of the sound Constitutional principle which places the direct responsibility in this matter upon the Ministers of the Crown — a principle which is the corner-stone of our Parliamentary system of Government. The Government instead granted the hon. and gallant Gentleman a Committee of Inquiry into the higher organization of the Admiralty and War Office, and I have much sympathy for my hon. and gallant Friends, for, although they cheerfully and innocently accepted this substitute, it gave them nothing of what they desired. Besides this, however, Her Majesty's Government appointed a Committee of Cabinet Ministers to inquire into the whole military and naval position of the Empire, and this step I entirely approved of—it was the proper Constitutional course for them to pursue. This Cabinet Committee has had frequent meetings, and has had the advice and assistance of the principal professional authorities of the country. I assume that it has not occupied itself with the smaller details of administration, with questions of the best type of ships and the best form of guns. I assume that it has inquired into great questions of naval and military policy with a view to our having some definite principle in the matter, for that is what is demanded not only in the country, but, above all, by the officers who are interested in the two Services. The time is favourable for determining this great question,—for what purpose our Army is maintained, and what strength and organization is required for that purpose. Military policy obviously depends upon foreign policy, and at the present time there is apparently and ostentatiously a practical concord upon the subject of foreign policy. Both political Parties profess one principle of foreign policy, which is that, while willing to give friendly advice, we shall entirely abstain from any interference in Continental politics. What is the inference, as affecting our military policy, to be drawn from that fact? It is that we must abandon definitely all idea of placing on the Continent the six or ten, or perhaps 15 or 20 Army Corps which Continental interference would imply, and that we should restrict our Army to the protection of India and our Colonies and to our own domestic defence. There are many men of great authority who maintain that, with a sufficiently strong Navy, invasion of this country would become impossible. What they say is that while our Fleet holds the seas no one would dare to invade us, and that, if by any misfortune our Fleet lost the command of the seas, no one would need to invade us. That is an extreme view which I for one am not prepared to adopt. But it is easy to see how intimately the general military question I raise is connected with the question of our naval strength. I will only refer for a moment to Ireland; but everybody must know that if by some policy we succeed in securing to the Government of that country the respect and support of the people of Ireland, we shall at once discharge a large number of the troops employed in Ireland. However, I will pass by that subject, because it brings in other questions of Party policy. But on the more general of the distribution of naval and military duties in the work of our national defence, I am interested to know whether the question of the numbers and the preparedness of the Land Forces as a whole was considered by the Committee of the Government when they resolved to increase the Navy, and whether the conclusion that they formed could be stated? My strong belief is that if a sufficient, a reasonable, and a gradual increase were given to the naval power of this country, and if it were openly and formally recognized that we were not to provide for taking any part in European warfare, a most material modification and reduction might be possible in the Army with great economical results, and with no loss to the efficiency of the Army for those limited purposes for which we should have to maintain it. The suggestion of my hon. Friend, that there should be a separate Indian and Colonial Army, is not a practical solution of the difficulty as far as I can judge. I am fully alive to the fact that to speak of such a modification as I have indicated is much easier than to effect it. Last year I explained to the House the difficulties in the way of a satisfactory alteration in the system of our Army. I confess, however, that my hopes were high that the present Government might accomplish the task. They have advantages which other Governments do not possess. They are strong in the very quarter of tradition and prejudice in which the impediments arise, and they are the masters and the controllers of those Conservative forces. Their action, therefore, would not arouse the jealousy and enmity which a Liberal Government would have to encounter in dealing with these great reforms. Yet apparently nothing has been done, and in principle has been laid down. We are to go on in the old head-on-mouth way, merely asking for as much as a permanent Establishment will give. There is, indeed, the imaginary standard of two Army Corps—an idea adopted by the military authorities in sheer despair of having any definite principle laid down and as promising at least some object up to which they might work. But what is an Army Corps? It is a body of troops composed of the different arms in certain prescribed proportions which foreign Armies find most suitable for great campaigns in continental countries on the Continent of Europe—the very service on which we shall never employ our Army at all. Whereas if we wish to reinforce our garrison in India, or to send out some small expedition to Egypt or the Cape, the first thing we have to do is to disturb and break up our Army Corps. I cannot think that I am alone in thinking this an unsatisfactory picture of the organization of our Army; and thus my objection to these Estimates is twofold. In the first place, I complain that £600,000 should be added to the public burdens at a time when greatly increased expenditure is asked in regard to the Navy; and, in the second place, I object to these Estimates, because they disclose no comprehensive policy, no definition of the uses and duties of the Army, and no adaptation of the Army to those duties and uses such as a protracted and close investigation by the Government justified the Committee in expecting at their hands. My hon. Friend the Member for Leicester has moved a reduction in the number of men; I have said that these particular men are the native gunners to work the defences of the coaling stations already provided with the approval of Parliament. I cannot, therefore, vote against them. And apart from this a reduction would hardly be possible under the present organization; with another organization, as I have said, certain things could be done; but with the present organization I recognise the extreme difficulty of saving any money at all. So that, while sympathizing with the Amendment, I cannot support it. I am particularly anxious to know from the Secretary of State what sum of money would be asked for barracks.

*Mr. E. STANHOPE: I think that after the speech of the right hon. Gentleman it is only right that I should offer one or two observations. Among the subjects which the right hon. Gentleman has introduced to the notice of the Committee is that of the two Army Corps which it has been the object of the War Office for the last two or three years to get into a state of thorough organization. I was under the impression that the beginning of the organization of those two Army Corps was in the administration of the right hon. Gentleman himself. If now the right hon. Gentleman thinks fit to despise and condemn them, then all I can say is that under the right hon. Gentleman the Regular and Auxiliary Forces had no organization at all. The right hon. Gentleman has based most of the remarks he has made on the assumption that the Navy programme will be accepted.

*Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No; I said that the Government who proposed the one ought not to have proposed the other.

*Mr. E. STANHOPE: If the right hon. Gentleman is going to reject the Navy Estimates as well, he does not desire at all to aim at the proper defence of the country.

*Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Let the right hon. Gentleman postpone the consideration of the Army Estimates till the opinion of the House was taken on the other proposals.

*Mr. E. STANHOPE: I never heard a more illogical proposition. The right hon. Gentleman is going to postpone the Army Estimates, and then he is going to vote against the Navy Estimates.

*Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I did not say so.

*Mr. E. STANHOPE: Well, is he or is he not? One way or the other, he ought to provide for the defence of the country. The most important part of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman was that in which he asked whether the present Army Estimates were the result of careful deliberation. I should like to tell the right hon. Gentleman and the country that the result of the deliberations of the Committee of the Cabinet was the Army Estimates now before Parliament. They deliberately considered what was necessary for the Army and the Navy. The one thing most wanted for the Army was the completion of the garrisons for the coaling stations. I do not think the right hon. Gentleman at all objected to that increase of the garrisons. The other point to which the right hon. Gentleman called attention was the proposed increase in regard to barracks, and the right hon. Gentleman wanted to know what sum would be asked for that purpose. I entirely decline to give him any information at all on a matter which is under the consideration of the Government until we have a complete scheme to put before Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman complained of that large expenditure, but surely he could not have read a line of the evidence before the Committee last year, which clearly showed that if any attempt was to be made to deal with the barracks of this country in a satisfactory manner it must be by a large permanent expenditure. Any ordinary private trader dealing with a matter of that kind would immediately propose a capital expenditure, because he would know that, on the ground of economy alone, he was justified in making that expenditure; and he would also know that it would be a saving to the expenditure of the country. I believe that we ought at once to try and put the barracks in a satisfactory condition. The right hon. Gentleman admits that our barracks are in a deplorable condition. I want to know where did he find that out, and I beg of him to answer this question. Did he find it out when he was in office in 1886? If he did, all I can say is that I never saw in any of the Estimates he laid before Parliament the smallest indication of any desire on his part to remedy that state of things. If the right hon. Gentleman has only now found it out, surely he might, instead of the carping criticism in which he has indulged, give the Government an opportunity of making their proposals to Parliament, and of trying to remedy a condition of things which, he said, was deplorable, without waiting for that interminable length of time which will be required if no increase be made upon the sum ordinarily voted for the barracks. The right hon. Gentleman has also complained because I described as a "scandal" the cutting down by the War Office in 1886 of the Estimates proposed by the Admiralty: but I certainly think it is a scandal that after the Admiralty has put forward Estimates for the purpose of carrying out the services they think necessary, the War Office should cut out all the ammunition for the quick-firing guns. That is a thing which no Government ought to allow.

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The right hon. Gentleman speaks of the War Office cutting out certain items. In 1886, when the Estimates of the War Office and the Admiralty were considerably reduced, nothing in the Admiralty Estimate was cut down by the War Office. It was cut down as a matter of Cabinet policy, with the consent of the First Lord of the Admiralty and of the Secretary of State for War.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I entirely accept the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman. It was a matter of Cabinet policy that quick-firing guns should be provided for the Navy without ammunition. I am content to accept that explanation, and if the present Government has endeavoured in their time to provide a remedy for the state of things produced by such a result, I do not think they have laboured in vain. I earnestly entreat the Committee now to come a decision on the question raised by the hon. Member opposite. I know that a good many hon. Members wish to raise other questions of great importance upon these Estimates, but they will have an opportunity of doing so at a later stage.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I am not aware on what other Vote save Vote 5 it will be possible to raise the question I desire to raise this evening, or I should accede to the appeal of the right hon. Gentleman at once. The point I wish to bring to his notice is one which twice last year I understood the right hon. Gentleman to promise to consider, and one which is attended by so much hardship, and provocative of so much ill-feeling in the Channel Islands, that I think it absolutely necessary to bring it to the attention of the Committee—I refer to the Channel Islands Militia. At present the Militia there are burdensome in the highest degree to the poorer classes, the wealthier class being entirely untouched, while for what it costs to those parts of the country there is nothing whatever to show.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I feel sure the hon. Gentleman may raise this question on Vote 5.

MR. BRADLAUGH: If the right hon. Gentleman undertakes that I shall have an opportunity on Vote 5, I will give way.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Unless the Chairman should object on Standing Orders—and I hope he will not—we will take the discussion on Vote 5.

THE CHAIRMAN: I see on page 8 of the Votes-in-Supply, Vote 5, a Vote for the Channel Islands Militia, so that it would be perfectly relevant to that Vote.

MR. BRADLAUGH: Then I will not press it further now.

*MR. CREMER: I beg to move, Sir, that you report Progress, and ask leave to sit again. I do not think the proposals of the Government have been adequately discussed, and I, therefore, hold that a good deal more time should be given to the very important questions which have been brought under notice. It is perfectly monstrous that we should not have the opportunity of discussing on this Vote the extraordinary proposal with regard to the defence of London.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman report Progress and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Cremer.)

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I must again appeal to the Committee upon this subject. It is absolutely necessary for us to comply with our statutory obligations, and the time at our disposal for doing so is exceedingly short. Seeing that the hon. Member will have an opportunity of discussing the subjects in which he is interested upon other Votes, and that the Motion for Adjournment, if carried, would simply have the effect of stopping the business of the House at a critical period, I hope the hon. Gentleman will allow the Vote before the Committee to be taken.

*MR. CHILDERS: The Vote might be further discussed to-morrow at the Morning Sitting which the Government have obtained for Supply.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I would remind the right hon. Gentleman that the Supplementary Estimates are put down for the Morning Sitting to-morrow, and there are many subjects involved in them which Members are anxious to discuss. Hon. Members will be able to discuss matter connected with the Vote now before the Committee on other Votes.

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): In supporting the Motion for Progress, I would point out that nearly the whole of the evening has been taken up by the discussion of matters connected with Army organization, while on the question of policy involved in the increased Estimates of the Army and Navy scarcely a word has been said. I confess that I am not concerned in the technicalities that have been raised, but I feel that on the foreign policy upon which the proposed enormous increase of expenditure is based we ought to have ample time for consideration. I come from a part of the country where the military feeling is not so strong as in the Metropolis. Of course hon. and gallant Gentlemen connected with the Army and Navy love to fan the military feeling; but the people of this country generally regard the matter from quite another point of view. I am amazed that when we want to go into the foreign policy of the Government the Chancellor of the Exchequer should tell us of the necessity for discussing certain paltry Supplementary Estimates to-morrow, while, as regards the two great Services of the country, the cost of which is to be enormously increased, we are to have nothing to do but vote the Ways and Means. I, for one, am determined to press for a further opportunity of discussing the great question involved in the statement submitted to the Committee this evening. We are always promised something at subsequent stages, but when we have voted the men right hon. Gentlemen opposite say, "You have given us the men; surely you will give us the means." I consider the House of Commons will be failing in its duty if it do not insist on discussing the policy on which the present proposal is based, and I therefore support the Motion for Progress.

LORD R. CHURCHILL: I hope the hon. Member who moved the adjournment will modify his intentions, seeing that the Secretary of State has given an undertaking that the passing of the Vote under discussion will not prevent us from discussing points which might be raised upon it on other Votes. If the hon. Member allows the Government to take the Vote, public business will be forwarded a step, and he will not forfeit a single right which he possesses of expressing his views to the Committee. The time at the disposal of hon. Members for the discussion of matters of importance is short, and if we drive any Government into a corner they become desperate—perfectly desperate—and make a grab at all the time of private Members. If private Members insist upon their rights at inopportune moments they lose all. On the ground of common sense as well as of policy, and in the interest of the taxpayer and of free discussion, I would urge the hon. Member not to persevere with his Motion.

*MR. CHILDERS: I have not the smallest wish to embarrass the Government. If I understand the right hon. Gentleman correctly, we can take Naval Supply on Thursday, the Vote on Account on Monday, and then there remain only five or six Votes in the Supplementary Estimates, four of which are unopposed. This Vote can thus be taken to-morrow. It is, therefore, only reasonable that the Committee should report Progress.

MR. GOSCHEN: I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman means to hold out the hope that the Governsome day in the ordinary course that the Navy Vote will be taken in Thursday. My right hon. Friend suggested that a motion should be brought in the Army Estimates in the Navy Estimates and in the Vote in the House and that it should be brought in the House. That is the suggestion. I am sure that the Government are not in a position to do that. The Navy Vote in Thursday, the Vote in the House in Monday, and the Supplementary Vote in Thursday. The Government suggested that there is a large number of questions to be raised in the Vote in the House. The Government are not prepared to run the risk which would be involved; as such, we are inclined to vote against the Motion in respect of Progress. If we do not get the Army Vote tonight, we must have the Navy Vote on Thursday, the Vote in the House on Monday, and the Supplementary Vote on Tuesday.

MR. MOLLOY: What has been said amounts to this—that we shall not get the Army Vote tonight.

MR. GOSCHEN: I listened to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian the other day, and he acknowledged that the House would be bound to vote the money in time to carry on the Government of the country. Therefore, there is no choice. We are using no threats whatever. All we say is—and I believe with the concurrence of right hon. Gentlemen opposite—that we must get the money within a certain time.

MR. MOLLOY: It may not be the fact so far as the right hon. Gentleman is concerned, but it amounts to this—that we are now coming to the custom of the Estimates being forced through the House without anything like adequate discussion. I quite agree with the Chancellor of the Exchequer that some Votes of a non-contentious character may have been discussed at some length; but here we have a Vote which involves the whole policy of this country and its foreign policy, and to ask the Committee to some the Government tonight is really absurd in the ordinary sense of the word. We are told that we shall have a general discussion in the House. I believe that we shall have some discussion in the House if we do anything of the sort. We are not prepared to do the thing of the Government and we know that in the evening a particular time we have to keep within the limits of the Vote. Now, the Government are asking their Estimates in a premature fashion; they are of no little importance. In the Secretary for War has made five speeches, and the Under Secretary too. My hon. Friend is my side now, and on two occasions he was interrupted by the Secretary for War. One of the right hon. Gentlemen (the Secretary for War's) speeches was a mere repetition speech to one by the right hon. Gentleman Mr. Campbell-Bannerman. It was merely a personal encounter between the present and past War Secretaries. Several of us who have formed some opinion upon this subject desire to give expression to it; and looking at it fairly, it seems utterly impossible that this debate should close, and I protest against putting the House to the trouble of taking a Division.

MR. GOSCHEN: I move that the Question be now put.

THE CHAIRMAN withheld his assent, and declined to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

MR. BIGGAR (Cavan): I think the proposition of the Government is absurd. The argument, as I understand, was this—that we must first of all vote the money, and get the reasons for the Vote afterwards. Now, I take it that that is beginning at the wrong end.

It being Midnight, the Motion to report Progress lapsed without Question put, and the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

House resumed.

Progress reported.

House adjourned at five minutes after Twelve o'clock.

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES.

No. 14.] FIRST VOLUME OF SESSION 1889. [MARCH 20.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 12th March, 1889.

VANCOUVER'S ISLAND—DEFENCE OF THE HARBOUR OF ESQUIMAULT.

QUESTION.

LORD SUDELEY had on the Paper the following Question:—To ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Dominion Government of Canada have assented to the proposed arrangements for the defence of the harbour of Esquimault, in Vancouver's Island, which he stated last year had been sent out on the 12th June, 1888; whether the contemplated works have been commenced, and the armaments sent out; whether the Government will now state the date when the fortifications of this important harbour (being the headquarters of our Navy on the Pacific Station) will be completed, and the guns placed in position?

LORD ELPHINSTONE: I have to ask my noble Friend opposite (Lord Sudley) whether he will be good enough to postpone for a short time the Question which he has put upon the Paper. If he will repeat the Question on a future occasion, I shall be able to give a much more complete and definite answer than I could at present.

LORD SUDELEY: I have no objection, of course, to postponing the Question, as the noble Lord asks; but I sincerely hope that the Government really intend to press forward this matter to a settlement. As your Lordships are aware, it is quite nine months ago since this Question was fully discussed, and the noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Colonies then stated clearly that the Government intended at once to fortify the harbour of Esquimault, and to make it secure; but, as far as I have been able to discover, up to the present moment nothing has really been done. Although this is our only harbour and coaling station on that coast, it is still unfortified and undefended; and there can be no doubt that if war with Russia should break out a great attempt would be made to seize and occupy it. I sincerely hope that the Government will really push the matter forward, and endeavour to get the Dominion Government to make some arrangement in regard to it.

House adjourned at half past Four o'clock, to Thursday next, a quarter
past Ten o'clock.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY BILL (by Order).

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.) intimated that he did not intend to move the Motion of which he had given notice for the rejection of the Bill.

Question, "That the Bill be now read a second time," put, and agreed to.

MR. HUNTER: I beg to move, "That all persons who have presented Petitions against the Bill praying to be heard against the expediency of allowing the North British Railway Company to build a hotel or carry on hotel business in Edinburgh, be heard by themselves, their Counsel, Agents, and Witnesses, upon their Petition if they think fit, and Counsel heard in favour of the Bill against such Petition." The question which I desire to bring under the notice of the House is one of considerable general importance. A petition in reference to this Bill has been lodged by various parties—some feuars, some shareholders, and some hotel keepers in Edinburgh—and the object of my Motion is that that petition shall be referred by the House to the Committee on the Bill. It is necessary that I should take that course because by the interpretation put on the Standing Orders by the Court of Referees hotel-keepers would not have a locus standi to oppose the Bill. I am not going to quarrel with the Court of Referees on the application which they have adopted of a somewhat general rule, but I think it will be necessary for the House seriously to consider whether the construction is not far too narrow and entirely contrary to the public interests. The point of objection to the Bill is that it adds to the proper functions of a railway company that which is no part of their business, viz., the business of an hotel-keeper. That statement will be disputed, but no one can read the Bill without seeing that the Company are attempting to obtain powers in an indirect manner. That will be a question for the Committee; but even granted that it is desirable that railway companies should add to their proper business of carriers innumerable other occupations, I think before that is done that those who are interested in the trades which these great monopolists seek to absorb have a right to be heard before the Committee on the subject. I think the policy hitherto adopted of permitting railway companies to undertake all sorts of occupations has been disastrous to shareholders themselves. In America, where railway companies are much more numerous and much more powerful, they have, by the wisdom of the Legislature of the United States, been most rigorously confined to their own business. Every railway company must be a monopoly to a greater or less extent, and the policy of the State ought to be to restrict that monopoly within the narrowest possible limits, and, as far as possible, to bring competition into play, because they know that the public are better served by competition than by any monopoly. Parliament awoke to the necessity of stopping the aggrandizing spirit of railways in regard to steamboat traffic. It appeared at one time as if the whole steamboat traffic of our ports would be absorbed by the railway companies. The Court of Referees, however, held that steamboat owners should be allowed to appear before the Committee as competitors in the business of carrying, and besides that, a Standing Order was introduced under which every railway company which sought for steamboat powers were compelled to put the words "Steamboat Powers" on the title of their Bills, so as to attract attention and give an invitation to steamship owners, to appear and state their views before the Committee. Everyone knows that if there is no petition against a Bill, it is not referred to a Select Committee, and the merits of the question are, therefore, never properly discussed, for however anxious the Chairman of Committees may be to look at the question from the point of view of the public interest, he is not armed with the knowledge that would be brought before the Committee by a genuine opponent. I know that in a number of cases hotel powers have been given to railway companies. It may be thought doubtful whether railway companies should be allowed to become the builders of hotels, but it is certainly bad policy to allow them to become the managers. The business of an hotel keeper depends upon individual energy, and cannot be discharged by a huge joint stock company. And if there is one thing more than another on which both the directors and chairmen of companies refuse to inform their shareholders, it is as to the success of their hotels. In these circumstances one is not uncharitable in hazarding the conclusion that the reason is because they are working them at a loss. This loss has to be borne by the general body of travellers, who do not use the hotel. I do not ask the House to decide the question, or to express an opinion upon it, but simply to allow it to be discussed in Committee, and to allow hotel keepers, and others interested in the measure, to state their case, and to allow the Committee to form a judgment on the whole merits of the question.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That all persons who have presented Petitions against the Bill praying to be heard against the expediency of allowing the North British Railway Company to build a hotel or carry on hotel business in Edinburgh, be heard by themselves, their Counsel, Agents, and Witnesses, upon their Petition if they think fit, and Counsel heard in favour of the Bill against such Petition.”—(Mr. Hunter.)

*MR. BAIRD (Glasgow, Central): The hon. Member for North Aberdeen (Mr. Hunter) professes to be very much in favour of the delegation of the authority of this House; but, at the same time, he is disputing the authority of a tribunal which has already been set up to deal with this very question. To a certain extent, I believe that the Motion of the hon. Member is altogether unnecessary, seeing that there are shareholders of the company who are opposed to my part of the scheme, and who will be entitled to be heard before the Select Committee. The hon. Member has gone into the question of whether railway companies should be allowed to own and manage hotels, but seeing that many of the railway companies do at the present moment hold and manage hotels, I do not see why, in the case of this particular railway company, the same privilege should not be conceded. Moreover, I believe that the hotel which this company propose to establish in Edinburgh will be greatly for the benefit of the public. The whole question was gone into in 1885, and the company obtained permission to alter and remodel their premises at the Waverley Station in Edinburgh. All that they now propose is that they should have permission to apply their capital to these purposes.

MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): The question is not whether the railway company ought, or ought not, to be allowed to build hotels in connection with their system; there are many cases in which it is for the public convenience that railway companies should be allowed to do so; but the question involved in this Bill is a very specific one—namely, whether the Committee who are to inquire into the Bill ought to be bound to hear the complaints of the hotel-keepers of Edinburgh who have establishments within sight of this railway station. It is perfectly well-known that unless some such instruction as this is given the hotel-keepers will have no opportunity of being heard, and will practically have no redress. Everyone who knows anything of Edinburgh must be aware that close to Waverley Station, almost touching the station, there is a cluster of hotels which up to the present time have, at great expense, supplied every accommodation to the travelling public. The sole question is whether these hotel-keepers should through counsel have an opportunity of stating their case. It may be for the public convenience that the railway company should have their own hotel, but it is for the public convenience that when a project of this kind is brought forward those who believe they may be injured by it should have an opportunity of stating their case.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): Hon. Members who have taken part in the debate have overlooked the real point in the question. We are not discussing the question whether this railway company should keep an hotel. Every railway company which has a terminus in London has an hotel, and there are others at York, Glasgow, Chester, Derby, Liverpool, and many other places which have been found of great convenience to the public. It is, therefore, somewhat late in the day to raise the question whether railway companies shall be allowed to keep hotels. The real question involved in the present Bill is whether the company shall be allowed to apply the money of the shareholders for an alteration or rebuilding of an hotel, which they were authorized to do two or three years ago.

MR. COURTNEY: The Bill of 1885 gave express power to the company to alter, enlarge, remodel, and improve their hotel, and the same words are introduced into the present Bill. The power remains exactly where it was. The company have hitherto been unable to apply their capital to this purpose, because they had not obtained the consent of the shareholders. That consent has now been obtained, and the simple proposal in this Bill is to enable the money to be applied to the purposes authorized by the Act of 1885.

Question put, and negatived.

Bill committed.

QUESTIONS.

THE WEST KENT MILITIA.

MR. CORNWALLIS (Maidstone): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether in view of the fact that for several years past the West Kent Militia have been encamped at Shorncliffe for their annual training, that Shorncliffe is at an inconvenient distance from the recruiting centres, that the only reason why the training was transferred to Shorncliffe was the fear of infection from an outbreak of small-pox at Deptford, and that now there is no danger to be apprehended from this cause, he will order the return of the Militia to Maidstone for their training during the coming season?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): Whatever may have been the reason originally for transferring the training of the West Kent Militia from Maidstone to Shorncliffe, all the military authorities concerned, including the officers commanding the battalions, are of opinion that the military advantages of training at Shorncliffe far outweigh any advantages which could accrue from training at Maidstone. I am afraid, therefore, that I cannot revert to the former system.

BAILING PRISONERS COMMITTED FOR TRIAL.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been drawn to the report of the trial, at Winchester Assizes, on Thursday last, of a young woman, who, after having been in gaol two months on a charge of concealment of birth, was acquitted, and "the jury considered that it was hard treatment of the girl to have committed her; the Judge agreed, and said the girl should have been allowed out on her own recognizances;" and, whether he will communicate with the committing magistrates with reference to their conduct in the case?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I am informed by the Clerk of Assize that the facts are as stated. I have called the attention of the committing magistrates to the opinion expressed by the jury and endorsed by the learned Judge.

FATAL ACCIDENTS ON RAILWAYS.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether replies have been received to the Circular Letter of 19th December, drawing attention to the remarks of Major Marindin as to the insufficiency of the rules applying to platelayers; and, if so, from what railway companies; whether any company has sent in to the Board of Trade regulations, either in existence before the Circular Letter or made subsequent to the Circular Letter, which give the protection to platelayers and permanent way men recommended by Major Marindin; whether his attention has been called to the fatal accident on the Cheddesheden goods line of the Midland Railway, near Derby, on 24th January, and to the evidence at the inquest, that no watcher, or flagman, was posted to warn the gang of approaching trains; and, whether any further representation has been made to the Midland Railway Company since this fatal accident, that it is the duty of the company to make further provision, by regulations or otherwise, for the protection of men at work on the permanent way?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BAUGH, Bristol, W.): Yes, Sir; some of the railway companies have sent in replies to the circular referred to; but I understand that the question is being considered by the Traffic Committee of the Clearing House, and I am awaiting the result of their deliberations before deciding what further action to take. As regards the accident referred to, which took place on January 24, I have seen the Coroner's Return, but not the evidence taken at the inquest. From the remarks of the Coroner I learn that it was the duty of one of the unfortunate men who were killed to send out a flagman for the purpose of preventing any accident, but that on the morning in question he had not done so.

THE RECENT FLOODS.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, North-wich): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Local Government Board whether, after the experience of last week's floods, the Government are now prepared to encourage the newly-formed County Councils to establish a system of telegraphic storm warnings from the upper reaches of rivers to the low-lying districts below?

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. LONG, Wilts, Devizes): The Government are prepared to consider any representation which may be made by any County Council on the subject referred to.

IRELAND—DR. BARR.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether a letter published in the Times newspaper of Saturday, March 9th, signed "James Barr," was written by a medical officer employed in Her Majesty's prisons; whether the writer is the person who was employed impartially to advise the Irish Government on the prison treatment of Mr. Mandeville and other prisoners connected with a political movement in Ireland; whether this letter was written with the authority and the knowledge of the Secretary of State; whether the rule against communicating to the public press by persons employed in the Civil Service on controversial matters relating to their department, which was acted upon in the case of the late Chief Commissioner of Police, applies also to medical officers in the prisons; if this letter is approved by the Secretary of State, was it by his direction that the Times newspaper was selected as the organ for its publication; and, what course does he propose to take with regard to the writer of this letter?

MR. MATTHEWS: The letter in question was written by a medical practitioner who gives part of his time to the duties of medical officer of one of Her Majesty's prisons. It was published without the knowledge or authority of the Secretary of State. The rule against private publications on matters relating to a department by officers attached to the department has been issued to the prisons service, and applies to those portions of Dr. Barr's letter which deal with English prison administration. Dr. Barr is the person who undertook a duty outside his official employment—namely, that of inquiring into the administration of prison rules in Ireland as compared with the English prison administration. He was subjected to virulent and undeserved personal attack for his performance of his duty. I am informed that the substance of his letter to the Times had been already given in evidence by himself and Captain Stopford at Mitchelstown. I have drawn Dr. Barr's attention to the rule against publications by official persons, and have requested him to observe it in the future.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I beg to give notice that in consequence of the answer of the right hon. Gentleman I shall take the earliest opportunity of calling the attention of this House to the conduct of Dr. Barr, and his unfitness, from his bitter partizanship, to remain in the employment of the country.

GERMANY AND SAMOA.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College Division): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to the following statements contained in a letter headed "Recent German doings in Samoa," and signed "Robert Louis Stevenson," published in the Times of the 11th inst.: that the British Consul at Apia having protested against a Proclamation by the German Consul arbitrarily suspending all authority except that of the German representative, the latter replied by a threatening proclamation "closing with a buffet the mouth of the English Consul"; that, in the course of these (recent) events, the German flag "has been at least once substituted for the English; that an English artist who had been sketching in Malietoa's Camp "was forcibly seized on board the British packet Richmond, carried half dressed on board the Adler, and detained there in spite of all protest until an English war ship had been cleared for action"; whether there is any truth in these statements, and especially in the third; and whether he will lay before Parliament Papers relating to recent occurrences in Samoa?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): I have seen Mr. Stevenson's letter. The statement is substantially correct; but I should add that the German Government have spontaneously disavowed the action of their Consul General, and he has since been recalled. The property referred to is probably a house which is in dispute, and is the subject of discussion. We have heard of the removal of British subjects from the Richmond by German armed boats to the Adler, and their subsequent release on the demand of the British naval commander. We know nothing about his having cleared for action. The German Government were asked for explanations, and replied that the German civil and naval authorities in Samoa have been instructed by telegraph not to subject the foreigners settled in Samoa to martial law, and to refrain from searching foreign ships for contraband of war. Papers are in course of preparation, and will be laid on the Table in the course of a few days.

DR. CAMERON: Are we to understand that we shall have Papers giving full particulars relating to the abduction of this British subject by the Germans?

*SIR J. FERGUSON: Yes; that transaction will be covered by the Papers.

MR. W. A. MCARTHUR (Cornwall, Mid, St. Austell): Can the right hon. Baronet give us the names of the Commissioners?

*SIR J. FERGUSON: I stated yesterday that as the date of the Conference has not been fixed, it would be premature to name the Commissioners. I am unable to say when I shall be able to name them, indeed, the number on each side has not yet been fixed.

THE PROCURATOR FISCAL OF SKYE.

DR. CAMERON: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what was the amount of the payment made by the Treasury to Mr. M'Lennon, Procurator Fiscal of Skye, in respect of expenses incurred by him in defending the action "Macpherson v. M'Lennon;" at what date was it made; and out of what Vote was it paid?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The amount was £59 8s. 11d. The Treasury authority for payment is dated April 9, 1888, and the payment was made shortly after from the Vote for Lord Advocate and Criminal Proceedings, Scotland.

VOLUNTEERS AT ALDERSHOT.

MR. ALLISON (Cumberland, Eakdale): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what number of Volunteer Troops was attached to the Aldershot Division in August, 1888; what was the cost involved to the Department; and, whether the permission to do so is to be continued during the present year.

MR. E. STANHOPE: In August last 4,291 Volunteers were attached to the Aldershot Division at a cost of £4,226. There will be no drill this year at Aldershot similar to that of last year; but it is hoped that some of the brigades may be exercised there.

CANNON CARTRIDGE BAGS.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL SANDYS (Lancashire, S.W., Bootle): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is the case that the material of which our cannon powder cartridge bags is made, is all manufactured and imported from abroad; whether it can be at present manufactured in the United Kingdom; and, if so, whether he has any objection to take steps to promote the manufacture of this silk cloth material in England, in order that in the event of war our heavy ordnance may be supplied with cartridge bags made from materials of British manufacture?

MR. E. STANHOPE: The silk cloth used for cannon cartridges is of foreign manufacture, and was adopted because it leaves no residue in the gun after firing. Some years ago two firms in Bradford commenced manufacturing it, but ceased to do so because they could not approach the foreign prices. We have, however, a standing contract with Messrs. Cochrane, of Paisley, for the supply of 300 yards per fortnight, and endeavours have been made to induce some Nottinghamshire firms to take up the manufacture. A considerable stock of this silk cloth is always kept up so as to be secure against emergencies.

ROYAL NAVAL RESERVE BATTERY AT WICK.

Mr. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rolox): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether any negotiations are pending with the view of transferring from Wick to Thurso the Royal Naval Reserve Battery which has been established at Wick at considerable expense for over 12 years; or if there is any correspondence with the Admiralty there as yet?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Midlesex, Ealing): The question of transferring the Royal Naval Reserve Battery from Wick to Thurso has never been raised that the Admiralty are aware of, and there is no correspondence on the subject.

THE NAVAL PROGRAMME.

Mr. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he can state approximately what is likely to be the annual increase of expenditure per annum for repairs, salaries, wages, provisions, pensions, &c., when all the ships that he contemplated building have been added to the Navy?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: The Question of the hon. Gentleman divides itself into two heads—the increase of cost for manning the new vessels, and the cost of their maintenance and repair. We estimate that for the first purpose it will be necessary during the next five years to increase the Vote for men in the aggregate by 5,000, and an approximate estimate of the cost of their pay and provisions will be between £250,000 and £300,000 spread over that time. I have not had time to have an estimate of their pensions calculated. The cost of repairing the new ships may roughly be calculated on the following basis. The older ironclads which have been constantly in commission, and the life of whose boilers is much shorter than that of ships of the most modern type, cost in maintenance and repair about 2 per cent per annum on original cost of construction; the cost of cruisers and other vessels is considerably less. A large proportion of these new vessels will not be constantly in commission, and their boilers will last longer than those of the vessels they replace. A deduction may, therefore, fairly be looked for in regard to both these points from the average estimate I have given. For the first few years that new vessels are in use the cost of repair and maintenance is very small.

FREE MONEY ORDERS.

SIR J. COLOMB (for Mr. HENRIK HEATON): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Post Office revenue is recouped the cost direct or indirect, of the free money orders issued for Inland Revenue purposes and how many of the free money orders are issued in the nine months up to December 31, 1888, and if the number is increasing; and whether a sum of about one million and a half sterling was recovered by the Post Office during the last 12 months on accounts of the Inland Revenue, and what amount was transferred from the Inland Revenue to the Post Office for this service?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The number of free money orders issued for the Inland Revenue purposes was 253,107 in the nine months ending December 31, 1888, and the number is increasing. The Post Office Revenue was not recouped directly or indirectly the cost of these orders. Such a course would be contrary to the well-established rule that one public department does not make payments to another public department services rendered to it by that other.

IRELAND—THE MURDER OF DISTRICT INSPECTOR MARTIN.

Mr. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether, under the Constabulary Regulations, any provision is made for the families of officers or men who may be killed or injured in the execution of their duty; and whether any provision will be made for the widow of the late District Inspector Martin, who was murdered at Gweedore on the occasion of the arrest of the Rev. James M'Fadden?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, East): The Constabulary regulations do not make any provision for the families of officers who may be killed in the execution of their duty. In the cases of men who are killed, or who die while serving in the force, provision is made for their families. In the cases of officers or men who may be injured in the discharge of their duty to an extent to prevent their continuance in the service, the officer or man is retired with a pension, or gratuity, according to the circumstances. As regards the case of the widow of the late District Inspector Martin, the Irish Government have recommended to the Treasury that she be granted a pension, and the matter is now under consideration.

THE IMPRISONMENT OF MR. DUNLEAVY.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether his attention has been called to the following statement in the Leeds Mercury of the 8th inst—

“Mr. J. S. Dunleavy, editor of the Clare Independent, was recently sentenced to three months' imprisonment. This was the charge—‘Obstructing a policeman by laughing at him.’ And this is how Mr. Dunleavy is treated in prison—‘He is confined in a flag cell without matting. His application for furniture has been refused by the Visiting Committee. His sleeping accommodation is a hammock. The rest of the furniture in the cell is a stool.’”

Whether he can state of what offence Mr. Dunleavy was convicted, and what is the true character of his treatment in prison?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Proceedings were taken against Mr. Dunleavy under the ordinary law, not for laughing at a policeman, but for conduct calculated to lead to a breach of the peace in unlawfully abusing a police constable while in the execution of his duty. He was ordered to find bail to keep the peace, and be of good behaviour. This he refused to do, electing to go to prison for three months. He has been treated in prison under the rules for prisoners awaiting trial, and on the 5th inst., being the first meeting of the Visiting Committee after he was transferred to Tullamore, he was, on his application, granted by them privileges which included permission to furnish his cell, to receive certain daily and weekly publications, permission to write, the use of books, and permission to smoke twice daily. He has, however, only partially availed himself of the permission to furnish his cell, preferring to sleep on the prison hammock, which, he states, is very comfortable; and, further, although under the rules for prisoners of his class he could provide his own food, he only does so for the dinner meal, being apparently quite satisfied with the prison diet for breakfast and supper.

THE PONSONBY ESTATE.

MR. LANE (Cork County, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been drawn to a reported sale of the Ponsonby Estate to a London syndicate, of which the hon. Member for South Huntingdon is a member; whether he is aware that this transaction took place at a time when negotiations for a purchase scheme were far advanced between Mr. Ponsonby and his tenants, and that it is stated, on behalf of the purchasers, that they bought this property to prevent the sale to the tenants, because the proposed terms would reduce the price of land in the district; whether there are over 300 tenants on this property, some of them holding farms which have been in possession of their families 200 years and upwards; and, whether, in the event of any evictions taking place on this property, the forces of the Crown will be lent to this syndicate?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have seen the report, but have no official knowledge on the subject of this or the next paragraph. I will make inquiries, if the hon. Member wishes it, into the Questions asked in the third paragraph. I am not aware that any transaction of the kind referred to would alter either the status of the tenants, or the duty of the Government to support the Sheriff in the execution of the decrees of a Court.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I should like to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman is aware that negotiations for a settlement in this case had proceeded so far when Mr. Smith Barry and his confederates intervened; that the agent on the 21st of last month stated that he hoped his efforts for a settlement would not be in vain; and as this appeared to be a conspiracy on the part of a body of landlords to prevent a settlement being come to between an Irish landlord and his tenants in a district where a conflict had been proceeding for two years, I beg to ask whether, as a matter of public policy, the right hon. Gentleman will have any objection to make some representation to Mr. Smith Barry and his confederates in regard to their intervention, which may result in the clearing away of inhabitants of the district, producing something like a state of civil war in the district?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not agree with the peculiar use of the word "conspiracy." As regards the latter part of the Question, I consider that to act as suggested would be an unwarrantable intrusion on my part in private affairs.

MR. LANE: May I ask if the right hon. Gentleman is aware that while the negotiations between the tenants and the landlord were in progress Mr. Smith Barry declared at a banquet in Cork that Ponsonby would never settle with his tenants; and whether on the following day Mr. Ponsonby's agent telegraphed in reply to Rev. Canon Keller, who had charge of the arrangements for the tenants, to the effect that the statement was utterly unauthorized?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I think the hon. Gentleman had better put the Question on the Paper: it is not a Question likely to be answered off hand.

MR. LANE: I will put the Question down.

THE SPECIAL COMMISSION.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether Mr. Joyce, Mr. Shannon, and Mr. Horne are the three Resident Magistrates specially charged with carrying out inquiries under Section 1 of the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act; whether those gentlemen, or some of them, have been engaged in assisting the Times to obtain evidence; whether Mr. Horne was so engaged before the sitting of the Special Commission; how long he has been so engaged; whether he obtained leave from his ordinary duties at Westport for that purpose; and when such leave was first obtained; whether a district inspector of Constabulary was engaged in each divisional district in assisting the Times to procure evidence, or in some other relation to the Times case?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Resident Magistrates named in the first paragraph are not specially charged with carrying out inquiries under Section 1 of the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act; but they are, among others, legally qualified to hold such inquiries when called upon. So far as I am aware, they have not been engaged in assisting the Times to obtain evidence. No doubt they have rendered, and will render, any assistance in their power with a view to the elucidation of the various matters now under investigation before the Special Commission. Mr. Joyce and Mr. Horne were engaged in examining papers and statistics, &c., connected with crime in Ireland, in order that particulars could be furnished upon application being made either by the Commission or any of the parties appearing before it. It is not true that a district inspector was engaged in each division in assisting the Times to procure evidence. It is true that several district inspectors were engaged in tabulating information already in possession of the police—an obviously proper proceeding. And I have no doubt that all officers and men of the Royal Irish Constabulary upon demand give all proper information in their possession which is relevant to the inquiry.

MR. J. MORLEY: Do I understand that these magistrates and officers did nothing but tabulate statistics already in the possession of the police?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That is the only thing, so far as I know, and as far as I am concerned, in which they did anything. But of course those subpoenaed by the Times, no doubt, as I have said, gave all the information in their power.

MR. J. MORLEY: To whom?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: To the persons who asked them for it.

MR. J. MORLEY: Who were they?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no knowledge of these facts at all. I have laid down a general principle, which I apprehend is right, that it is their duty to aid in the inquiry now going on before the Commission. So far as I am concerned, the only work they were engaged upon was this tabulated work.

MR. J. MORLEY: Is it not true that these officers volunteered to give information to the Times?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no knowledge of that.

NAVAL EXPENDITURE.—CONTRIBUTIONS OF COLONIAL GOVERNMENTS.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty what is now the estimated cost of the ships building under agreement with the Australian Colonies, and how much of this will fall upon the Imperial Government; what will be the amount paid in respect of these vessels to contractors during the present year, how much will be paid during the year 1889-90, and what will remain over for next year?

*LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: The estimated cost of the Australian ships, including armaments, is £850,000. About £280,000 will be paid in respect of these ships in 1888-89, and the remainder should be earned in the subsequent year by the contractors. The Colonies pay for 10 years an annuity of £35,000 towards the cost of the construction of these vessels, and the cost of their maintenance up to the annual sum of £91,000.

IRELAND—MR. DAVITT AND SIR W. HARCOURT.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether he has seen a letter in the Freeman's Journal of yesterday, purporting to be signed by Michael Davitt, reflecting upon the injured innocence of Sir William Harcourt, and whether there is any reason to believe this letter is a wicked forgery?

MR. SEXTON: Mr. Speaker, may I ask you, Sir, whether it is proper that a Question of this kind, reflecting upon a Member of the House, should be put without notice?

*MR. SPEAKER: The Question is one that cannot be put.

PROCEEDINGS IN THE HOUSE, MONDAY, 12 MARCH—CORRECTION OF THE VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS (Merionethshire): I wish to ask you, Mr. Speaker, a question with regard to the Votes and Proceedings which were issued this morning. Last evening, after the Motion was made to report Progress, the Chancellor of the Exchequer claimed "that the Question be now put." Assent to that was withheld by the hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Committees, but I find no record of it in the Votes. I beg respectfully to ask whether it is not proper that some record of the matter should appear in the Votes?

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member was good enough to consult me upon the subject, and I have made inquiry. So far as I can learn what took place, while the House was in Committee, it appears that the Chancellor of the Exchequer did indicate his intention to move "that the Question be now put." (Several hon. MEMBERS:—[He moved it.] In my opinion the intention was sufficiently indicated and ought to appear in the Votes. The omission will be rectified in the next issue.

FATHER BYRNE AND LIEUTENANT GEOGHEGAN.

MR. THEOBALD (Essex, Romford): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland a Question of which I have given him private notice—namely, whether Father Byrne has issued a summons against Lieutenant Geoghegan for creating a disturbance in his church; and on what ground he has done so, when the disturbance was created by Father Byrne, who incited the soldiers to mutinous conduct?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Question was not put into my hands until I came into the House, and I have had no information to enable me to answer it. If the hon. Member will put the Question on the paper I will endeavour to answer that part of it which does not deal with any question which is before the Courts.

MR. SEXTON: Is the law now open to Father Byrne as well as to any other subject of the Queen?

THE LAND COMMISSION.

MR. LANE, for Mr. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland how many fair rent applications lodged with the Land Commission from the county Cork are still unheard, including applications by leaseholders; whether it is the case that, since the passing of the Land Act of 1887, the county Cork has had a Sub-Commission to itself, but that within the past two months the county Waterford was added to the district of this Sub-Commission; why this was done, having regard to the enormous arrears of land cases in county Cork; whether it is the case that the county Cork is now worse than before the recent appointment of additional Sub-Commissioners; what is the average number of Poor Law Unions at present included in the circuit of a Sub-Commission, and what number of Unions are now included in the circuit of the Cork Sub-Commission; and, whether he is aware that the effect of including so large an area in the circuit of this Commission has been to greatly hamper its capacity for disposing of business, in consequence of the long distances between the different sittings?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners inform me that the number of fair-rent applications from county Cork undisposed of by the Land Commission on the 1st inst. was 5,041. A Sub-Commission has sat more continuously in the county Cork since the 1st of November, 1887, than in any other county. The Sub-Commission at first consisted of four laymen. This number was increased to six in September, 1888. In February last two of the Assistant-Commissioners were transferred to the county Waterford, partly in respect of cases in unions which lie in both counties, and partly on the ground that there had been no sitting in part of Waterford for a considerable period—since November, 1887. The pair now in Waterford will soon return to Cork. The circuits of the Sub-Commissions are not fixed with regard to the average number of Poor Law Unions to be included in each, as the number of rent cases to be disposed of in each union always largely differs. At present there are as many Assistant Commissioners working in the county Cork as there were during the period from the 1st of November, 1887, to end of July, 1888.

THE MEMBER FOR ROCHESTER.

MR. PATRICK JOSEPH O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Member for Rochester has applied for the Chiltern Hundreds, or in any other form acquainted the Government of his intention to vacate his seat; and, if not, whether it is the intention of the Government to take any steps in the matter?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The Chancellor of the Exchequer, to whom such applications are made, has informed me that no application has been made by the hon. Member for Rochester.

MR. THEOBALD: May I ask whether Members of Parliament who have been sent to prison, or are constantly being in prison, have applied for the Chiltern Hundreds?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not aware whether any such application has or has not been made.

NEW WRIT.

New Writ for South East Lancashire (Gorton Division), in the room of Richard Peacock, Esquire, deceased, was moved for.

MOTIONS.

PRIVATE BILL COMMISSIONERS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Craig Sellar, Bill for establishing a Commission to examine and report on Private Bills in Parliament, and for other matters relating thereto, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Craig Sellar, Sir John Mowbray, Mr. John Morley, Sir Lyon Playfair, Mr. Howorth, and Mr. Arthur Elliot.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 153.]

VOTE 1.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a number of Land Forces, not exceeding 152,282, all ranks, be maintained for the Service of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland at Home and Abroad, excluding Her Majesty's Indian Possessions, during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1890.”

Whereupon Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a number of Land Forces, not exceeding 149,667, all ranks, be maintained for Service of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland at Home and Abroad, excluding Her Majesty's Indian Possessions, during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1890.”—(Mr. Picton.)

Debate resumed.

*SIR W. BARTTELOT (Sussex, N.W.): I think there is no one who will deny that the House has had put before it, in the statements of my noble Friend at the head of the Admiralty and of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War, a clear explanation of the policy of Her Majesty's Government in regard to the Army and the Navy. No one will deny the importance of the Navy, or that the Navy should be maintained in such a position so as to be able to command the seas wherever it may be placed. The question that we have more immediately to deal with, however, is that of the Army Estimates, and I think that when we look broadly at the question, and when we consider what has been done, or rather what has not been done, in days gone by, we shall not consider the sum asked for excessive. I certainly was surprised when I heard the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord R. Churchill) say that if the Army Estimates are to be increased as is proposed that certainly would show that the Navy Estimates ought not to be increased. Even hon. Gentlemen opposite who take a very different view to that which I hold in regard to these matters will admit that, considering the position of this country at the present moment in regard to its food supply, it is absolutely necessary that we should have command of the sea. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) last night referred to the Motion which was brought forward last year by me for a Commission with regard to the defences of the country, and expressed his approval of the action of the Government in opposing that Motion. But though the Commission was not granted, there can be no doubt that if it had not been for the discussion that took place on that Motion there would neither have been the Commission to inquire into the working of the War Office and Admiralty, presided over by the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale, nor the Committee of the Cabinet, to whose Report it may be assumed that the present proposals of the Government are due. May I ask my right hon. Friend (Mr. Stanhope) in what position is the Commission at the present moment, and whether it is likely soon to report, because the questions referred to it, such as the relations between the War Office and the Admiralty are grave questions, and the sooner the House knows the exact opinion of the Commission on matters of that sort the better it will be for the country. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman), it is right that the Cabinet should take questions of this kind into their consideration. The noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill) said he knew the opinions of the Cabinet, but not the opinions of their military advisers. I think the country and the House would like to know what were the recommendations and what were the opinions of the military and naval advisers? I cannot but think that these opinions are in unison with the opinion of the Cabinet, and if so it is well that they should be expressed so that the country may know whether the Government are carrying out the defences of the country on the lines which those who are best able to judge have recommended to the Cabinet as being essential to the welfare of the Empire. The Secretary of State for War has suggested a scheme of defence which will employ more or less all the forces which are to be found in this country, especially the Auxiliary Forces. He has told us it will take 124,000 men to garrison and maintain the different positions that are held to be of vital importance to the country. One thing I should like to say is this: 124,000 men, mainly of the Auxiliary Forces, are to occupy these various positions. Why not call out these men and let them see the positions they are to occupy? That would cost the country nothing, as the men, generally speaking, are to be found in the neighbourhood where they will be called upon to perform their duties. The Militia, which I do not think has received that attention which it ought to receive, when it is called out for its annual training, could be sent to work at those positions, and the country would know that the men were there and were likely to be efficient, and do the work required of them properly and efficiently. My right hon. Friend has also organized the Volunteers by Brigades, and there are certain Brigades, I presume, that are to go into line of battle in case of absolute necessity. I saw in a military paper that the War Office are only going to allow a certain portion of the Brigades to assemble. A more short-sighted policy could not possibly be found, because you would find a large number of men discontented if they are not allowed to go out with the battalion if it is called out for any purpose of the kind. The Brigade-Majors, too, are to be paid so small an amount that they will not like to accept the positions which will be offered to them. Efficient officers are absolutely necessary, and I hope there will be no false economy in so small a matter. The right hon. Gentleman has spoken of earthworks which are to be erected. I hope he is not going to leave the construction of such works until the day of danger arrives. Earthworks are not costly in construction, and it would be much better for the men to know where the works are, and what they would have to do if danger arose. So much for the Volunteers. As to the Militia, I hope that some steps will be taken to put them in a more effective condition. Some regiments are excellent, but some are not up to the mark. I regard it to be the duty of the Government to organize all the forces we have at our disposal, especially those remarkably cheap forces—the Militia and Volunteers. Now, the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Picton) has moved an Amendment to reduce the number of men by 2,600. What are these men required for? They are to maintain our garrisons in the Mediterranean and elsewhere, at stations necessary for the safety of the Empire. Some men talk as if we were going to hold aloof from everything happening elsewhere; but history shows that that is impossible. Nothing could be more detrimental to the working classes than that this country should sustain anything like an Imperial reverse, and especially that anything should happen to our stations in the Mediterranean, and at the Cape which are so necessary for the maintenance of our highway to India, Australia, and other possessions. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) could not support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Leicester, but he sympathized with the object of the hon. Member, because he thought there ought to be no increase in the Estimates. If we intend to preserve our coaling stations, we require greater garrisons, and, therefore, I welcome the propositions of the Government upon this point. But upon the question of the Reserve I was sorry to hear what my right hon. Friend said. I hold it to be a positive duty of any Government to see that the Reserve is effective and efficient. Every man ought to be inspected, to see that he is effective and efficient, to see that he knows what his drill is. It is to a large and effective reserve of Army men and to our Auxiliary Forces that I look for a continuance of our freedom from conscription. We have only to look at Germany and France to see how the heart of the nation is eaten out by conscription, and how the women of both Germany and France are called upon to perform those duties which, if it were not for conscription, might, and ought to be, performed by men. Let me now turn to the question of Artillery. Do not let us blink the question that our Artillery is not what it was in former days when we had muzzle-loading guns. I think a step in the right direction is to make a distinction between the Garrison and the Horse and Field Artillery.

Men dislike going into the Garrison Artillery because they are deprived of opportunities of distinction. Something ought really to be done to make garrison service attractive, and to encourage men to learn the work. As it is every officer of Artillery does all in his power to avoid serving in the Garrison artillery, where scientific training is absolutely necessary in handling the enormous guns we now have; where also he finds himself in worse quarters; and where as soon as he is appointed, he endeavours not to learn his work, but to get into the Horse or Field Artillery as soon as possible. I desire to congratulate the Secretary for War on his determination to distribute to the Artillery 12-pounder guns, which, I am told, are the best arms of the kind in the world. I quite agree, too, that the Army and Navy should each have the duty of ordering its own guns. As to the Cavalry, I think every regiment ought to be made up to its full strength. In this island we may not require so many regiments, but the time may come when we may have to send Cavalry at a moment's notice for one or two Army Corps abroad. We might very properly copy either France or Germany, who look upon a reserve of Cavalry or Artillery as of no use until they had gone into training again. and therefore keep all their regiments of Cavalry and also their Horse and Field Artillery up to war strength. I do not agree with my hon. and gallant Friend, the Member for South Hampshire (Sir F. FitzWigram), that it would be well to decrease the number of regiments, but I do agree with him that all ought to be kept up to full war strength. In the next place, I must protest against the Home Army being used to feed regiments in India. We ought to have for the Indian regiments separate depôts of older men, enlisted for a longer time than men are enlisted for home service. I suppose the 80,000 we are to have available will be exclusive not only of the 30,000 in Ireland, but also of the Army Reserve, or else we are doing nothing at all. If the Reserve men are called into the first line, how will gaps, which any campaign will naturally make, be filled up? I have asked before that we might see one of those Army Corps; and I think Aldershot is the proper place for the men to assemble. I cannot, for the life of me, see why an Army Corps, which might be sent abroad, we will say, in the course of a month, should not be assembled now and then at Aldershot, under those officers under whom it would serve. Each regiment—at any rate a certain number of regiments—should have five squadrons, and one of these squadrons, in the event of a regiment going on service, should remain at home for the depôt. My hon. and gallant Friend went so fully into the numbers of a regiment that I will say nothing on that point. Now, I have not heard a very great deal about the transport, and I am rather anxious about that. My right hon. Friend told us that all stores were to be decentralized. I think that that is a most desirable thing to be done, but I should like to ask him who is to be responsible for those decentralized stores? Are they to go into a particular district, commanded by a General Officer, who will be responsible for them, and see that the men have what they require in the event of an emergency arising? That is a point worthy of serious consideration. If they were to be surrounded by all the difficulties in getting at stores that at present exist, the gravest danger will arise in case of any emergency suddenly confronting us. I think, too, we ought to see that the Transport for the First Army Corps is in a state of efficiency. We are told by the right hon. Gentleman that he has 14,000 horses upon the register. But is nothing more to be done? If the Cavalry and Artillery have not their full and proper strength of horses, and if the Transport is not, at least, moderately complete in that respect; and if, as a consequence, these 14,000 horses are to be brought into use, how many will be fit for the work, and how many will be able to draw and take the heavy burdens which they will have to bear without notice? This is a matter which deserves serious consideration at the hands of the right hon. Gentleman. At any rate, he should insure that the Cavalry is always fully mounted. I think it right to make these few remarks, because we have had so many Armies on paper, and I desire now that we should have a real and efficient Army. I will conclude by making one remark, and it is upon a question which has occupied the attention of soldiers for many years. The barracks were bad when I first entered the Army in 1839, and you may depend upon it they have not improved in condition since then. This is one of those cases which does not brook delay; it is one of those things which the Army have a right to demand and we are bound to grant. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Leicester and those who sit immediately behind him would, if prisoners were confined in gaols absolutely unfit for human habitation, make a great outcry, yet they do not seem to care whether money is found to provide proper lodging for our soldiers. A right hon. Gentleman last night found fault with the Secretary for War because he did not know exactly what would be the amount of money which would have to be spent on the barracks in order to put them in proper condition. But even the matter of barrack accommodation requires proper organization. It is necessary they should be placed in large centres, in close proximity to railways, so that the troops may be moved without difficulty; and I do hope that the scheme which the right hon. Gentleman will place before the House will be one which, when carried out, will put the barracks into a condition to last at least a century. I venture to hope that the House will never hesitate to do that which is necessary for the health, welfare, and well-being of our troops. I do not doubt my right hon. Friend will not spend any more than is absolutely necessary for the improvement of our barrack accommodation, and that what is necessary will be placed unreservedly at his disposal by the House.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): I desire, Sir, to revive the Amendment I moved yesterday, and I wish also to say one or two words in explanation. The hon. and gallant Baronet has referred to the necessity for improving the barrack accommodation, and has taunted us on this side of the House with being careless on the subject. But, Sir, we are not careless on the subject, and we should not object to any reasonable expenditure. If we have soldiers we must give them proper barracks. I trust, Sir, we shall not be thus taunted again. My Motion does not refer to the question of barrack accommodation. I moved that the number of men should be reduced by 2,615 men, which is the exact increase proposed this year. I object to the people of this country being called upon to pay for more soldiers, and I desire to hear something of the policy which requires this increase. I fear that it is a policy of aggression. The right hon. Gentleman has alluded to the possibility of a great emergency, and I should like to have some explanation as to that.

*GENERAL SIR E. B. HAMLEY: The right hon. Gentleman has given us a clear outline of parts of what may become a very comprehensive scheme. I say "may become," for we must remember that the object of all the measures which he has described can only be to bring the forces of the Kingdom, with the fullest effect which preparation can give, against an invader; and that these and all other such measures must be judged by the degree in which they promise to accomplish that result. But the only result which the right hon. Gentleman has pointed to is the occupation of certain positions round London where, in a few days, the defenders of London could be concentrated and entrenched. Now, there are two ways of looking at the defence of London, either as a duty to be undertaken by a comparatively small body of troops specially devoted to the purpose, and operating as near the capital as the conditions of ground and the spread of streets and houses will admit of; or, the interposing of the Field Army between London and the advancing enemy. In this latter case, the term "Defence of London" can only be applicable in the sense that the ultimate object of an invader must be to seize the capital, and that all operations against him may be said to be in its defence; but in this case the phrase loses its distinctive meaning, and is, in fact, misleading. But it is this latter case which the right hon. Gentleman appears to contemplate; he seems to speak of assembling the Field Army and the field portion of the Auxiliary Forces in these positions, in order to deliver there a decisive battle. But he also tells us that these positions are "round London," which must mean near London. Now, to choose ground near London for the first concentration of the Army would leave great part of the South of England to the mercy of the enemy. If he had said that he meant to make here an ultimate stand for the defence of London his intention would have been clear, and in that case it would be well to strengthen the position, as he proposes, with works in which the Volunteers might most effectively co-operate with the regular troops. But the first concentration should take place as near as possible to the enemy's place of debarkation.

MR. E. STANHOPE: Nothing that I said was at all inconsistent with that. I especially reserved the Field Army as separate from the Volunteers, who would occupy this position.

*GENERAL SIR E. HAMLEY: To enable the Field Army to concentrate, by road and rail, on the menaced point, must be the primary object of our efforts. And in mentioning rail, I would say that the right hon. Gentleman's explanation would have been more complete if he had told us how he meant to bring the railways into the general scheme of defence. Again, when the right hon. Gentleman described the excellent and necessary step he had taken of dividing the stores of the Army and placing them at many points for ready distribution to the troops, we should have been glad if he could have told us also the selection of the points on lines of railway where magazines might be placed for ammunition. As to the assembling of the troops, I have no doubt that by the arrangement of Sir Redvers Buller this could be successfully accomplished in a very short time. In this connection the right hon. Gentleman made mention of the Reserves. He told the House how he wished, and properly so, to give them opportunities of exercise, but he also explained the difficulties he had found in the way. If for Reserve men we read Volunteers the case equally applies, and therefore I trust that the right hon. Gentleman is now convinced that I and other hon. Members were justified in the course which we felt ourselves obliged to take last year in opposing certain steps of his intended to invite the Volunteers to submit to fresh liabilities. With regard to the guns with which he proposes to supply the Volunteers, the right hon. Gentleman says that their value has been decried. This is unjust, because they are all that we have which are available and suitable. He then tells us that their calibre is more powerful than that of any which an invader could bring against them. But, in answer to this, I must observe that the power of guns does not depend upon their calibre alone; it also depends upon their range; and, supposing the enemy's artillery to be of superior range, he might take up a position beyond the range of our guns, and yet have our position within the range of his. I mention this only to show that they are only the best we now possess, and should be replaced by better ones; but I also admit that other kinds of guns are more pressingly needed. Some Members opposite object to the Estimates, because they are too large. For my own part, however, I lament that the right hon. Gentleman has not seen his way to repeat the loan which he obtained last year, because I believe the country was never in a better frame of mind to grant cheerfully all that may be necessary for our defence. All that the country desires is to be convinced that the steps proposed are necessary. This brings me to another point of great importance—namely, the defence of our commercial ports. The right hon. Gentleman has spoken of the progress made in supplying these ports with submarine mines, but other things are necessary, namely, long-range guns to keep off a hostile cruiser, and to protect our floating defences and the works in which to place them. The right hon. Gentleman tells us he has made proposals to the municipal authorities of these ports, suggesting that they should bear their share of the expense, and he added that those proposals have been rejected. This I was very sorry to hear, because I wanted to see the commercial ports take a generous part in this enterprise. It appears that on the failure of the negotiations the project was brought to a standstill, but I would represent that the completion of these defences is anxiously looked for by the public. The results of some of the late naval manoeuvres have strongly fixed attention upon this subject. Perhaps the postponement of this and other measures may be, in some measure, due to a certain theory which has been put forth by a school of naval opinion, with the best intention, I believe, but which is so extreme that it may be called extravagant. The theory is that we should abandon every kind of land defence in order to concentrate our resources on the Navy. They affirm that if the Navy suffer defeat we have no further hope; that in a few weeks we should be starved into surrender: that no invasion is necessary to complete the conquest of this country; and that no amount of Land Forces would serve to avert our fate. The men who maintain this also state that the Navy is insufficient to protect us. If hon. Members put these two affirmations together—first, that the Navy is all in all, and, secondly, that it is incompetent to protect us—they will see that we have a very alarming prospect before us; so alarming that it is a good service to inquire whether it is true; therefore, with all the diffidence which a landsman must feel in opposing naval opinion, and with all deference to the decision which naval opinion may ultimately arrive at, I will venture to state the case thus. We have two kinds of naval defence. We have a fleet of battle-ships to meet the enemy's in a general engagement, and we have ocean cruisers to protect our trade lines against the enemy's cruisers. These two kinds of defence are distinct and separate. Now, supposing that our ironclad fleet has suffered such a series of discomfitures as to be driven to take shelter in our fortified harbours, it could not be imagined that the enemy could have effected that result without being himself in a crippled condition. Would he, with what remained of his fleet, undertake the blockade of all our important harbours throughout the whole extent of our shores? If he did, he would offer us an opportunity of attacking him in detail with the serviceable ships still remaining to us. Or would he take the alternative course, and collect his ships in one or two squadrons with which to attack our merchant vessels laden with food? Now, I confess that an attempt to intercept with ironclads swift ocean steamers, having such an extent of coast to make for, and such a large space of open sea in which to make for that coast, seems to me to be an impossibility. In any case, the theory that the defeat of our battle fleet would entail the destruction of our commerce and the cutting off of our food supplies is one of such a formidable nature that we cannot accept it unless it is absolutely brought home to us by proof. Assuming that there is a flaw in this reasoning, and that we shall still be able to receive our food supplies although our fleet had suffered disaster, it appears to me that we cannot too soon set about completing the defences of our commercial ports. It needs no argument to prove what an advantage it would be to ships making for those ports to find the ports open to them and closed to the enemy. But there is another point to consider in this relation. The advocates of the policy of abandoning all other attempts at defence except increasing the Navy would have much more reason on their side if we could go at once into the market and buy any number of warships ready made and armed and manned. I, for one, should in that case be most earnestly desirous of putting all the public money that can be made available into this truly national investment. But we know that even the approach to a sufficient fleet which is at length so happily to be made cannot take full effect for four years and a-half. What of the interval? We have frequently been assured of late that a great war cloud is about to burst over Europe. It is impossible to suppose that this prophecy relates to an event which is not to take place for four years and a-half. It must relate to something immediate. Thus we have this situation—an imminent crisis—an insufficient Navy—and when the Navy on its trial shall prove insufficient, nothing left but immediate surrender. Now, this situation is so appalling that the theories which point to it ought to be at once tested, and either admitted or rejected; and, if rejected, then we cannot too soon proceed with those measures of internal defence, which will not only fulfil our immediate purpose, but which will immensely increase the power of our existing fleet. But, before sitting down, I will touch once more on a matter of high importance in this great subject of national defence. I will once more venture to impress on the Government the importance of establishing by competent authority, and in open day, not secret conclave, a standard of our military requirements for the defence of the Kingdom and the Empire, with full details of the amount of forces needed, of their distribution, and of the material necessary for them. I am aware that a plea has been set up against this, and it was yesterday concurred in by the right hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman), a former Secretary of State for War. But I am totally unable to understand it, and I believe it cannot be understood by anybody who has not held office, which is an unfortunate position for a plea to stand in before the public. But I venture to believe that, until this is done, no measures that may be taken can be at once perfectly adapted to a sound general scheme, and perfectly acceptable to the country. I wish to acknowledge that the right hon. Gentleman's proposals are excellent so far as they go, and I shall therefore heartily support them, as I would any proposals for the Army or Navy which are good as far as they go. Indeed, I cannot but concur in them, for they are such as for many years I have been pressing on the public. It is, of course, a satisfaction to find that my ideas are in unison with the ideas of those who have power to give them effect. I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on having got so far on the right path, and I hope he may yet see reason to respond to the spirit of the nation and to seek larger means of giving security to the country.

GENERAL HAVELOCK-ALLAN (Durham, S.E.): I should like to be allowed to offer one or two remarks in regard to the statements made by the Secretary of State for War. I entirely concur in the observations made by the hon. and gallant Gentleman who has just sat down (General Hamley) regarding the statement of the right hon. Gentleman as eminently satisfactory; and I think the right hon. Gentleman may take credit to himself for the general concurrence with which the statement has been received by Members on this side of the House. I think he may congratulate himself that for the first time, in pursuance of what he began last year and is continuing this year, he has been able to present to the country and to the House a statement full, lucid, and clear, and giving us, I hope, a promise of something like definite conclusions from definite principles which have impressed themselves upon his mind in conjunction with the military authorities. In this respect, I am bound to say, there is nothing but praise to be given to the right hon. Gentleman's statement, but I am bound to qualify that praise by saying that if there is any criticism which may be pronounced upon the right hon. Gentleman's statement, it is that it is not so comprehensive a statement as it might have been. I doubt if the Committee of the Cabinet which, we are led to understand, sat to consider this subject, was itself sufficiently impressed with the possible necessities of the Army, taking into consideration what emergency may at any time arise in India as well as at home. I make that criticism not from any carping spirit, but in the hope that the right hon. Gentleman having made a great step in advance this year, may, in succeeding years, be able to continue in that right course, and be able to make still further satisfactory advances. He has gone not so much on the principle of desiring to increase largely or indefinitely the total number of men at his disposal, as upon the much better and safer and much more economical principle, much more useful and practical principle, of desiring to make the most of those which we already have in the United Kingdom. On this point I am in accord with the hon. Gentleman the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir G. Campbell), who spoke last night, and I think we ought not to make an addition to our total numbers until we feel confident that we have worked up to the fullest what we possess in the United Kingdom. It is almost impossible, except to those who have gone into the details of this subject, to conceive the large, latent, dormant military force we have in this country. I think the warmest praise is due to the right hon. Gentleman for having for the first time endeavoured to act upon the sound principle of trying to organize the whole of our military forces into a body which can be used for the effective defence of the country and the Empire. Our forces in this country consist very largely of a large body of Volunteers (225,000); and those who have, for the last 22 or 23 years past, seen this body rise by the spontaneous patriotism of the country—a body such as no other country possesses, but will be extremely glad to possess—must admit that the right hon. Gentleman's proposal for improving the organization of this force is one in the right direction. With regard to the Militia, I can congratulate the House on the assistance we received last night from the able and lucid speech delivered by the noble Lord the Member for the Petersfield Division of Hampshire; and, I trust, that will bear fruit in a Committee of Inquiry being instituted in whatever way may seem desirable to the right hon. Gentleman for the purpose of giving a stimulus to the Militia. The Militia are supposed to be 135,000 strong. They are the old constitutional force of the country, which in the Peninsular and in the Crimea Wars gave such enormous assistance to the Regular Army. They have, undoubtedly, within the last few years, been allowed to dwindle and fall off, for a reason which we cannot but be sorry for—namely, that it has, to a certain extent, been left in the shade by the more popular force of the Volunteers. I am not going to say a word in disparagement of the services that the Volunteers render, and are going to render, to this country. On the contrary, the only reference I will make to them is to express the hope that the right hon. Gentleman will be more liberal in his help to them when the necessity for it is pointed out. At present there is only a total of some 40,000 or 50,000 efficient in the Militia out of a nominal Establishment of 135,000. I am glad the right hon. Gentleman is not taking steps to increase the Militia Reserve on account of the reasons which are making the Militia itself unpopular, but I do hope that some steps will be taken before it is too late to give this force an impetus and to make it more popular. I was very much struck by what the right hon. Gentleman has done in the way of putting the Volunteers into an available movable force which may be brought to the front in addition to the Regular Forces in case of an emergency. Everything the right hon. Gentleman has done in that respect is a step in the right direction, only he has not gone quite far enough. He has put a part of them to garrison duty, and 120,000 he has put into movable Brigades, which are intended to aid the Regular Forces in case they should be called into action. It is impossible for the right hon. Gentleman, or the country, to form at the present time any idea—and I say it advisedly—of the extent to which the military qualities of the Volunteers can be developed by judicious treatment, but we must be liberal in the way of money as well as praise. There are to be 31 Brigades, but the right hon. Gentleman has not made provision for nominating efficient staffs, and it seems to me that it would be absurd in this case to risk the loss of a good ship for a pennyworth of tar. The staff vacancies in the Brigades have only been half filled up. The right hon. Gentleman himself, as a colonel of Volunteers, knows how necessary it is to fill up those vacancies in order to secure efficiency, and I hope he will see that this is only one step in the further development of the operation of bringing the Volunteers into an effective condition. I have seen with some regret the statement made in the public Press—it may be entirely unfounded, however—that the Easter operations, which in the past have been attended by 50,000 or 52,000 men, are likely to be curtailed very much this year. This would be greatly to be regretted, and I think it would be very desirable for the right hon. Gentleman to reconsider the details of this matter, and to see if some further concession could not be made to the Volunteers, so as to enable them to go out in the same numbers as they did before this Brigade organization was adopted. With regard to the proper organization of Cavalry, it is too much to expect, with the many things the right hon. Gentleman has in hand, that he would have been able to deal with this matter this year. The details have been so very fully given by the Member for South Hants that I will not go over them, but I am sure there is no question which at this time requires more to be looked into than the question of the efficient condition of our Cavalry. We have one broad fact before us, that with 12,000 men we have only 6,000 horses. We have an assurance that the right hon. Gentleman is not going to carry out the scheme of forming ammunition columns from the field batteries, which I was very glad to hear, but I confess that I should like to know a little more of the details of the plan which he intends to substitute. He has constituted fifteen columns on paper, but I am afraid that when he comes to fill them up with 100 men and 75 horses each, linesmen and horses will still have to be drawn from effective batteries of Artillery. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would adopt the other alternative of taking the horses from the reserve of horses which he has registered, and the drivers from the reserve of drivers of the Royal Artillery. I was glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman say last night that the Army Corps to which he referred was intended primarily for the defence of the United Kingdom. It must be recollected, however, that with these proposals to put 80,000 Regular troops under arms in this Kingdom, 120,000 Volunteers would also be placed under arms. Has the right hon. Gentleman ever contemplated what would be the number of field guns required for an army of that sort? He has told us that he proposes to create 67 Volunteer Batteries of Artillery, or a total of 238 guns, and I hope that will be carried out, because it will leave the 80,000 Regulars intact, with their own proportion of guns, which is now small enough in case they should be required, not for operations in Europe, but for the reinforcement of batteries in India. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman is aware of what has been done in previous years in this matter. Promises have always been made to us that a sufficient number of batteries should be kept for the reinforcement of batteries in India should the contingency ever arise. This is why I say that the whole scheme is not looked at so comprehensively as it might have been. If at any time the Indian Army may have to take the field in numbers not less than 200,000, there are only 318 guns in India, and to give those 200,000 men their proper complement of guns would absorb the whole of the weapons available. I hope, therefore, the earnest efforts of the Secretary of State for War will be directed to the completion of those 67 Volunteer field batteries which he has indicated. I should like to say something with regard to the remarks of the right hon. Member for Bridgeton, as it has, in part, been conceded by the Government that a reduction should be made in the effective Generals' list. I should like to know whether he has followed the conclusions arrived at in 1881, when the Member for Bridgeton made the same raid upon the Generals' list, and, as the result of his somewhat misguided efforts, he established the very worst principle of selection that ever was established in the world—a haphazard system, a chance system, a system not based upon the merits of the individual. That principle of selection has resulted in eliminating from the list of General Officers of the Army some of the very best men, while it has retained men of inferior merits. If the right hon. Gentleman is congratulating himself on what he did in 1881, and will take the list of the year and ask anybody acquainted with the merits of the officers affected by it to go through the list with him, he will find what I say is correct. I hope the Government, while accepting the principle of the right hon. Gentleman regarding a reduction in the Generals' list, will not accept any advice from him as to the mode of carrying it out. The popular idea is that a General Officer is a man who has attained to a grade in which he receives pay for doing nothing at all, but, like everybody else in this practical country, a man to lead bodies of troops must have acquired efficiency by daily practice in doing so. That is the reason why in this country, which keeps only a small number of troops under arms in time of peace, it is necessary we should have some reserve of General Officers, for the purpose of leading an army. I only hope, if the reduction is made, it will be made wisely and well; but I think that should be done not by the haphazard cutting down which was proposed, but by a judicious and wise reduction, such as the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War will carry out in conformity with the advice of the Duke of Cambridge last year. For my part I only hope that the reduction will be made both wisely and well, and on a principle as far as possible opposite to that laid down by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton (Sir G. Trevelyan). The general principle the Secretary for War has adopted, seems to me to indicate great progress for the future, and if he will only act on the sound advice which is always at his disposal on the part of competent military advisers, and avoid being misled by the panic-stricken theories of those who really know nothing of what they talk so much about, he will do well both for the Government and the country.

*SIR G. TREVELYAN: The character of the hon. and gallant Baronet, who has just spoken, stands so high in regard to military matters that I cannot pass by an expression he has let drop, although I feel assured, from the silence with which it was received by the Committee, that it was regarded as an erroneous reference to what occurred here some five years ago. The hon. and gallant Gentleman spoke of my having recommended and brought about the present system of appointment to the Generals' list. It will, I am sure, be within the recollection of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House that that recommendation was—reduction of the list of Generals, selection by merit of those placed on that list, and continuous service on General's pay and General's duties when once put upon the list. But, unfortunately, the Government, doubtless under the advice of the military authorities of that time, accepted only part of that proposal—namely, the reduction of the list of Generals. They did not accept the selection of men fit to be Generals, and, afterwards, their continuous employment on Generals' duties. It is true that my efforts did bring about the change, but the hon. and gallant Member will doubtless allow that the system which I recommended five years ago was in all respects the same as I recommended to the Committee last night. I have no doubt Her Majesty's Government will complete the good work that has been so long doing, and that when they alter the list of Generals, they will do it on the principle recommended last night, and which the hon. and gallant Gentleman recommends now—that is to say that whether the list be large or small, it shall be a list of as many Generals as the country wants, and in carrying out that change, and in selecting the men to fill the post of General on the list, I am quite certain Her Majesty's Government will bring about a great reduction of expenditure.

*LORD C. BERESFORD: There are two questions in connection with the matter before the House to which I desire to refer. One is the question of the Army in India, and the other is that of the defence of the Coaling Stations. I quite agree with what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman in reference to the Army in India. I have worked it out on the basis of certain figures, and I believe that that Army would be found much more efficient if it were made a Long Service Army, because the bringing home of the Short Service men and their kits adds enormously to the cost of maintaining that Army. With regard to the Coaling Stations, they ought, in my opinion, to be garrisoned by Marines, and to carry out this proposal I would increase the Force of Marines to whatever strength might be necessary, having such a number as would be able to garrison the Coaling Stations and take up their duties with the Fleet as well as in the Reserve, in regular rotation. There can be no doubt that this would not only be enormously cheaper to the country, but that it would add enormously to the efficiency of the Service, because we should get better men in regard to age and experience, and men who, at any moment, could be put on board ship. They should be put under their own Generals, and this would put an end to any of the disagreeable things that might otherwise occur in reference to those having authority in time of war at the different coaling stations. I know that my right hon. Friend cannot do this all at once. He has done a good deal under the routine system that has been established, and I do hope that now he will be able to make a settlement of this question. We have all listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. and gallant Gentleman below me (Sir E. Hamley) in regard to the question of fortifications. It is a mistake to suppose that Navy men are opposed to fortifications. What we say is, that, first and foremost, we must get our Navy in order, and should then set to work to fortify the ports around the country. The hon. and gallant Gentleman advanced the theory that in case our Iron-clad Fleet had suffered discomfiture, the enemy must also have sustained a good deal of damage, and would be unable with the remains of his fleet to blockade our harbours without risk of being attacked in detail by the serviceable ships remaining to us. He also said the enemy might destroy a certain number of vessels, but would be unable to so utterly destroy our commerce as to cut off all our supplies. As to invasion, I do not believe in the fears entertained with regard to such a contingency. If once our Fleet is beaten, why should the enemy attempt to effect a landing on these shores, with the chance of losing so many men and ships and the risk of being attacked from the rear, when he would be able to starve us into terms by stopping our food supply? I do not wish to join in what is described as a scare in regard to the invasion of this country, and I feel quite sure the idea is not one that will create any great amount of fear among the people. With regard to what was said about reform, I hold that reforms should come from inside, and until they do I do not think we shall ever see them carried out in an economical way. My right hon. Friend has told the story of how guns were supplied to the fleet without ammunition. What I wish to point out is that we are under the same system now, only we happen to have men who are working it in the best way they can; but the same thing is likely to happen again if once we get a bad lot of men in the Service. The hon. Member for Leicester has said that the officers of our Army are always asking for more money, and he has taken exception to the references made to the German Army on the ground that that Army is, owing to circumstances, in an exceptional position. But what is the reason the German Army, which is the life of the German Nation, costs less, in proportion, to our Army and is more efficient? There is no reason why our Army should not be as efficient in all its details as the German Army. What is the reason why, at the present moment, there is the difference that has been pointed out? It is because the experts in Germany have gone into all that is necessary for defence, and their opinions are consulted in whatever has to be done. What we hold is that the opinion of the experts should certainly be taken before the Estimates are prepared and the money is voted. My right hon. Friend will say I am unduly finding fault with him. I am not finding fault with him, but with the system. I think he has done more than any other Minister who has occupied his position to alter the old system and try to get a better service. My right hon. Friend was asked whether the Estimate he had brought forward was his, or whether it was that of an expert; and he has told us distinctly that it is his Estimate and not that of an expert. The present system, however, under which military experts report to the Secretary of State, and their opinions are accepted or rejected is, I think, open to grave objections. It may not be desirable that such opinions should be publicly stated to the House, but they ought at any rate to be brought before the Cabinet before they decide what is necessary for the Army, and till this is done depend upon it you will have these scares and fancies, and will be asked to state in a definite and understandable manner what is necessary to be done.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cockermouth): I am very glad that the proposition to report Progress last night was not approved, and I think the discussion we have had to-day has been very useful. We have had an immense amount of military experience given us this morning, and it will appear presumptuous for a civilian to take part in the discussion, because it is thought by many Members of this House that nobody is qualified to take a share in it save those who are themselves members of the Army. ["No!"] Well, I understood so. If it were merely a question of the best arrangements of the Army, or which weapons would be best in the interests of scientific slaughter, I should certainly not presume to trouble the Committee any farther. But on this Vote, which involves the whole of our military policy, because it relates to the number of men, I contend, though a humble Member, I am quite as competent to form a sound opinion upon that question as any General, Captain, or Admiral in this House. Two of my right hon. Friends on the Front Opposition Bench said the policy of non-intervention had been pretty well accepted by all Parties in this country. But when I hear the word "non-intervention," I always remember the answer of Talleyrand to the lady:—"Non-intervention, Madam, means—much the same as intervention," I was glad to hear my right hon. Friend (Sir G. Trevelyan) say last night that the time had come when we should recognize the responsibility of this country again placing an Army in line with Continental Armies. And the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs spoke very much in the same way. Nobody contradicted on the other side, and I suppose their dicta were pretty well accepted. If that be the case I am justified in assuming that ostensibly our Army is for defence. Against whom do you want to defend yourselves? The Queen's Speech of February, 1888, and of this year, speak of the continued friendly relations with foreign Powers; but if that be the case, it is an extraordinary and monstrous thing that the Government should come down and say "because we are friends with all the world, we must have £21,000,000 more for 70 ships and we must have 2,615 more men, to defend ourselves against those friends who are in such cordial relations with us." It is a most monstrous proposition, Mr. Courtney, and I am sure anybody, who thinks for a moment, will agree with me. What would you think if you were told that two parties of aborigines were friendly, on hearing that they were going to build a large fortification, or if the Secretary for Ireland said he had succeeded in pacifying Ireland, and then asked for a large number of police to protect the people? Yet we, being at peace, are asked for this increase of the Army and Navy. I sometimes think that the House is out of its mind with these extreme military preparations. The Queen's Speech spoke of the necessity of increased precautions for the safety of our shores and commerce, and, while saying that our relations were friendly, said, we had no right to assume that this condition was secure from the possibility of change? (hear, hear). An hon. Member says "hear, hear." I do not know any position in this world which is necessarily secure from the possibility of change. I would like to ask the hon. Member who says ["hear, hear!"] whether he knows of any condition of life which is free from the possibility of change. The fact is there is no more probability of a change this year in our relations than there was last year. We must take these Votes of the Army and Navy together. We cannot dissociate them. It is a question of what armaments we require; and, as I have stated, my starting point is that both the Army and Navy are required for the defence of our industry and commerce. I do not believe that either is for defence. When the Volunteers were started people recognized the motto, "Defence not Defiance," as quite a new thing, showing that in their hearts they had hitherto regarded the Army as for defiance and not defence. ["No" and laughter.] I hear some hon. Member laugh. Let him tell me of a single instance since the conclusion of the great war with France of a war in defence of this country. It is always defence not defiance which is involved in your military preparations. The War with China was to poison the Chinese with opium. The Zulu War, the Boer War, the Burmese and the Egyptian Wars, one to stifle a new Republic, another a burglary, and another to get money for the bondholders, besides the 30,000 soldiers kept in Ireland to strangle national life, were all means of defence. Well, but suppose these proposals are for defence, am I to believe all the stories which are told by the colonels and admirals and generals on that side of the House? I have a sincere respect for them, but I do not believe them a bit, because they have always been wrong ever since I have known anything of this House. The prophecies of these military and naval men have been utterly wrong. But, unfortunately, the people of this country have believed them; they are very credulous, and they can swallow a great deal. When I first came into the House Sir John Pakington was reconstructing the Navy, and we were told that when it was reconstructed we would be quite safe. Then it was said, only get fortifications, and everybody can keep in their beds. Everybody knows that the money spent on fortifications was a simple and unadulterated waste of money, and it might as well have been thrown into the sea. With the Volunteers, we were told, we must be safe. I remember the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham telling what a Yorkshire farmer said when the Volunteers were started:—"Well, we always thought there were a power of fools in the country; but we never had any way of pointing them out afore." Well, after all this re-modelling and re-constructing, we are now asked for £21,000,000, 70 more ships, and 2,600 men. But that is not the end of it. What is Lord Wolseley doing? Why he is going up and down the country under the patronage of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, and is calling for a conscription. I do not know what is going on in this way, and whether we are to have every man, woman and child enlisting, but this I did see in the Daily News of this morning an advertisement announcing that at the United Service Institute on Friday a lecture will be delivered on the employment of dogs for military purposes. But I am not attacking the way in which you are going to carry on warlike operations; have "dogs of war" or whatever you like, I attack your policy solely. If you are going to defend yourselves against all possible combinations against you, you will require far more preparations than these you purpose. I saw a statement the other day that, taking the great European Powers, Germany, France, Austria, Russia, Italy, and the Balkan Provinces, there are some 28 millions of men more or less ready to engage in fighting, and is it not utterly absurd to attempt to vie with these great Continental Armies? Let me read a quotation from the Observer newspaper, which I think puts the case very well:—

"In one sense of the word no price is too high to guard the country against invasion, but the price of averting the mere risk of invasion may easily be too high. As in a question of insurance, the cost of a premium may be so heavy as to make it worth a prudent man's while to run the risk, rather than make such provision against a possible contingency. In other words, the struggle for life makes life not worth having."

That seems to me to put the case very well. Is life worth living by many wretched people in this country? Hon. Members may laugh, but I was one of those who the other day listened to that melancholy catalogue of the miseries endured by classes of starving people in this country, given by the hon. Member for N.W. Lanark (Mr. Cuninghame Graham). He described how the people were struggling in the depths of ignorance, wretchedness and misery, and I say it is a cruel thing to pay away the money of the people as a protection against phantom foes, while you have all the forces of poverty, misery, ignorance, vice, and crime in your midst. I know what the answer is. I shall be told it is impossible to reduce our forces, so long as other nations of Europe keep up their large armies; but let me quote once more, before I sit down, the words of a great statesman, and a sentence from a great philosopher. I think in these quotations I shall point out, in better words than my own, what I think is the real policy to pursue, by which you will get rid of this enormous expenditure. So long ago as 1841, Sir Robert Peel—and you know there never was a more sagacious, prudent, common-sense Minister than he ever sat in Parliament—said—

"It is for the interest of Europe that the nations should come to a common accord to enable every country to reduce these military armaments, which belong to a state of war rather than of peace."

I wish we could influence the public mind to enforce this doctrine on the Government. Now listen to Bentham—

"Whatever nation shall get the start of the others in making proposals to reduce and fix the amount of armed force will crown itself with everlasting honours."

I say that is the true policy; but I have heard or read nothing of any statesman having made an attempt to carry out such a policy. In my humble opinion it should be tried at once in the interests of this country and the world, and until it has been tried, I, for one, as a humble representative of the people, refuse to vote one shilling or add one man to increase those hideous bloated armaments—at once a disgrace and burden, and a danger to a country that professes to be Christian, and pretends to be free.

MR. E. STANHOPE: I hope I may now be allowed to make an appeal to the Committee to come to a decision upon the question before us. The Committee will remember that it is absolutely necessary to take the Vote for men to-day; and if we do not obtain that, it will be impossible for us to comply with statutory requirements, which I am sure the Committee desire should be observed. It is absolutely necessary, and I would make an appeal to the Committee in the strongest terms to come to a decision. I am reluctant to take up any part of the small remaining portion of time at our disposal, especially after the full measure of indulgence accorded to me yesterday; and, in answering the questions put to me, I will be as brief as I can. The hon. Member for Leicester, who moved the Amendment in terms of which I have no right to complain, and who confined his observations within the limits of his Motion, asks the Committee to reduce the number of men by 2,600. Well, I know this House prides itself on being a business-like Assembly; but would it be consistent with that character if, after the House voted money for the purpose of fortifying our coaling stations and putting them in a proper state of defence against attack, we were to stop short in the middle of our work and say, "We will not grant the Government money to garrison these works." The proposition is so absurd that it is only necessary to state it as explaining the reason why this Motion of the hon. Member for Leicester must be resisted. Among the questions put to me, I take first that in regard to the Cavalry, several hon. Members having asked me to take up the question of Cavalry re-organization. No doubt the Committee must have observed most of the hon. Members who touched upon this subject were exceedingly unwilling to express any opinion of their own as to the means by which this re-organization was to be effected. I know that the hon. and gallant Member for Hants (General Sir F. FitzWygram) was an exception. He gave us a complete scheme of re-organization, but the Committee will have noticed that his scheme, which was a large and in itself a complete measure of re-organization, was not only received with some doubt and hesitation by other Members of the Committee, but several intimated that they altogether opposed the plan of my hon. and gallant Friend, and therefore I think he will understand how, in my responsible position, I feel the full difficulty of the task he would invite me to undertake. Before I could do that, I must feel satisfied that the steps I recommend will really tend to the advantage of the Service. Then a good deal has been said about the new arrangements for Volunteer Field Brigades. I think the country is to be congratulated upon the officers whom we have been able to get for the command of these brigades, and I must say there are none of them to whom thanks are more due than those who have seen such service as the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (General Sir Henry Havelock-Allan) who has very kindly undertaken the command of a brigade. From his knowledge and experience Volunteer officers will derive the greatest advantage, and to him and others the country will owe a debt of gratitude. But he and other hon. Members have to-day alluded to some of the difficulties to be encountered in the organization of these Field Brigades. It is impossible to free the plan from every difficulty, but I am prepared to meet them as fairly as I can. The hon. and gallant Gentleman has referred to the question of paid Brigade Majors. I do not like to use the word paid; it was never intended that they should be paid; but what we did hope was, that we should be able to offer them a reasonable allowance to compensate them for the extra outlay they were put to. It may be that in some cases the amount was fixed too low, but that is a matter for the consideration of the Department after full experience of the difficulties to be met. Certainly, I did not mean to lay it down categorically that we would not move by one inch from the position we have taken. In Militia battalions, again, there are difficulties to be encountered, and no doubt we run some risk of putting difficulties in the way of other meetings of Volunteers. It is not our desire, in the least degree, to limit the Easter gatherings, although we place in the first rank the importance of exercising the men in the new brigades. In cases where battalions are not able to join, we are still anxious to encourage Easter gatherings, as calculated to encourage efficiency in the force. Then I am asked a question by the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Birkenhead (General Sir E. Hamley), whom I thank very much for the able and clear—criticisms, I was going to say, but they are scarcely that—comments on the scheme I have proposed. I know that in the matter of defences of this kind, and especially that of London, we owe very much to his teaching and experience. I have had the privilege of consulting him on the subject, and any observations of his are entitled to great weight in the House and in the country, and will receive most respectful consideration from myself. I am not quite sure whether my hon. and gallant Friend heard one part of my speech last night, because he specially called attention to the desira-

the country under the patronage of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, and is calling for a conscription. I do not know what is going on in this way, and whether we are to have every man, woman and child enlisting, but this I did see in the Daily News of this morning an advertisement announcing that at the United Service Institute on Friday a lecture will be delivered on the employment of dogs for military purposes. But I am not attacking the way in which you are going to carry on warlike operations; have "dogs of war" or whatever you like, I attack your policy solely. If you are going to defend yourselves against all possible combinations against you, you will require far more preparations than these you purpose. I saw a statement the other day that, taking the great European Powers, Germany, France, Austria, Russia, Italy, and the Balkan Provinces, there are some 28 millions of men more or less ready to engage in fighting, and is it not utterly absurd to attempt to vie with these great Continental Armies? Let me read a quotation from the Observer newspaper, which I think puts the case very well:—

"In one sense of the word no price is too high to guard the country against invasion, but the price of averting the mere risk of invasion may easily be too high. As in a question of insurance, the cost of a premium may be so heavy as to make it worth a prudent man's while to run the risk, rather than make such provision against a possible contingency. In other words, the struggle for life makes life not worth having."

That seems to me to put the case very well. Is life worth living by many wretched people in this country? Hon. Members may laugh, but I was one of those who the other day listened to that melancholy catalogue of the miseries endured by classes of starving people in this country, given by the hon. Member for N.W. Lanark (Mr. Cuninghame Graham). He described how the people were struggling in the depths of ignorance, wretchedness and misery, and I say it is a cruel thing to pay away the money of the people as a protection against phantom foes, while you have all the forces of poverty, misery, ignorance, vice, and crime in your midst. I know that in the matter of defences of this kind, and especially that of London, we owe very much to his teaching and experience. I have had the privilege of consulting him on the subject, and any observations of his are entitled to great weight in the House and in the country, and will receive most respectful consideration from myself. I am not quite sure whether my hon. and gallant Friend heard one part of my speech last night, because he specially called attention to the desirability of concentrating our Field Army on positions such as railway junctions, whence they could be easily moved to points of danger. I explained that this was a cardinal part of my proposal. Troops will be concentrated on railway junctions and similar places mapped out, and will be enabled to entrain at a moment's notice, and proceed to any point of danger. My hon. and gallant Friend also alluded to the defence of commercial ports, and I think my noble Friend (Lord Charles Beresford) did the same. I really think I may leave those two speeches to answer each other; but I can assure my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Birkenhead there is no desire for a moment to abandon the proposals put forward for the defence of commercial ports. I have already explained that certain defences will be carried out in any case; but my offer of breech-loading guns to the ports without offering to pay for land, &c., was made on the ground that localities should contribute towards the cost of their own defence in some way. We indicated several methods, and I issued a Memorandum in which it was suggested that the towns should find the sites for the fortifications if the War Department found the guns. I do not think that was an unreasonable proposal at all, and I know in several instances towns have acquiesced in it. I am not all dismayed at the reception my proposal has met with in other instances. There is a distinct desire to close with our offer in reference to the defence of the Tees. The Municipality have expressed their readiness to meet us in a reasonable manner, making an offer that we should take the land at a nominal rent, and we have gladly accepted that course; the guns will be mounted as soon as the works are complete. I hope, in respect to the other ports, we shall come to a somewhat similar arrangement. My noble Friend (Lord C. Beresford) has raised an important question, how the garrisons for the coaling stations are to be provided, and has suggested that, in many cases, Marines should be employed. Well, I do not wish to express any definite opinion. I know there is much to be said for his proposal, and it is one that has been and is under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. If we find, after very careful examination from every point of view, that of economy as well as efficiency, that it is a proposal we are justified in accepting, we shall not hesitate to do so. My hon. and gallant Friend behind me (Sir Walter Barttelot) asks me when the Royal Commission now sitting on the administration of the Army and Navy may be expected to report; but I do not think he can really expect me to give an answer, for I have no control over the proceedings of the Commission. But, I observe the Commission has been sitting very assiduously, and I understand its Sittings will shortly recommence. Further than that I am not able to go, though I may say I hope the Commission may report shortly, for then we should be able to carry out several contemplated changes that are suspended pending the presentation of the Report. Again, I would earnestly press upon the Committee the urgent necessity of the case, and allow a decision to be taken on this Vote now.

*MR. WOODALL (Hanley): I am reluctant to intervene between the right hon. Gentleman and the decision of the Committee; but, in the absence of my right hon. Friend the Member for Stirling under whom I served, I must protest against the statement made last night, and which has attracted much attention, to the effect that in the preparation of the Estimates for 1886 the amount required by the Admiralty for projectiles and ammunition for quick-firing guns was struck out of the Estimates.

MR. E. STANHOPE: Ammunition.

*MR. WOODALL: I am unable, as the right hon. Gentleman is aware, to vindicate the action then taken without reference to confidential documents, some of which I have not now in my possession; but, as I had some subordinate part in the preparation of the Estimates, afterwards adopted by the Secretary of State and submitted to the House, I may be permitted to ask the attention of the Committee to the Estimates actually submitted, a copy of which I have now before me, in which provision is clearly made under Vote 12 for ammunition in the column wholly devoted to sea service, and there is an item of £32,600 for ammunition for quick-firing guns. Further, a little lower down, I find a sum of £159,000 submitted for projectiles, also for sea service. Now, it is perfectly true that the demand of the Navy in these particulars was curtailed, but the right hon. Gentleman will agree with me that there never has been a period without some such curtailment. We have to cut our coat according to our cloth, and reductions are considerably and proportionally made. But, as was explained by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) in reference to the method of dealing with naval demands, there was a Conference at the War Office between the Secretary of State and the First Lord at which I was present, and at which a happy medium was arrived at, and the amount entered was agreed upon equally on the responsibility of the War Office and the Admiralty. Another allusion was made last night in reference to barrack accommodation. "When," asked the Secretary for War, "did my right hon. Friend (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) become acquainted with the fact that barrack accommodation was demanded?" In 1886, it will be remembered, the Government came into office well on in February, and they were under the same obligations as the present Government are to get these Votes early in March. They found the Estimates in a complete state of unpreparedness, and the Government they succeeded had been spending freely on these Services from the large amount placed in their hands by the Vote of Credit. In these very Estimates large provision was made for barracks at the Curragh, at various places in Dublin, at Portsmouth, Gosport, Aldershot, and elsewhere. But this was done before they became acquainted from personal inquiry with the absolute necessities of the case. The right hon. Gentleman and the Secretary of State who preceded him were in possession of the information we left, and they might have been expected to make good the deficiency. I hope the Committee will excuse this interruption; but I feel very strongly that an injustice was done to my right hon. Friend.

*MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): Notwithstanding the earnest appeal made to us to close this debate as speedily as possible, I feel unable to comply, because, while I admit Her Majesty's Government have a duty to discharge towards the country, we also have a duty to discharge towards the people who sent us here; and, in the name of the people, I desire to register my solemn and emphatic protest against the demands of Her Majesty's Government. Three different proposals the Government have made, against which, I hope, we shall record, if not a numerous, a serious protest. First, they propose a considerable addition to the number of men to be engaged in fighting; secondly, they ask us to sanction an expenditure of £6,000,000 over that of last year; and, thirdly, we are asked to sanction a scheme the Government, with the assistance of experts, have prepared for the defence of the Metropolis. Well, I am amazed that any body of reasonable men, in or out of this House, should have had the temerity to make such propositions, and especially the latter; and in no speech yet delivered do I find any justification for it. I remember, some three or four years ago, when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) was Chancellor of the Exchequer he deplored the great increase of expenditure on the Services, and used strong language—not stronger than was warranted by the facts; he said the expenditure upon the Services was every year increasing "by leaps and bounds," and that, if economy and retrenchment was to be effected, it must be in this direction. But no retrenchment has been effected, though I remember a strong appeal was made to us below the Gangway to assist the Government in what I believe was their determination to effect retrenchment. Then, during last Session, we had two very common-sense speeches from the Treasury Bench on the subject. First, the Secretary for War stood up and disposed altogether of a scare in regard to an invasion by some imaginary foe. Following him we had the First Lord of the Admiralty, who, in a common-sense manner, effectually disposed of the dangers from a naval invasion. With these two speeches some of us hoped that the bogey of invasion by some imaginary foe from some imaginary part of the globe was disposed of; and at least, I think, we are justified in asking—as in all sincerity I do ask—what has occurred since these two speeches were delivered in the House some six months ago to cause such a complete change of front on the part of Her Majesty's Government? If there was no danger to be apprehended at that time, we are justified in asking—nay, more, we are justified in demanding—in the name of the industrial millions of this country, some proof that some incident has since occurred to warrant us in voting this increase in expenditure. What I want to know is, where is the enemy? Where is the danger? Where is the foe? If there is no danger, we are not to be frightened out of our propriety by the bogey of invasion, which is continually trotted out to extract money from the pockets of the toiling millions of this country. Last night we witnessed a sparring match between the Front Opposition Bench and Her Majesty's Opposition. It is very curious how those who sit on the Front Bench, opposite to those who are in office, consider it absolutely necessary to criticize severely the financial proposals of the Government. When out of office, right hon. Gentlemen feel it their duty to pose as economists; but we all know that in the end, when the sparring is over, the gentlemen who criticize the proposals of the Government will say that, after all, the moment is not opportune for the retrenchment they are desirous of effecting, and under the circumstances they feel it their duty to support the Government. That is exactly what happened in the farce which was enacted last night, and how the Secretary for War managed to pump up so much excitement and pitch into the right hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) so strongly is a mystery to me. I have been long enough in this House not to believe in these naval and military manœuvres of right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Benches opposite. It would be far better if they would tell us what the remedies are for the evils which they profess to deplore. One hon. and gallant Member was good enough to tell us that we want a great increase in the Horse Artillery; another that steps should be taken to improve the breed of horses; another advocated a more efficient Cavalry Service; another said "strengthen the Infantry," while some advocated long service and others short service. All these nostrums have been put forward and the same speeches delivered over and over again, and when the Government bring forward the Estimates next year, they would save the time of the House by reprinting the debates which have taken place in former years. But we have another class of Members who declare that all the previous doctors have been wrong, and that what we need is a complete system for the fortification of our coast. I would, however, ask whether it is not desirable, before we commence new fortifications, that we should supply those which have already been constructed with guns? Forts have been constructed at enormous cost at Plymouth, Portsmouth, and other naval stations, upon which no guns have been mounted, and I think it would be sheer folly and waste to repeat these blunders. I am prepared to register my vote against the proposals of the Government, because I believe that instead of diminishing danger they are calculated to increase it. My theory is that the danger becomes the greater with every increase of the Army and Navy; because if the nation is prepared to fight, and you are satisfied that all branches of the Service are in a perfect state of efficiency, you are much more likely to engage in a struggle with a Foreign Power than if you had a weak Army and an ineffective Navy. A few years ago there was a remarkable scare which I have before referred to in reference to Pendjeh, and a Vote of £11,000,000 was rushed through this House to prevent Russia from taking a piece of territory which was said to belong to our Ally, the Ameer of Afghanistan. But the money was never applied in that direction. Nobody knows to this day what became of it, because a few weeks afterwards the alarmists discovered that our Army was not large enough to cope with that of Russia, and there was a danger that if we engaged in a struggle we might be defeated. They, therefore, climbed down from their lofty pedestal and proposed to refer the matter to arbitration. Russia readily consented; but the matter never came to arbitration at all; because the Commissioners appointed by both Powers to delimitate the frontier line found that the so-called valuable territory was a mere strip of sandy desert not worth half-a-crown, and that, after all, it really belonged to Russia. The moral of that story is that we did not engage in a struggle with Russia because the experts discovered that our Army was not strong enough for the purpose. Had our forces been sufficient, the alarmists would undoubtedly have provoked a war with Russia for a valueless strip of sandy desert. I come now to the last proposal of the Government—namely, the defence of London. I am told that Her Majesty's Government simply propose that a number of sites shall be purchased, that no forts shall be erected upon them, but that the land shall simply be acquired so that it may be available in the event of an invasion. What will happen? The land will, I presume, be acquired. I am told it is intended that earthworks shall be at once erected. Even suppose that they are not, as soon as the land has been acquired a flag-staff will be erected, and the British flag will fly above it. By-and-bye there will be earthworks and buildings, and ultimately money will be expended in the erection of fortifications, which will remain as monuments of the folly of this House. Scores of similar monuments exist throughout the country. It is because I do not believe that the danger would be diminished, but greatly increased, if the men and money asked for by the Government were supplied, because I believe that there is no Power in the world who desires to invade us, and because I am not to be frightened by the spectre of invasion I decline to vote for the proposals of the Government.

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand): I feel under the necessity of moving that the Question be now put.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Question be now put."—(Mr. W. H. Smith.)

The Committee divided:—Ayes 221; Noes 101.—(Div. List, No. 14.)

Question put accordingly,

"That a number of Land Forces, not exceeding 149,667, all ranks, be maintained for the Service of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland at Home and Abroad, excluding Her Majesty's Indian Possessions, during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1890."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 92; Noes 230.—(Div. List, No. 15.)

*MR. W. H. SMITH claimed "That the Original Question be now put."

Original Question put accordingly.

(2.) £5,004,500, Pay and Allowances.

MR. E. STANHOPE: I venture to make an appeal to the Committee to allow this Vote to be taken at once. As a matter of ordinary practice, this is done; for it is the natural consequence of the decision we have just taken. We have had a full discussion, extending over two days, of the policy in which the two Votes are concerned; and, having in mind those statutory obligations to which I previously referred, I trust the Vote will now be taken.

*MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I desire, at any rate, to say a word of protest against this procedure. I care not what has been the practice on former occasions; it is quite enough for us that the circumstances of the day are altogether unusual. Whether or not it is any use insisting upon debate and Division I do not know, and it is a point I do not now wish to argue; but I do propose to say this, that the circumstances under which the Government are asking us for money are absolutely unprecedented. The Government are a discredited and disgraced faction, and they know that they appear in the face of the country and public opinion with halters round their necks. Under the circumstances, I, for one, am not disposed without protest to give them any facilities for obtaining one farthing of public money; and, if there were the slightest possibility of doing it, I would offer every possible obstacle in the way of their obtaining any money at all for the Public Services. [Sensation.] Hon. Members appreciate the position, I am glad to see, in which they are placed. The people are well aware of it, and if you went to the country to-morrow you know you would be routed. Another reason why I think it is our duty to offer a protest against the Vote is that you are asking for an unusual number of men, more than is absolutely necessary. I will not argue that question, but I object to any more burdens being imposed on the taxpayers of the country for two very sufficient reasons. One is that the taxpayers are already overburdened by the wholly unnecessary expenditure incurred by your degrading, disgraceful policy of Coercion in Ireland; and, secondly, if you were not so fatuously wedded to that disgraceful method of government, you might withdraw the 30,000 bayonets with which you now hold Ireland down, and have an ample force for the legitimate service of the country. I would add, in addition to that, it is, to my mind, sufficiently unsatisfactory that we should be abused for spending three and a half hours in discussing what is quite as important a question as the condition of Ireland—namely, the question of the condition of the industrial classes—while no objection is made to wasting two whole days on the question of adding to the taxation of these poor people for the purpose of increasing our already bloated armaments.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): On this subject, again, something might be said as to the Staff of Generals. I may say that it is because, and only because, of the undertaking given by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, that I shall abstain from moving a reduction to this Vote. I must say that I have it on the highest authority—that of Lord Wolseley and Major-General Brackenbury—that we have at least 100 Generals too many on the Effective List, and I do not think we ought to allow it to be supposed that we let a scandal of this kind pass without protest, unless on the ground that we have it from the Government that they intend to introduce a reform in this Department. It is only on that ground that I refrain from moving a reduction.

Vote agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £57,200, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for the Pay and Miscellaneous Expenses of the Chaplain's Department, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1890.”

Mr. Condyar.

MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, South): I must protest against this Vote being taken at such an hour.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Class III.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a Supplementary sum, not exceeding £200, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1, 1889, for certain expenses of the Law Agents in Scotland for Government Departments.”

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.”—(Dr. Cameron.)

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I would appeal to hon. Members to make progress with the Vote, even although only a few minutes remain.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): It is perfectly idle to begin a discussion, when only 10 minutes remain, upon a question which involves a very grave Constitutional matter.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I will not resist hon. Members from Scotland, but they must be aware that there is a date beyond which it will be impossible for the Government to take Supply in compliance with the law; and, therefore, if the Committee of Supply is not likely to be closed before that date, the Government will be compelled to ask further privileges from the House at the expense of the rights and privileges of private Members.

Question put, and agreed to.

Progress reported.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS.

Ordered, That the Committee of Public Accounts have power to send for persons, papers, and records.—(Mr. Jackson.)

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present, House adjourned at five minutes after Nine o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 13th March, 1889.

QUESTIONS.

FARM LABOURERS AND COUNTY COUNCILS.

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck) asked the President of the Local Government Board whether he was correctly reported by Hansard to have said, on July 26, 1888—

“That agricultural labourers hired by the year and occupying houses on the farms on which they were employed (the occupation of such houses being part of their wages) would be entitled to vote for Members of the County Council;”

whether his attention was, at the same time, drawn to the fact that agricultural labourers fulfilling these conditions in Northumberland, were being excluded from the Register; and, whether he had yet made the inquiries which he promised on that occasion?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's in the East): The answer cited by the hon. Gentleman seems to have been abbreviated. I have referred to my manuscript, and I find that in my own handwriting this is the answer which I was to have given, and which I believe I did give—

“If a labourer is not required to reside for the purposes of his service, but merely has a cottage as part of his wages, he would, in my opinion, be entitled to be registered as a voter under the County Electors Act.”

I am not authorized to decide questions of law, and the answer I gave was based upon a decision of the High Court in a case of a somewhat similar nature. From inquiries I made I understood that there had been a considerable number of complaints on the part of those who considered themselves entitled to the franchise in Northumberland, but, so far as I know, the complaint has been almost entirely confined to that county. If that be so, it may be assumed that the persons referred to by the hon. Gentleman who have not been put upon the register in Northumberland have elsewhere been placed upon the register. However this may be, Parliament has set up machinery by which the question can be authoritatively decided. Any person claiming to be put upon the register whose claim is refused by the revising barrister may appeal to the High Court against his decision. I do not understand that this course has been pursued with reference to the cases referred to, but the question can, of course, be raised in the proper form in connexion with the next revision.

MR. FENWICK: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that also in the county of Durham the miners have been left off the register for similar reasons? Is it not the fact that this matter was brought to his notice on the 26th of July last, and did he not then make a promise to me that he would inquire into the circumstances?

*MR. RITCHIE: I certainly said I would inquire, and I have inquired, and I find there were great many complaints in Northumberland. Durham was not in my mind—I have had very short notice of the Question—but I accept the hon. Member's assurance that complaints of a similar character have been made in Durham. I would, however, point out that when the complaint was made on the 26th of July it was too late to take any steps by anybody, even by those who had a right to take steps. The Local Government Board have no right to take steps, and no locus standi in the matter. The proper mode of proceeding is for the question to be raised in the High Court of Justice by those who have been refused votes, and for an authoritative decision to be thus arrived at. It is, of course, too late to admit any fresh persons, so far as voting for the existing County Council is concerned, but before the next election to the Council there will be two or three opportunities of raising the question, and I sincerely hope the course I have indicated will be followed.

MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, considering the great expense of raising a question of this sort in the High Court, he might not in the Bill he is going to introduce amending the Local Government Act of last Session insert a clause which would settle this question?

*MR. RITCHIE: No, Sir; I think it would be almost impossible to draw any Act of Parliament upon such a subject as to which differences might not arise. As I have pointed out, so far as the great bulk of the constituencies are concerned no complaints have arisen, and the fact that one revising barrister in one or another county seems to have interpreted the law in a different way from all the rest of revising barristers does not appear to me to necessitate the Government introducing a Bill, which in any case must be an extremely difficult Bill, if it is proposed to define accurately what is the existing state of the law. I therefore hope the proper course will be employed, and, looking to the important questions which arise, as well as to the large number of those interested in the matter, I do not think the question of expense ought to be one which should raise any difficulty in the matter.

*MR. CHILDERS: I did not suggest the introduction of a Bill, but of a clause in the Bill which the right hon. Gentleman is going to bring forward.

*MR. RITCHIE: Yes; but I do not propose to bring in any Bill amending the County Electors Act. The question arises under that Act, and it would necessitate a new Bill.

Mr. Ritchie

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PRISONERS (IRELAND) BILL.

[BILL 2.]

SECOND READING.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I observe, Sir, in to-day's paper that the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) has given notice of opposition to this Bill. He has done so, I presume, because he considers it inexpedient to legislate for a particular class without taking into account another class of people of a character not usually associated with crime. If the hon. Member will embody that view in a Bill, I promise him all the support in my power, and also the support of hon. Members below the Gangway. But I am entitled, taking all the circumstances into account, to suspect the perfect character of the philanthropy of the hon. Member, especially when I know that lately in Ireland he has passed coldly by the door of the evicted tenant and shed crocodile tears at the woes of the policemen whose barracks have not been whitewashed outside by the Marquess of Clanricarde. My Bill, I admit, is not a very comprehensive one. I do not propose to deal with the general matters the hon. Member refers to, nor to many other matters besides. I do not propose to deal with the very serious crimes of high treason and treason felony. I prefer to leave that subject to abler hands, so that all offences which have the general good of mankind as their motive may be distinguished from other crimes against social order which are at variance with the well-being and established usages of society. My object is simply to effect a change in a law which is now in operation in Ireland, or rather to effect a change in the penal clauses of that measure. It is a law under which no less than 3,000 men and women have suffered up to the present moment. With regard to the number of victims there is a dearth of information at the present moment, because, notwithstanding all the pressure that has been put upon the Chief Secretary, we have failed to elicit any definite information as to the number who have been imprisoned since last Whitsuntide. Under this law the Government hold that all are equally criminal. That is a proposition which we dispute. Generally speaking, it is an outrage upon common sense to say that in agitations where the passions of men are aroused there are not offences committed, which are of a different character, class, and degree. It is absurd to say that a man who denounces a public evil is equally guilty with a man who commits a crime in order to avenge a private wrong. In the past history of England men have suffered for having taken part in agitations against existing laws—laws which have since been abrogated by other laws which have become the bulwark of the British Constitution. In Ireland there are men who have offended against the Criminal Law and Procedure Act, who are not esteemed to be criminals by the people of the country. Who will say that Father Kennedy is a criminal? Father Kennedy left his prison cell but a few days ago to receive the enthusiastic ovations of his parishioners, and to be presented by the Town Council of Cork with the freedom of the city. Who will say that John Mandeville was a criminal for having delivered a speech in which he denounced the perpetration of crime, and for which he has since been justified by the success of the cause for which he was pleading? Sir, the public conscience revolts against the proposition. The high tide of public opinion is swelling against it. Even the supporters of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary and of the Conservative Government have declared against the Penal Clauses of this Act. I need only allude to a statement made outside this House by the noble Lord the Member for Rosendale (the Marquess of Hartington), and to the declaration of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) in this House a short time ago, to show the view taken of the hardships which many persons are suffering in consequence of the operation of this Act. But it is not only the feelings of the supporters of the Government within this House which are outraged by the operation of the Act. Even the supporters of the Government in Ireland are becoming tired of it and of the manner in which it is administered. Let me for the information of the Chief Secretary quote the opinion of one of his chief supporters in Ireland. He knows very well that the Irish Times is a newspaper which supports the Government and its policy. The hon. Member for South Tyrone knows that also. Yet what does the proprietor of the newspaper say in a letter to the editor? He says—

“We all know that a degrading system of punishment may exasperate, but it will never mitigate or alter a man's political conduct. The time has arrived when such prisoners should be treated as first-class misdemeanants.”

This, Sir, is the opinion of one of the supporters of Her Majesty's Government in Ireland; and I think that the sooner the Government recognize the change of feeling the better for themselves. My contention here to-day is that the penal clauses of the Coercion Act now in operation in Ireland establish a principle which is of a retrograde character. In times past—and the further back I go, the better I am able to prove my contention—prisoners who were indicted for offences that had even the slightest tinge of a political complexion were treated with respect and consideration. If we compare the charges made now against those which were made in times past, the presumption is largely in favour of those who are suffering in Ireland at the present moment. The charges now made are so thin that they have to be couched in the vaguest and most general language—such, for instance, as I have had personal experience of, where men have been charged and condemned because they compelled or induced persons unknown not to take farms unknown, the property of landlords unknown, that might become vacant at some future time—not stated, because unknown. That is one of the favourite charges of the present day, and it is a charge for which I myself received four months' imprisonment. Let me compare that charge with the charges made against Irishmen 40 or 50 years ago, and then compare the treatment of the two classes of prisoners. Take, for instance, the charge against Mr. O'Connell and his associates. They were accused of a foul conspiracy in having seditiously combined to commit offences by violent means, involving, as they did, incitement, intimidation and terror. I am sure the Chief Secretary and the Law Officers of the Crown will agree with me that that was a very heinous offence. It was the charge by magistrates, who have been laughed at by the Judges for their ignorance, and whose only qualification for administering the Act is that they will readily obey the orders of Dublin Castle. We want to alter that state of things; and it is for that purpose that I propose my Bill. My contention that it needs alteration is borne out by the Government themselves. They prosecuted the Lord Mayor of Dublin for a publication in his newspaper; they prosecuted Alderman Hooper, until recently a Member of this House, for publishing information in a newspaper. They abandoned those prosecutions. Even the little boys in the street have defeated the Government in this respect. The hon. Member for Kerry (Mr. E. Harrington) has received six months' imprisonment, with hard labour, for the publication of a speech, and his punishment was so little deserved that the magistrates who sentenced him offered to set him free if he would only promise not to offend again. Surely his crime could not have been of a very glaring character. Will any hon. Member say that a man is a criminal because he sold a copy of United Ireland, or that another is a felon because he cried out, "Three cheers for William O'Brien?" Most of the acts which have been called crimes, and which have been punished as crimes, are simply political in their character. I do not ask the House to accept my statement, but I will refer them to a Judgment delivered by County Court Judge Morris in the case of the hon. Member for Roscommon (Mr. O'Kelly). In the course of a long Judgment, he said that his views had been talked about, but he did not care what was said because when he made up his mind upon a certain course he took it. When he was dealing with an offence which did not involve anything like moral guilt, and there was no gross infraction of the law, he thought the clemency of the law should be extended. When, however, it involved moral turpitude and led to serious consequences it was impossible to extend the mercy of the Court. He said, further, that in the particular case with which he was dealing, he was not doing wrong in straining the quality of mercy. He considered the sentence passed upon Mr. O'Kelly to be altogether too much, and he reduced the sentence of four months' imprisonment to one of two months as a first-class misdemeanant. In another case a Judge in Dublin refused to endorse a sentence upon the hon. Member for Dublin. The case was carried to a higher tribunal, and, obeying the order of the Superior Court, the Judge gave a reduced sentence, and ordered the hon. Member to be treated as a first-class misdemeanant. Some people attempt to make out that the treatment of a prisoner in the gaols of Ireland is not of a severe character. If that be so, how does it come to pass that men have lost their lives in prison, and that men undergoing periods of imprisonment have been reduced in weight to an alarming extent? Mr. Sweeney, in the course of a three months' imprisonment, lost two stone in weight, and an hon. Friend of mine in 15 days lost 11 lbs. in weight. I am sure that hon. Members will not have forgotten the terrible case of the man Larkin, who died in prison. Take the case of Larkin, who was seized with an illness for which he was treated medically on September 23. At six o'clock on the evening of the 26th he was locked up in his ordinary cell, not in the infirmary, so that not only could the prisoner not get out, but the warders could not get in. A warder saw him at 2 a.m. rinsing his mouth with some water, and told him to go to sleep. At 2.30 he again saw him and he then appeared to be asleep. When the warder next entered the cell he found the prisoner dead, and the governor said he was dead. After the inquest the father and six others who had known the deceased all his life signed a declaration that they could not recognize in the emaciated remains the stalwart youth who yet had not been dead 36 hours. Now attempts have been made to prove that the treatment of prisoners in Ireland is not of a harsh or severe character. I hold that the treatment of prisoners in Ireland is not only degrading, but of a severe physical character, and I ask, why all this cruelty? Can it be because the right hon. Gentleman is of a naturally cruel disposition, or because the Government desire to get back to those refined systems of torture for political opponents which have taken the place of the rack and the thumbscrew? Let it not be supposed for a moment that we ask for ourselves anything that we are not anxious to secure for the humblest man in Ireland. I appeal to the Government to accept my Bill and abandon the cruel system that is already responsible for the blood of Mandeville and of Larkin, and I ask the House to take my Bill and make of it a golden bridge over which they can retreat from a position of dishonour and disgrace.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I beg to support the Second Reading of this Bill. I should not have intruded myself at this early moment on the House, except that I am obliged to leave early. I desire to submit some considerations bearing upon this measure. Now, why have we a Bill upon this question at all? I do not think the Government can hide from themselves the fact that there is a strong feeling, not confined at all to Home Rulers, upon the subject of the treatment of this particular class of prisoners. I believe it exists among Members on the other side, and among people who are not strongly actuated by political sentiments. They feel uneasy at seeing men, who in the ordinary vulgar sense they know do not belong to the criminal classes, being treated in the manner which has been described; above all, they feel that these men are being treated in this manner under an exceptional law for doing acts which can be done in England with absolute impunity. The combination of these two things produces, unquestionably, a very uneasy effect upon the public mind. I am fully aware of the extreme difficulty of defining exceptional offences under a Statute. But we ought not to have that difficulty before it. The real truth is that the difficulty ought to have been made impossible by reasonable administration. I wish to refrain from any bitter tone of political recrimination; but there are many things in the criminal law which are dealt with by administration, and not by legislation. Take, for instance, the case of infanticide. It is murder of the worst description, and is punishable by the law of England by death. If one chooses to chop logic as the Irish Secretary chops logic, it may be said that if the law shows any lenity towards a crime of that description it will encourage the seducer and the mother to commit this foul offence, and that, therefore, the law must be carried out and the mother executed. Yet for the last 30 or 40 years it has become a principle of administration that the capital sentence is not carried out in these cases. Now, here is an instance in which by administration the responsible Minister of the Crown, by a settled system, has altered the punishment in a particular case. In order that we may not be deceived on a question of this kind by the fallacies in the logic of the right hon. Gentleman, hon. Members will mark this—that if it were another woman, and not the mother who murdered the same child, that woman would be executed as a woman was executed a day or two ago. Why do we execute one woman and not execute another? Why, on account of the circumstances and the motives which lead to the act; and, therefore, when we are told that the circumstances and motives cannot be taken into consideration, we are met by the contradiction of the whole system of criminal jurisdiction. I will take another illustration on a lower scale. By the law of England children of tender age are held just as responsible for their actions as adults. I remember the time when our prisons were full of young criminals. That was not altered by legislation. I had carefully to consider the question. It was difficult to define what were the offences for which children should be sent to prison, and at what age they should not be sent to prison, but the whole system was altered by a single act of administration—by discharging those little children from prison in large numbers. There was great objection taken at the time. I was said to be tampering with the law of England, but when the matter came to be considered, the magistrates themselves saw imprisonment was not the best way to deal with offences of that kind, and the whole thing came to an end through the action of the magistrates and through the action of the Administration. Then, again, the House will remember the terrible case where some famished sailors on a wreck killed and ate a boy. Do you mean to tell me that by the act of the Administration they made no difference in a case of that kind as compared with another murder, owing to the surrounding circumstances and motives which led to the terrible act? I maintain these things have been done, and can be done, by Administration, and the result is that a reasonable Administration should have the will to act in accordance with the sound feelings of the people they represent. The present Administration say "We can do nothing." The Home Secretary says "I have no authority: I do what the medical officers say." There were times when the Secretary of State was the master, and not the servant, of his subordinates. If the right hon. Gentleman will send out a circular, calling attention to the fact that there is such a person as the Secretary of State, there will soon be a very different condition of things. The Irish Secretary says he cannot do anything, that the prisons are not in his Department; and the Home Secretary says the prisons were not in his Department, or, at all events, he is a roi fainéant of that Department. I remember a time when the Secretary of State was in every detail, medical or disciplinary, the prison authority, not nominally, but really responsible, and there was not a week, there was hardly a day, that I did not go—I will not say into details, but into prison administration. But now we are told that the prisons are not in the Department of the Home Secretary. At all events, that right hon. Gentleman sat by the Irish Secretary the other day when he said that the Irish prisons were in the same position as the English prisons. If the Chief Secretary in Ireland and the Home Secretary in England had taken the part which, if they had the will, they have the power to take, this difficulty need never have arisen. Then there is another body by whom these things might have been modified, and that is the Magistracy. In the earliest days of the administration of this Act proceedings were taken against the late Lord Mayor of Dublin (Mr. Sullivan), one of the most respected men in Ireland—a man as much respected as any in this House—for publishing reports of a meeting of a suppressed branch of the National League in his paper. He came not before a Resident Magistrate, but before

Mr. O'Donel, the Stipendiary of Dublin, and that gentleman took a perfectly reasonable view of the subject. He felt that it would be a shock to the common sense of mankind to treat Mr. Sullivan as a common malefactor, and he declined to do so. He used a most sensible argument, that if the offence were sedition the accused would be treated as a first-class misdemeanant, and he said he would deal with the charge as if it were of the same character, and sentence Mr. Sullivan to be treated as a first-class misdemeanant. If that example had been followed we should not have been landed in the present difficulty. The same view was taken by several of the County Court Judges. Then we come to the Resident Magistrates. Why was Mr. Harrington, who was charged with an exactly similar offence, treated in a different manner from Mr. Sullivan? Right hon. Gentlemen talk of the equality of our law. There is no such equality. The administration of the law in respect of these sentences depends on the man before whom the offender is brought. If a man is brought before Mr. O'Donel he is treated in a sensible way; if before Mr. Cecil Roche he is treated very differently. The Chief Secretary tells us he has nothing to do with it; but it was immediately after this moderate sentence passed upon Mr. Sullivan that the Chief Secretary made a series of speeches which were thoroughly understood by his Resident Magistrates. The truth is that the Irish Removable Magistrates are very much like the collie dogs of Scotland; they do not want any particular word said to them; they know the eye of the master; they know very well what particular sheep to bring up. That is the reason why this harsh and brutal treatment, condemned at first by the common sense of the magistracy, was introduced. We can not rely upon the Administration, because they do not apply reasonable principles of justice in consideration of the surrounding circumstances; we cannot rely upon the moderation of the magistracy, because the Chief Secretary has taken very good care of that. Then, can we rely upon the medical officers? Whenever any particular cases of hardship are brought forward, the Chief Secretary says: "The prisoner will get what the medical officer recommends."

Sir W. Harcourt

If that were merely a shabby pretext of the right hon. Gentleman's for escaping from his own responsibility, so long as it had the desired result, I would be satisfied. The Home Secretary, no doubt unintentionally, entirely misrepresented the facts in the case of Mr. Davitt which I recently brought forward, and said that what was done was done on the representation of the medical officer. That is not the case. There are things which are not within the competency of the medical officer. It is not the medical officer who recommends who is to visit the prisoner, or what books he is to have or not. It was not the medical officer who instructed me, but I who instructed the medical officer. If the Home Secretary and the Chief Secretary for Ireland choose to regard themselves as the subservient instruments of their medical officers, I have no objection. But if the question is whether the medical officers are reliable guides to the Home Secretary and the Secretary for Ireland, that is quite another thing. There is no one who has more respect for the medical profession than I have; no men do more for the poor than medical men; but there is no department which requires more constant supervision than the medical department, especially where the medical officers have private practice. I remember a very painful case in which a prisoner was allowed to die of hunger and cold, and then the principle was laid down as to the removal of a woman from prison before her delivery, and that in cases of incurable diseases persons were not to be allowed to die in prison. The prison is neither an hospital nor a mortuary. The prison administration in Ireland is one in which I have very little confidence. At the time it was proposed by Lord Spencer to remove some prisoners to England, I had to express myself on the nature and quality of the prison treatment in Ireland. It was in such a condition that it was absolutely necessary to appoint a Commission of Inquiry. I do not desire to say anything against, on the contrary, I wish to say a great deal in favour of, the medical officers of prisons in England and in Ireland whom I know. But in all professions there are black sheep, and one may come across such men as Dr. Barr. I asked yesterday a question as to a letter of Dr. Barr's on prison treatment, and I must say a more disgraceful composition I never read in my life. I cannot conceive how any man in authority can allow such a person to remain for a day in charge of any of Her Majesty's prisons. Dr. Barr's language is not only characterized by most violent and bitter animosity, but it is a bad imitation of the style of the Chief Secretary for Ireland. Dr. Barr denounces the Royal Commission which sat on Irish prisons on account of its lenity in recommending milk to Irish prisoners. He says, "The recommendation of the Commission to add to the diet such a highly-refined animal product as milk was not in conformity with the evidence before them, which went to show that quantity rather than quality was best suited for an Irishman's stomach." That is the language of the medical officer sent over by the Home Secretary to aid the Irish Secretary in the case of Mr. Mandeville. It has been said that Dr. Barr forced Dr. Ridley against his will into a severity that was contrary to the sentiment of that gentleman; and, having read Dr. Barr's letter, I feel convinced that it was so: for a letter of greater brutality of sentiment, as well as of violent political prepossession, I have never read. We cannot rely entirely on medical officers to deal with this question, and, therefore, we must appeal to Parliament itself. That is the reason why we must have a Bill. It is said it is difficult to define political offences; but we find no difficulty in defining them in the Prisons Act, which provides that every prisoner convicted of sedition, or of a seditious libel, shall be treated as a first class misdemeanant. Sedition has often led to bloodshed. The argument may be used that the man who incites to crime is worse than the man who commits it. "Hear, hear!" Was the hon. Member who cheers a Member of Parliament in 1887? If so, will he say why are persons convicted of seditious libel to be treated as first-class misdemeanants? Do they not incite? A seditious libel is, in itself, an incitement. It may be an incitement to treason, rebellion, or civil war. Therefore, what becomes of the argument that the man who incites must necessarily be treated as an ordinary felon? It has been asked, why should we so punish people who violate the Vaccination Act? I quite agree. It is very wrong that they should be treated as ordinary criminals, and I am quite willing to deal with their case. But will you tell me that if a doctor writes an article against vaccination, and recommends and incites people not to have their children vaccinated, he ought to go to prison as a common felon? Therefore, the plausible arguments brought forward on the other side as magnificent truisms are in fact only silly and empty fallacies. Everybody recommends things which if a man did he might be punished for, and nobody thinks of punishing those who recommend them as if they were offenders. The hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) comes forward with an Amendment to defeat the Bill. If there is any severity to be exercised against an Irishman the hon. Member for South Tyrone is always there to advocate it. But if there is proposed any alleviation of the lot of those who are not his countrymen—of those who are, perhaps, not likely to be long his constituents—the hon. Member for South Tyrone comes forward to add fuel to the fire. In point of fact the hon. Member has long been the moral emergency man of evicting Irish landlords, and, therefore, is the person to place an obstacle in the way of such a measure as this. That is natural enough on his part. But the Government have had some awkward and injurious allies lately, and I warn them against the alliance of the hon. Member for South Tyrone, who represents in this House the race animosities and the religious hatreds of the Orange minority in Ireland, and who is here to ask the Government to be what I am afraid they are only too willing to be—the instruments of the cruel oppression of the great majority of the Irish people. The principle of the hon. Member for South Tyrone is like that of Prince Bismarck—“Do ut des.” The patronage of the hon. Member must be repaid by the Government consenting to become the tools of the Orange faction in carrying out every severity against those who will not agree to their policy. For myself I do not believe that even from the point of view of the Government that is a wise and prudent course. By agreeing to the Second Reading of this Bill the House will declare that the present state of things is not satisfactory, and that a remedy ought to be found for it.

Sir W. Harcourt

I should have been glad if a remedy had been found in a reasonable and humane administration of the law. If not, there should be such a declaration in this case as we have made in the Prisoners' Act on the subject of sedition, so that offences by speaking and writing shall not be treated as overt offences of gross and vulgar crime, but that some modification should be introduced into our system which will remove from the criminal administration of Ireland barbarities which, I am quite certain, are not recommended to the minds of the people of England.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby makes, in my opinion, a very bad penitent. When he appears before us in a white sheet, and with a lighted taper in his hand, he, at all events, might be a little modest, remembering his bad past. That is all I have to say in answer to the right hon. Gentleman's attack upon myself. But, Sir, in moving the Resolution which stands in my name, I desire to say that I have no intention of underrating the importance, and, in view of the public feeling excited out of doors, the gravity of this question. There are many inducements for the Government to accept the Second Reading of this Bill. By accepting it, the Chief Secretary would remove a great weight of public abuse, if not of public odium, from his own shoulders. At all events we should have no more harrowing scenes of torture in Irish prisons, no more hair-cutting episodes. But if the Bill is a wise one—and of that I am not certain—I am quite sure it does not go far enough. The House ought to look deeper than the mere question of what would be political convenience in this matter. If one feeling is stronger than another in this country, it is the feeling against class legislation. Let hon. Members conceal the fact as they like, this is a measure introduced by certain Members of Parliament, and its object is to secure a more lenient treatment for themselves—[“No, no!”]—and for those who may be associated with them. Let us take the case of the four hon. Members who are either in gaol or under sentence—namely, the hon. Member for North-East Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien), the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. J. O'Connor), the hon. Member for Mid-Cork (Dr. Tanner), and the hon. Member for Kerry (Mr. E. Harrington). All those gentlemen have either been sent to prison or are under sentence because of one special offence — the denunciation of land grabbing and land grabbers. [An hon. Member: We are proud of it.] There is nothing more clear than that the most lamentable results followed this denunciation, and the murder of Fitzmaurice, the murder of Forhan, the murder of Cornelius Murphy, followed directly upon those incitements.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: May I may be permitted to interrupt the hon. Gentleman. No murder or other offence followed upon the meeting.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I did not say meeting.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: Nor the speeches which had been attributed to us.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: When murder has not followed, there have been innumerable cases of outrage on man and beast. [Cries of "Name."] I have in my hand a list from the County of Kerry alone, of thirty-eight outrages, four of them being murders, following upon speeches denouncing land grabbing. Where outrage has not occurred, farms have been surrendered, and men have been intimidated and coerced. Now, the Bill proposes that the authors of these incitements shall be treated, if they are convicted, as first class misdemeanants. Let us see how the law will then stand. Take the case of the Salvation Army. There are a great many branches of the Salvation Army in the North of Ireland, and there is one in Dublin. I am not able to concur in all the methods of that body, but looking at the sin and suffering in our midst and looking at the apathy of the great mass of the people regarding it, I am not the man to throw stones at those earnest and devoted men. Now the Salvationist preacher stands at the street corner and is arrested for obstructing the thoroughfare. He is preaching the Gospel as he knows and believes it. With him it is absolutely a matter of conscience, but he is tried and convicted. Is he a criminal in the ordinary sense? He is no more a criminal than John Bunyan was or John Wesley was, but the law sends him to gaol as an ordinary offender.

You dress him in prison clothes and give him prison diet, and what is more to the purpose your Bill does not seek to bring one atom of relief to him. You leave him precisely as you find him. The Salvationist preaches the Gospel of what he considers truth and righteousness, and he is treated as an ordinary criminal, but you, forsooth, who preach the Gospel of derelict farms, are to be treated as first-class misdemeanants. I will take another case still more important, that is the case of the man who conscientiously objects to vaccinate his child. This man is actually governed by parental affection and love for his child, and yet you send him to gaol as an ordinary criminal and treat him in the ordinary way. Your Bill does not bring him one atom of relief. I repeat that this is a Bill for yourselves and not for the general public. There are other instances. There is the case of the poor man convicted at Petty Sessions and who is unable to pay the fine. These men are no more criminals than those other men. There are the men who violate the secrecy of the ballot at contested elections; they are treated as ordinary criminals. To pass this Bill would practically mean that the House of Commons makes a law for its own Members, and makes a law with a cynical indifference to the case of other men not one whit less worthy than themselves. Take the case of the Gweedore prisoners—I do not mean the men on trial with Father M'Fadden, but the men tried the other day at Fermanagh. These men under the hon. Member's Bill would be treated as ordinary criminals, because they were guilty of assault, whilst the man who went to Gweedore and originated the whole combination and superintended it would be treated as a first-class misdemeanant. I say that it is not fair, and on that ground alone I object to the Bill. Again, it is conceded that all punishment should act as a deterrent. Mr. Forster put 1,000 men in gaol. Punishment was not his object, simply detention. He turned the gaols into hydropathic establishments for these men, and food, drink, literature—everything was supplied to them. Men absolutely qualified for imprisonment, and complained that they were not imprisoned. As a matter of fact, crime-enormously increased under the Crimes Act of that time. The Act was a lamentable failure, although it was administered with the best intentions by Mr. Forster. But it failed. The present Act, however, has had a deterrent effect. Let men argue as they like, the state of Ireland to-day is vastly improved. You may tell me the improvement is due to what you call the union of hearts, but then I ask you to explain how did a similar improvement come about in Lord Spencer's time, when his Crimes Act produced a very similar result. There was no union of hearts then. I cannot possibly assent to the Second Reading of this Bill. If hon. Gentlemen feel for the Salvationists and others who are no more criminal than they pretended they are themselves, and in my opinion not nearly so much so, how comes it they have left them entirely outside the scope of their Bill? I maintain that to pass a Bill like this is to pass a piece of class legislation that the country will have no difficulty in seeing through. I am far from objecting to a re-classification of prisoners. I think it a deplorable thing that Salvationists and Anti-vaccinators should be committed to gaol and treated as ordinary criminals. To bring in a Bill with the express object of providing for Members of the House of Commons themselves—[Cries of "No!" ]—well, it will provide for them at all events, and for the men who carry out their work in Ireland—is not a fair way in which to treat the House of Commons. If you wish to re-classify prisoners I sympathize with you; but so long as you confine your attention to one class, and a class that is producing disturbance, and outrage, and crime in Ireland, I will refuse to vote for the Second Reading of the Bill. I beg to move as an Amendment—

"That in the opinion of this House, it is inexpedient to proceed with the consideration of a measure which proposes to modify the prison treatment of a certain class of prisoners in Ireland, and leaves to the ordinary law other prisoners whose offences are not of a character usually associated with crime."

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I beg to second the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, it is inexpedient to proceed with the consideration of a measure which proposes to modify the prison treatment of a certain class of prisoners in Ireland, and leaves to the ordinary law other prisoners whose offences are not of the character usually associated with crime."—(Mr. T. W. Russell.)

SIR WILLIAM T. MARRIOTT (Brighton): I think the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt) has shown a very wise discretion (or perhaps it is the pressing nature of his engagement this evening) in leaving the House after making his onslaught upon the Chief Secretary, and not waiting for the reply. To the right hon. Gentleman I may pay this compliment, that he is one of those advocates who always spoil even the best of causes by their advocacy. On the present occasion a Bill was introduced by one of the Irish Members raising a question well worthy of the attention of this House; and I am bound to say the speech with which he introduced it was calm, moderate, and worthy of the occasion. But the late Home Secretary casts aside the Bill at once, or simply makes it a peg upon which to hang an attack upon the administration of the Chief Secretary, and makes it an occasion for demonstrating to the House what a good Home Secretary he has been, how much better than the present Home Secretary, how much better he knew his duties, how much more humane and just he had been. Well, I should be very sorry to dispel the hallucinations of the right hon. Gentleman; but, so far as I know, it is not everybody who agrees with him, or appreciates the benefit of the performance of his duties at the Home Office. Even Mr. Davitt, though one of his present allies, does not agree in all he did, and I think that we may leave the Home Secretary and Mr. Davitt to settle the quarrel between them, and that the House will proceed to consider the merits of this Bill. I am sorry myself that Mr. Davitt is not in the House at the present time, so that he might deal with the right hon. Gentleman vis à voce, as he has been dealing with him by letter in the papers. The right hon. Gentleman is never famous for accuracy in his statements. He is bold, I admit; he is audacious, and makes at times astounding assertions, but accuracy has never been his strong point. When he commenced, not to support the Bill, but to attack for the hundredth time the administration of my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland, he began by making a most audacious statement—saying that the acts for which Irish Members and others have been imprisoned are acts which, if they had been committed in England, would have been done with absolute impunity. ["Hear, hear!"] "Hear, hear!" says an honourable Member; but I, as a lawyer, entirely dispute and deny that statement. I say there are none of the acts—or with one exception, perhaps, under the second section of the Crimes Act—that would not be punishable equally in England as they are in Ireland. It might be by a different procedure—it might be by trial before a jury; but for the right hon. Gentleman to make the assertion that punishment was awarded for acts that in England would be committed with impunity is an audacious statement that may perhaps catch the cheers of hon. Members below the Gangway, but is absolutely opposed to facts. The right hon. Gentleman mentioned by way of illustration the crime of infanticide, and implies that in relation to this he was the best Home Secretary that ever held office; but he ought to have known, and if he knows he ought to have informed the House, what is the state of the case in relation to infanticide. It is perfectly true that the wretched mother in such cases is condemned to the extreme penalty of the law, but does not suffer it because the prerogative of the Crown intervenes. The reason for this is known very well. For many years, I will not say how many, perhaps 20 years, a strong opinion has grown and is generally maintained that there is a great distinction between different classes of murder, that it is a crime that ought to be classified, and that there is an enormous distinction between the murder of an infant by its mother under great distress of mind, and murder for gain or to gratify some brutal passion; and in all the Codes introduced into this House, or in the House of Lords, we have tried to classify such cases. It is the universal opinion that infanticide is not a crime that ought to be visited with the death sentence. But as the law stands the Judge is bound on the verdict of the jury to pronounce the capital sentence, though the Crown as a matter of invariable practice exercises the prerogative, and the wretched woman only suffers a few months' imprisonment. This is well known, and has come within the experience of every Home Secretary for the last 15 years. I will not go into the charges of harsh and brutal conduct directed against the Chief Secretary. I have not the slightest doubt that when my right hon. Friend speaks he will be able to deal with all these charges as successfully as he has on former occasions, but what I most regret about the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby is the spirit he has endeavoured to infuse into the discussion of a subject that really desires careful and serious attention. It is a question that should be discussed as much as possible free from Party animosity, and from that Party animosity the speech with which the Bill was introduced was comparatively free, but the moment the hon. Member sat down up jumped the right hon. Gentleman and endeavoured to infuse Party rancour into the whole debate. There is one point upon which I think we shall all agree, that Irish Members and others who have suffered imprisonment under the Crimes Act are not in the category of ordinary criminals. The motives of the ordinary criminal are always selfish, and generally sordid, but I do not think that anybody will impute those motives to hon. Members who have been imprisoned. We may disagree with them and think their actions are a source of danger to the country, but we know they are not actuated by selfish motives; they do these things with the view—misguided, in my opinion—that they are for the benefit of the Party and the country to which they belong. This is very different from the position of the ordinary criminal; and even if we condemn the actions we may, to a certain extent, admire the motives. Whether the Irishmen who have suffered under the Crimes Act are political offenders or not is another matter. It is very hard to define what a political offence is. In many countries political offenders suffer much worse than others sent to gaol for ordinary crimes. In Italy under the Austrian rule, and in Russia now, you will find political offenders treated with greater severity than ordinary offenders as we should call them. It is the nature of the punishment that is complained of as degrading, though, I think, it is not the punishment but the crime which degrades a man. Speaking for myself, I can say that whatever indignities an Irish Member may have suffered in prison they would not be the cause of my regarding him with less respect; it would be the commission of the offence if anything that would influence me. As I have said, it is difficult to say what constitutes a political offence. Many people consider themselves political offenders who are nothing of the kind. The well-known Herr Most is one of such, he has suffered imprisonment in many countries and has narrated his experiences. This gentleman being in Austria somehow got to loggerheads with the authorities and was put in prison. He disliked that so much that when he was released he left Austria and went to ventilate his views in Germany under the Prussian dynasty. Again he compromised himself with the authorities and found himself inside a prison for what he considered a political offence. He found his treatment in the German prison so rigorous that when the opportunity offered he left Germany and came to enjoy the perfect freedom and liberty of England. Many hon. Members will recollect how Herr Most conducted himself in England. He took advantage of freedom and liberty of speech to such an extent, that he became an inmate of an English prison, as he thought, for a political offence. Then he discovered that prisons in the land of freedom are much worse than they are in either Austria or Germany, and so he resolves to go to democratic America where no Monarch or House of Lords checks perfect freedom. But, even in America, he at Chicago got at loggerheads with authority and was sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment. At the expiration of that term he declared his opinion that in the Republic of America he found his worst, and most harsh experience of prison life. Throughout all these vicissitudes Herr Most no doubt thought himself a political prisoner, and certainly I should not think of comparing him to an ordinary criminal, though he had a longer experience of prison life than many criminals, and was a much better man than an ordinary criminal in many respects. But the question is who are we to consider political prisoners? The test must be, I think, the object they have in view in doing certain acts even when those acts are a breach of the laws in the country in which they live. Now the Bill introduced this afternoon proposes to treat all prisoners under the Crimes Act of 1885, as political prisoners. But observe there is a great distinction between the offences under the second and the seventh sections of that Act. Under the second section it is difficult to say why you should consider any of the offences as of a political character. They are divided under six heads and I will state them shortly:—1st, taking part in any criminal conspiracy now punishable by law; 2nd, wilfully and without legal authority using violence or intimidation; 3rd, taking part in any riot or unlawful assembly; 4th, taking forcible possession of lands, or houses from which anyone has been evicted; 5th, assaulting or obstructing an officer of the law; and 6th, inciting any person to commit any of the above offences. These are the six subsections of section two, and yet the right hon. Gentleman says they are acts a man can commit in England with impunity. Now try any one of these acts in England and see if you will get off with impunity. If the right hon. Gentleman is really sincere, let him put the matter to test, try any one of these acts, and see if he is not quickly lodged in one of Her Majesty's gaols. Every one of these are offences under the law in England. But when we come to section seven the pith of the section is that it deals with unlawful and dangerous associations; but these are not unlawful until they have been so proclaimed by the Lord Lieutenant. Here there is an essential distinction, and in my opinion prisoners under this section should be differently treated. But I will go farther than that, and say everyone under the six subsections may or may not be a political offender, because the crucial question in deciding what is a political offence is the object with which it was committed. I am one of those who do not quite understand the object of hon. Gentlemen opposite. Up to 1885 there was no doubt about it. Their object I find expressed in their own words—to bring about an absolute separation between England and Ireland. ["No, no!"] Yes, the object was to make Ireland a nation. If that was not so what is the meaning of the standing toast at banquets, "Ireland a nation"? I am astonished that hon. Members should cry "No, no." Is there any meaning to be attached to the words, or to those used by the hon. Member for Cork in 1885? "To break the last link that binds us to Great Britain." Every toast, every act, every speech, and I could quote from a great many of them, indicates that meaning. Now I call that a political object. I can quite understand their wishing for a separate Government as Italy wished to separate from Austria, as Hungary at one time had the same wish, and as Poland wished to separate from Russia. I can understand that; it is a political object—it is a patriotic object—you may be the weaker country, but if you hate the rule of the country and wish to be free, I can understand that. We may not agree with you, we may do our best to prevent it, but certainly it is a political object. But you now say you do not want that; you want a Local Government Bill, a similar change in the Constitution to that we have in England. Why, if you had had even the Local Government Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian proposed, that would not have made you a nation. It would not have made you independent. You ought not to sing "Long live Ireland," or "God save Ireland." I would suggest it should be "God save the Irish Vestry." If you want Local Government, you will get it with certain reservations, and if your efforts are directed to that, then I say these offences are not political, and for this reason: You have the Constitutional means of getting what you are striving for. If you seek Local Self-Government, you have Constitutional means for that, and have no right to resort to crimes and violence. Crimes and offences accompany the fight of the weak with the strong, as in the case of Italy and Austria, and Hungary and Austria; then we must admit that crimes may be more pardonable than when committed by ordinary criminals; they are political offences arising out of the struggle when the weaker has no Constitutional means of enforcing its views on the stronger people, no Constitutional means of making its voice heard. But you have the means of making your voice heard. I do not object to the music, and you certainly are heard. You have the Constitutional means, and if you resort to unconstitutional means, such as these offences, you say they must be considered political offences. I will take such an instance as is afforded by the action of the hon. Member for Dundee—he is not here now—(Mr. Firth). At one time he was much interested in the Government of London, and fought hard to bring about reform in the Government of London. Suppose he had committed one of these offences, taken part in a riot in Trafalgar Square, used intimidation or offended under any of the six heads of section 2, do you think he would have escaped on the plea that his offence was political, because he committed it with the idea of furthering reform in the Government of London? Certainly not, because he could use the Constitutional means at his disposal. Therefore, I say in no sense of the word can these offences be called political at the present time. If you really want separation, you may call them political, but if you only want the advantages we enjoy in England, then they are not political, and simply render you liable to certain punishments under the criminal law. But I think there is really this distinction; that whether these offences are political or not, they are different to the ordinary offences committed from selfish or sordid motives, and, therefore, I agree with the hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment that there ought to be a re-classification of crimes. The most degrading part of the punishment is not the dress, but the association with ordinary criminals, and I say not only with regard to Irish Members and others imprisoned under the Crimes Act, but in reference to members of the Salvation Army, persons who are imprisoned for breach of the Vaccination Laws, and others, there ought to be a distinction drawn between such as these and ordinary vulgar criminals, who commit offences for their own selfish ends. There is no greater danger to the Army than the offence of insubordination, and offenders are rightly subjected to punishment, but I would not class such offenders with criminals convicted of the ordinary crimes of robbery and violence. I would separate such soldiers from ordinary criminals, and, though insubordination is a serious offence and deserves severe punishment, the taint of crime in the ordinary sense does not attach to it. Certainly I cannot support this Bill, and it would serve the purpose of raising a useful discussion, but for the spirit the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby has introduced by his attacks on the present Administration. Leaving aside the question as to whether the right hon. Gentleman was the best Home Secretary that ever existed—an opinion that I suspect is confined to himself—what we want is to debate the subject, and after the conciliatory spirit with which the debate opened and the pertinent remarks with which the Amendment was moved, I look for the result, not in the carrying of the Bill or even the Amendment, but a reconsideration of the whole subject and re-classification of offences.

MR. ATHERLEY-JONES (Durham, N.W.): It is hard to reconcile the statement of the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, that he would vote against this Bill, with the declaration that there are imposed on Irish prisoners certain degrading offices which ought to be abolished. Let me suggest to him that so far as degradation is concerned those who have undergone the experience are most able to discuss the subject. I think none of us can have listened to the speech of the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) without a feeling of very great regret that an hon. Member who claims to be the representative of an Irish constituency should have addressed the House in the terms he has used with reference to the punishment of his fellow-countrymen. But I am perfectly willing to meet him on his own ground. I frankly admit it is in the highest extent desirable that there should be a re-classification of political offences, and Anti-vaccinators and persons who offend against the rules laid down for regulating the traffic in the streets are not treated in the same exceptional manner as that sought by this Bill in relation to political offenders. Why does not the hon. Member for South Tyrone, instead of opposing this Bill, propose an expansion by which that object might be accomplished? Again, let me point out this in regard to Anti-vaccinators and Salvationists, that they are never sent to prison without the alternative of a fine, which they frequently decline to pay, and consequently are sent to prison; so I may say it is at their own option they are sent to prison. But I do not intend to press the question on these narrow grounds. I will direct attention to a different aspect of the question. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, with a candour that does him credit, says he regards those persons as political offenders. [Mr. BALFOUR expressed dissent.] Now the right hon. Gentleman has an unfortunate habit of failing to recollect what he has said on former occasions, but I think the recollection of the House will be with me when I say that he said these might be classed among political offenders.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As the hon. Gentleman is not willing to accept my contradiction, I will give it in a more formal manner. What I said was that it was very likely these persons had a political object in view, but the crime they committed was not a political one.

MR. ATHERLEY-JONES: With great respect I do not follow the logic of the right hon. Gentleman, but I daresay it is my own obtusity. It is perfectly true that many a crime committed for a political object is not a political crime—murder or assassination for instance, but inasmuch as it has a political object the person who commits it is classed among political offenders. [Cries of "No!"] I hear hon. Members say "No," but I can bring what I think is proof conclusive that in this and other countries this has been the universal practice—or very nearly so. I do not think that there is a man in the House beyond the right hon. Gentleman and his more devoted followers who entertains any doubt that these persons are political offenders. But does the right hon. Gentleman, or does he not, admit that he has control over the prisons in Ireland? I apprehend that he has at length conceded that point. If the right hon. Gentleman admits he has control over the prisons in Ireland, and if these men are political prisoners, why has he hastened to make an entirely new departure in the treatment of political offenders? I have been at some trouble to investigate what the practice in other countries is, and have made inquiries through various foreign agencies of an authentic character. In France and Austria I find that there is a classification under which political prisoners find altogether different treatment; under the system in Belgium there is the same thing; in France a political offender is only subject to detention; and I find the same applies to Germany and to Italy. Even if you travel beyond the confines of Europe you find in Mexico—a country where we do not regard civilization as being so far advanced as in Europe—political prisoners are allowed to wear their own dress, and are kept separate from other prisoners. Last of all other countries I suppose should we look for a model in Russia, but there is a very interesting book published some time ago by Dr. Langdale, in which the author refers to the political prisoners exiled to Siberia. He tells us that—

“The political prisoner in Siberia, beyond exile and temporary confinement in gaol, is not ill-used; he is not always subjected to the ordinary discipline of the criminal convict, nor obliged to associate with him; and, except in the case of those deprived of all rights, he is permitted to wear his own clothes.”

I cannot help thinking that is of very strong import in reference to what I contend is the general practice. Now, I refer to a book written by the learned Solicitor General, in which he deals with the subject of extradition, and he uses this passage—

“If a man were killed in a riot, or in an attempt to excite tumult or popular commotion, that would be a political offence, and the offender would not be liable to extradition.”

And now I pass to what is the treatment of political offenders in this country; and a Return, published in the 38th volume of “Accounts and Reports,” and moved for in 1840, shows the way in which political offenders were treated in England before the régime of the right hon. Gentleman. This Return I quote deals with the County of Monmouth, and with persons not in the position of Irish Members, but of far humbler positions in life, men who were farriers, labourers, weavers, and so forth; and among the offences with which they were charged are unlawful assembly, riot, sedition, treason, breaking into houses, violent assault, riotously assembling in arms, stealing a shot-belt and dagger, conspiring to riot, and so forth; and in all these cases the prisoners were, after conviction, allowed the regular county allowance, as before trial, but were not allowed anything extra except by order of the surgeon; they wore their own clothes, had the gaol bedding, were allowed to write to their friends, and so on, and for part of the time they were supplied with writing materials. They were allowed, be it observed, to wear their own dress. I have quoted the Returns for the county of Monmouth, but you may go through the Returns for other counties and find the same exceptional treatment meted out to men who occupied humble positions in life. Then I may ask the right hon. Gentleman why this difference in treatment of political offenders now to that which obtained in England and to which the humblest offenders were subject in 1840? In 1840 the management of prisons was in the hands of the Visiting Justices, and the Home Office possessed no authority in the matter, but the Marquess of Normanby, who was then Home Secretary, on being communicated with by a Chairman of Quarter Sessions—Sir Eardley Wilmot, I think it was—in regard to the treatment of political offenders, pointed out that he had no authority himself, but he thought it extremely desirable that the magistrates should exercise all the powers available to them for the purpose of mitigating the prison treatment of these prisoners. Now the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, who not only has very great powers, but full statutory powers not possessed by the Marquess of Normanby in 1840, has not yet even deigned a reply to the appeals made to him to make any representation to the Prisons Board for the purpose of rendering the treatment of these gentlemen less degrading and odious. I have endeavoured to discuss this matter without Party spirit, and regret that that should be introduced in a matter of such gravity. I repeat and urge upon the Chief Secretary, does he question my authorities when I say that in every civilized country in Europe, including Russia—I do not know whether I can include Spain—the treatment of political offenders shows a distinct line of demarcation from that of ordinary criminals? I put it in a more concrete form. Does the right hon. Gentleman suppose that Mr. O’Brien, if convicted in France or Germany of such an offence as he committed in this country, would receive the treatment the House of Commons to protect a certain class of prisoners in Ireland against the stipendiary magistrates, who are the most unscrupulous agents of the Executive Government; and the hon. Member actually thinks it is relevant to that proposal to ask us to increase the salaries of these magistrates. That proposal appeared to be acceptable to the Chief Secretary; but I noticed that it brought a grim smile to the countenance of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who was, apparently, so much affected by it that he has already left the House. The hon. Gentleman opposite has ingeniously busied himself in fighting an imaginary case. He has enlarged on the difficulty of distinguishing by a definition between political and non-political offences; but we ask the House to make no such definition. We are sensible of the difficulty that exists, and what we ask the House to do is to declare that in the case of a certain specified class of offenders a distinction shall be made in their prison treatment. The last speaker has endeavoured, in a vague way, to establish a connection between political speeches in Ireland and crime; but I challenge the hon. Member to establish such a relation of cause and effect. The hon. Gentleman must be aware that a tribunal armed with special powers has been sitting for months past, and all its labours up to the present moment have absolutely failed to establish such a relation. And now, Sir, I wish to recall to the attention of the House what I feel is rapidly dropping out of view—I mean the Amendment now before us. The Amendment of the hon. Member for South Tyrone is a most curious production. The Prisons Act of 1877 was passed before that hon. Gentleman adorned the House; but that Act practically declares that it is expedient to make special provision for the treatment of prisoners convicted of sedition. The plea of the hon. Member, if accepted, would put an end to all legislation whatever, because it amounts to this—that a Bill for one purpose is to be rejected because it does not contain something else. The Irish Members have enough to do to deal with the case of Ireland. We claim that in regard to an exceptional Act, applied to our own country only, and working by means of exceptional tribunals, there should be an amendment of the law; and if the hon. Member for Tyrone will introduce a Bill to remove the grievances of anti-vaccinationists and Salvationists, and will not treat his own Bill, as he did another one the other day, as a farce, the Irish Members will give it a much better reception than the evasive and discreditable hostility which has been offered to their Bill to-day. I put to the hon. Member this question: If this Bill of ours be rejected, if it fail to pass, and if we introduce a Bill to deal more generously with the case of prisoners whose offences are not of a character usually associated with crime, will he, and his friends, support that Bill?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, South): I have no hesitation in saying that I will consider any Bill he introduces on its merits.

MR. SEXTON: As the bird fanciers might say, the hon. Member has been struck under the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. There is too much of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham in his reply to entitle it to attention. I invite the House to observe a contrast. Here is the hon. Member for South Tyrone—a man who has few admirers anywhere—attempting to perpetuate a system of torture which has been applied ruthlessly and shamefully in the case of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Kildare; and here is the hon. Member for Kildare—a man of such gentleness of character and such culture and such high principle that he has many friends on both sides of the House, and few enemies anywhere outside of it. I have disposed of the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Tyrone. I can only tell him that, in my opinion, it is completely irrelevant to the Bill. I can hardly imagine that any Member of the House, except a Member moved by eternal affection for the Amendment, can bring himself to support it; and if the Government gives it any countenance, I can only conclude that they think any Amendment good enough to defeat an Irish Bill. Now, I come to the Bill itself, and I claim for it that, so far from proposing anything novel, startling, or questionable, it is in accord with the spirit of the law, and of the prison rules as they exist. Our opponents speak as if it were proposed that all prisoners shall be treated alike. We claim special treatment for one class of prisoners, and I enforce that plea by pointing out to the House that special treatment of classes of prisoners is at present the rule of the prison service. May I first refer to the case of debtors? The non-fulfilment of an order of the Court to pay a debt may involve a grievous wrong, and inflict the worst injury on innocent persons, even to the loss of their means of living; and yet, by a special rule of the Prison Department of Ireland, the debtor is saved from all the indignities inflicted on ordinary criminals. I now pass to the case of the Statute of Edward III. How does it happen that Father Stephens, when imprisoned under that Statute, was not subjected to any prison indignity; while Father Clarke, who was imprisoned under the Statute of Victoria, was treated as a common criminal? I may mention that by the Act of 1877 persons imprisoned for contempt of Court are treated as first-class misdemeanants. Where is the consistency of such a system? Now I come to the strongest case of all—that of seditious libel and sedition. Seditious libel is an offence which, in the eye of any Government, ranks next to treason in gravity. Incitement to sedition is incitement to rebellion and disorder, and sedition may provoke not merely the loss of individual lives, but massacres. It is an offence next to the capital offence, and it may, in certain cases, have consequences as grave, and even more grave, than those following upon treason. Yet under the Prisons Act of 1877, and under the rules framed in furtherance of that Act, prisoners for seditious libel and sedition are treated as first-class misdemeanants, and they are exempted from all those indignities which are inflicted in Ireland upon the men who attend a meeting of a branch of the National League, or who publish a report of the proceedings in a newspaper. I claim that no reason can be shown for inflicting these indignities and hardships upon prisoners under the Crimes Act, when they are not inflicted on prisoners for sedition. Now, Sir, since the passing of the Prisons Act of 1877 a situation totally new has been created in Ireland. I believe, if the Coercion Act had been passed before the Prisons Act, the House would not have hesitated to include in the Prisons Act such a provision as we ask you to agree to to-day. The Prisons Act contemplated conviction by an independent jury and sentence by an independent Judge; but many prisoners are now convicted by two itinerant Justices, who are paid servants of the Executive, and who can be appointed, promoted, and dismissed at the will of the Chief Secretary. Therefore, I say, a special case exists for the amendment of the Prisons Act, and for altering the prison rules, because the Government, by their coercive legislation, have created in Ireland a new kind of jurisdiction, a new offence, and a class of prisoners which was not in the mind of the Legislature when the Prisons Act was passed. Now, Sir, may I ask the House to consider for a moment the nature of the Coercion Act itself? How was it passed? It was passed through political capital generated by a crime—a crime which had been signally and memorably avenged by the suicide of the criminal. If it had not been for the forged letter, and the public opinion generated by that letter, it would have been impossible for the Government to break down the rights of the House of Commons in passing the Coercion Act, and they could never have prevented us debating the Bill in Committee and on Report. We should then have had an opportunity of debating the clause which enables the Government to treat political prisoners as ordinary criminals, which regulates the mode and extent of the punishment, and which enables the Government to subject political prisoners in Ireland to indignities. The Coercion Bill was passed by this House by an act of criminal fraud, and we are entitled now to ask for atonement. I hope you regret and deplore that fraud. I say our claim on you is exceptional, and we now call upon you, by passing this Bill, to do that which I have no doubt you would have done for us if we had been able to ask it when the Coercion Act was passed. Sir, that Act was a political measure, because it was passed against the will of the representatives of the Irish people; and there never is a case of a penal Act passed for a country against the will of the representatives of the people of that country unless it be a political Act. The Act was also passed against the will of one.

of the Imperial Parties in the State, and it is administered by the instruments of one Party, and in the real or fancied interests of that Party, and nothing else. Do Englishmen mean to say that an Act passed in face of the stern and resolute opposition of one of the Imperial Parties in the State is an Act which was passed against non-political crime? These facts are conclusive that the Coercion Act is directed, not against crime as ordinarily understood in any civilized country in the world, but against acts and words of a strictly political character. If the Chief Secretary had used his power, we should not have found it necessary to trouble the House with the present Bill. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby never said a truer thing than when he stated that this question might have been met by administration without legislation. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, who is ever ready with his evasive subtleties and superficialities, might to-morrow meet these cases by a set of rules for the instruction of the Visiting Justices; but he has refused to use his power, and tells us to procure an amendment of the law. Now we offer an amendment of the law, and we ask him to affirm that all or some of the prisoners under the Crimes Act are entitled, not to be treated as first-class misdemeanants, but, at any rate, to some special or particular mode of treatment. But what is the treatment we receive at the hands of officials in Ireland? The other day the Corporation of Dublin appointed a deputation of Justices of the Peace to wait on the General Prisons Board. But that Board refused to see the deputation, although it was composed of persons concerned by their office in the administration of the law and the preservation of order. The insolence which characterizes the Chief Secretary, Sir, pervades every part of the administration of my unfortunate country. In England it is easy to get interviews with departmental officials and even with Cabinet Ministers; but the paltriest clerk in Dublin Castle, by virtue of the insolence which is the dominant note of the Government, thinks he may slam the door of his office in your face. I ask the Chief Secretary to consider for a moment whether his supporters and friends are satisfied with his policy in this regard. [A Laugh.] He laughs at that, but I may remind him of the speech the other day of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, in which that right hon. Gentleman declared that if a Bill of this kind were introduced he would be inclined to support it. At the same time, I do not know whether any speech of the right hon. Gentleman, even in his own judgment, holds good for a fortnight. But if his speeches are of such perishable material, I think his declarations are entitled to some attention from the Minister responsible for the affairs of Ireland. But I would further remind the Chief Secretary that a distinguished Judge, who is a most pronounced Unionist, has attacked his policy, and I would beg the Chief Secretary also to note the change in the tone of some of the Unionist organs, such as the Standard, Telegraph, and Echo, both in London and the Provinces, as proof of the fact that public opinion is growing tired of this policy of torture, and would gladly see an end put to this policy of futile exasperation. Does the Chief Secretary think his policy has succeeded? He speaks of the diminution of serious crimes; but that has nothing to do with the case, because the Coercion Act was not passed against such crimes. Serious crimes, such as were committed the other day in broad daylight in Clare, are committed with impunity just in the very districts where all the resources and all the machinery of the Coercion Act has been diligently applied for a period of nearly two years. We are told that boycotting has diminished, but the figures about boycotting are mere vapour. They rest upon the word of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, or upon information conveyed to him by some anonymous clerk in Dublin Castle, and the right hon. Gentleman has refused to give any evidence about those figures. We have always challenged his figures, and we even say that the Government, from their late associations in Courts and elsewhere, are now in the position of persons whose evidence requires to be corroborated. The figures about boycotting were high two years ago, and why, Sir? Because this fancy barometer runs up and down in Ireland to suit the convenience of the Government. Two years ago the figures were high, because the Government wanted to pass the Coercion Act; now they are low, because it is the cue of the Government, because they want to say that the Act has availed to effect their object; and, Sir, the figures will be high again next year if you want to pass a fresh Coercion Act or amend the present one, and to back up another Pigott enterprise. I reject the figures on boycotting, as I reject any evidence offered by a Minister who declines to submit tests when challenged. I say, further, that the whole question turns on the number of evicted farms. The Lord Lieutenant spared a few moments from his sports last year to give us some figures on this subject; but those figures were blown to pieces by the hon. Member for Shoreditch, and the Lord Lieutenant has never dared to repeat them. If the prison treatment of the Government in Ireland has failed to permit the leasing of evicted farms, it has availed to do nothing. I am here to say, on the authority of those who know every county in Ireland, that it has failed to effect your object. I challenge you to produce your figures and support them by details, and I have my friends' authority for saying that, although the Government have put agitators, editors, clergymen, and tenants into prison, and compelled them to associate with the basest and most degraded of criminals in the hours of exercise, those agitators and those editors, clergymen, and tenants were more powerful than ever; they have greater political influence, and that has been the effect of your course of persecution and exasperation. The number of evicted farms is greater now than it was when the Coercion Act was passed. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman opposite, who says that nothing could degrade a man who was conscious of an honourable motive. I do not think your prison treatment can degrade any man, but your intention is to degrade him, and, whatever the effect may be upon his own mind and heart, he has the right to resist your base and personal motive. The Chief Secretary sees that the indignities of his prison treatment have failed to render less keen the opposition of the men he has incarcerated. They have returned to the prison again and again. Have they not pursued the same course after as before imprisonment?

Are they less strong in the eyes of the community? Is their political power diminished? The Chief Secretary must answer every question of this nature in the negative; and these negatives are a better condemnation of his system than any arguments which may be used. What about the men who have not yielded; what about Mr. O'Brien and Mr. Carew? The Chief Secretary, in a mood of after-dinner gaiety, ridiculed the message which I sent him, acting under the spur of an urgent sense of public duty. Hon. Gentlemen may not know the fact that I had become aware from the public prints that my hon. Friend and colleague and countryman, Mr. William O'Brien, had been thrown down by prison warders first upon his face, then upon his back, his arms twisted, and then that he was dragged across the yard, and so treated that he was driven into a state of insensibility. ["Oh!" and laughter.] You laugh. He was brought into such a condition—a gentleman the equal of any of you in character, and the superior of any of you in intellect—that the Visiting Justice who saw him sent for a clergyman, a proceeding which is generally regarded in Ireland as heralding the danger of death. Is it to be said that I, who was responsible for the conduct and peace of the people, was not bound—when I heard that the prison authorities of Clonmel were in communication with the right hon. Gentleman on the subject, and that he might be forming a decision on the subject that very night—to avert the danger of the death of my hon. Friend, and the danger of an insurrection the next day in Ireland? The right hon. Gentleman objects to have a telegram sent him at 11 or 12 o'clock at night; but he does not object to hustle Mr. O'Brien from Clonmel Gaol to Tullamore at 3 o'clock in the morning. At what hour does he make arrests in Ireland? His myrmidons through the country make arrests burglariously, by arresting men and taking them from their beds at night. In the message which I sent him I denounced his conduct with regard to my friend. The right hon. Gentleman took upon himself to ridicule that message before a pack of cowards who thought they were laughing privately. But the right hon. Gentleman is not a spontaneous humourist. I think that very clothes beside him, as being left naked? Our conduct may be good or bad, and I am not going to justify it or the reverse; but I do assert that it cannot properly be described by the phrase leaving the prisoner naked. The right hon. Gentleman has asked me whether I think my policy in Ireland has succeeded. I can give him a very brief and clear answer to that question. I think it has succeeded and is succeeding. I think it has succeeded and is succeeding amid difficulties which have never been placed before any Government previously. It has succeeded and is succeeding in the face of a conspiracy, in which Members both below and above the Gangway appear to be engaged, to make the enforcement of the law impossible. That success is not demonstrated merely by the statistics of agrarian crime, though it is amply demonstrated by the statistics of boycotting, upon which the hon. Gentleman has commented. He says these statistics are pure fiction, and he bases that statement on the idea that every official connected with these statistics is untrustworthy. I feel sure that that opinion, though shared by hon. Members below the Gangway, is not shared by right hon. Gentlemen on the benches opposite. The statistics of boycotting are as carefully prepared as the statistics of agrarian outrage. I assert boldly that the result of every examination of the facts I have been able to make, checked by independent reports from all sorts and conditions of men, convinces me beyond a doubt that the improvement which has occurred in this Department of Irish administration—the enormous diminution of the vilest form of intimidation which has ever been preached or practised on a large scale—is such that, if no other result had happened from the passing of the Crimes Act 18 months ago, this diminution would have amply justified it. The right hon. Gentleman says, “How about boycotted farms?” The information I have received about boycotted farms confirms the information I have received with regard to other questions raised by the hon. Gentleman. Boycotted farms are being taken more freely.

*MR. J. ELLIS: Give us some instances.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman opposite, who probably agrees that to take a boycotted farm is a crime against society—

*MR. J. ELLIS: The right hon. Gentleman must not put that into my mouth. I asked the right hon. Gentleman for facts and figures with regard to his statement.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I beg to tell the hon. Gentleman that if I were to give the names of those who have taken boycotted farms, and make them public, I should be carrying out the intention which I understand the hon. Gentleman himself to disclaim, but which is not disclaimed by his allies below the Gangway—I should hand over the persons who have exercised that legitimate right to the vengeance of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway. I assert that there is no country in the world which would consider these crimes as in any sense political. Point out to me a civilized country which would allow the forms of intimidation preached and practised by Members below the Gangway to pass unpunished or punished lightly, because, forsooth, the persons who had preached and practised them had declared they did so in the interests of the independence of their country. That plea would be swept aside without a moment's consideration; and, though I admit that the English law recognizes no distinction, except in the one case of sedition, between crimes political and crimes non-political, I do not admit that, in this matter, we are behind our neighbour. Some useful hints are supplied by a Commission appointed to deal with the difficult subject of extradition. The Commission reported in 1878. Upon the Commission were the late Sir Alexander Cockburn, Lord Selborne, Baron Blackburn, Mr. Russell Gurney, Sir Richard Bagge, Sir William Brett, Sir James Stephen, and “our trusty and well-beloved Sir William George Vernon Harcourt, Knight.” This Report said, very properly, that purely political offences ought to be excluded from extradition, and it gave some sort of general account of those offences. The Report went on to say—

“It becomes a very different thing when, in furtherance of some political, or pretended political, purpose, foul crimes are committed.”

I think that distinction drawn by this Commission is exactly the right one. In so far as the offence is political, leave it unpunished or treat it differently from other offences as you please; but the offences now under our consideration are not political. They are directed against the individual and not against the State, and it is for that reason that I protest against many of the distinctions which hon. Gentlemen opposite have attempted to draw upon this subject. I leave now with some reluctance the speech of the hon. Gentleman, and go to some of the arguments advanced in the early part of the discussion; and here I am bound to reply to the speech delivered by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby. I am sorry he is not here. I am aware—and he told the House—that he had to go away on business; but I confess that, while one of the most agreeable duties I have to perform is that of answering the right hon. Gentleman, the pleasure is greatly diminished when the right hon. Gentleman is not present to hear my reply. The right hon. Gentleman was this afternoon in one of his statesmanlike moods. He only lapsed from that under the temptation of attacking Dr. Barr, and his attack on Dr. Barr was not only violent, and so unjustifiable that I must say I think the manner in which the Member for Derby spoke of Dr. Barr because he wrote a letter, not in connection with his prison duties in England—not having relation to any functions he is now asked to perform in Ireland—but merely having a retrospective reference to duties which he did perform there, and in respect to the performance of which he has been the victim of some of the basest attacks ever made upon a public man—I say that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby's attack on Dr. Barr is not only most unjust, but most ungenerous. He has made himself the bravo of Gentlemen below the Gangway. He has attacked a man whom they are always attacking, and has done his best to blast the character and ruin the prospects of one who has always done his duty fearlessly and always performed his public functions most ably and conscientiously. I turn now to the more properly argumentative part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech. He said that all these difficulties would have been avoided by reasonable administration—in other words, he suggested that the Executive Government should have interfered with regard to a certain section of Crimes Act prisoners, and if they had done so this difficulty would never have come before us. The right hon. Gentleman's doctrine on this point is not only very bad doctrine, but it is entirely new doctrine. It is a doctrine which was not believed in by himself when he was at the Home Office; it was not believed in by the right hon. Member for the Bridgeton Division when he was Chief Secretary, but was invented in the happy freedom from responsibility of political opposition. The right hon. Gentleman now says to his political opponents—"You are responsible for the way in which the Act is administered in our prisons." The House will remember the long and eloquent answer given by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby to a question not addressed to him on the prison treatment of Mr. Davitt. From that answer, one would have supposed that the right hon. Gentleman, when in office, was in the habit of telling the prison officials what they would have to do, and the medical officers of the prisons what they would have to prescribe. That is the gloss the right hon. Gentleman now puts on the matter, but it was not the version the right hon. Gentleman, as Home Secretary, gave to the House of Commons, when asked in the House how Mr. Davitt was being treated. This is his answer, and it is very important; for it shows the doctrine always held, and still held by responsible Ministers. He was asked, on the 7th of February, 1881, how Mr. Davitt was being treated, and he answered—

"When Mr. Davitt was taken into custody, I ordered that a medical report should be made as to the condition of his health, and that report was accordingly made last Friday. The report states that he was suffering from bronchial catarrh, to which, it is said, he has been subject. Thereupon"—that is, in consequence of the medical report—"I issued general instructions to the effect that he should be treated with all possible indulgence, and that the greatest possible attention should be paid to the state of his health."

Just so; but my point is that in 1881 he did not take the view which he took to-day, and that he left it to the prison doctor to say what the treatment of the prisoner was to be. The right hon. Gentleman went on to say—

"I have also directed that particular attention should be given to his having proper diet, proper rooms, and proper bedding. He will be kept apart from the other convicts, a matter which is possible by the rules under which persons placed on probation in confinement are treated."

Again, you will observe, that, in defending the treatment of Mr. Davitt, it is not to his own dispensing power that the right hon. Gentleman appeals, but to the rules to which every Secretary of State is subject. On a later day, February 11, 1881, in reply to a question, he says—

"Sir, visits to persons in prisons are made under certain fixed rules, and those rules cannot be safely departed from at the instance of any particular class of persons, whether Members of this House or otherwise."

He adds—

"I wish to add, however, that in consideration of the fact that Davitt was suffering from indisposition at the time of his committal, I have, on the application of a private friend of the prisoner, directed that a special visit from that friend shall be permitted, in order that the friends of Davitt may be satisfied as to the state of his health, and that he is not suffering any physical hardship in consequence of his detention."

I want to point out that, whereas the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby and Lord Spencer now say that the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary ought to interfere with the particular punishments meted out to prisoners, in their statements in Parliament they constantly referred to the prison rules; and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division, in mentioning the amount of privilege given to Mr. Harrington, when he had been relieved from the disagreeable incidents of prison discipline, never had the courage to announce this doctrine to the House which we now hear of for the first time in all its naked absurdity—that it is the business of the Executive Government to modify, at their own will, the prison discipline in favour of particular prisoners. The right hon. Member for Derby says that Home Secretaries are always modifying prison treatment, and he actually takes as an illustration the case of infanticide. Now, what is the law with regard to infanticide? Under the law as it at present stands, the Judge has no option whatever but to inflict the extreme penalty of death. Of course, in these circumstances the absurdity is corrected, not by an administrative act, but by the Royal Prerogative of Mercy, and if the right hon. Member for Derby—that champion of Prerogative—were to say that the case of infanticide is a precedent, that would only show that he does not understand the law under which Crimes Act prisoners are committed. Then, the right hon. Gentleman says that, as we had failed to remedy the difficulty by administrative means, the magistrates ought to have got us out of the difficulty by inflicting different sentences. I would like to point out that, although you may listen by the hour to speeches on the other side of the House with regard to the infliction of sentences by resident magistrates in Ireland, you never hear that there is any such thing at all as an appeal from those sentences. Now, all these cases are cases in which an appeal is possible. It is stated though most untruly, that I gave directions or hints to the Resident Magistrates that they were not to make these men first-class misdemeanants. But I have no power over the County Court Judges. They are as independent of me as they are of you; they are as independent as the superior Judges in Ireland. They did mitigate sentences and make prisoners first class misdemeanants in some cases. Why, then, did not Mr. Harrington appeal if he thought he ought to be made a first-class misdemeanant, seeing that the County Court Judges had shown no reluctance to put men into that class? But Mr. Harrington did not appeal, and that is sufficient to prove that in Mr. Harrington's opinion the sentence would not have been modified by the County Court Judge upon appeal. Now, observe, we pride ourselves on the fact that the progress of democracy means the progress of equal laws. But if you carry out the principles recently developed on that Bench you will have anything but equal laws. I cannot imagine anything more detrimental to the progress of equal laws or to the equality of sentences; I cannot conceive anything against which a man interested in equality should more sternly set his face than the doctrine now enunciated from the front Opposition Bench. I hope the House has followed the controversy closely enough to understand that it is not in the interest of humanity, but of politics, that this agitation has been in the first instance started. I could admit that the people of this country who have been affected by the agitation are influenced by motives of humanity and of humanity alone. But those who started the agitation, by their own confession, have been moved by political considerations, and political considerations almost entirely. Mr. O'Brien stated, I think in the Pall Mall Gazette, that the primary object of his action with regard to prison treatment was to make the government of Ireland impossible. A similar declaration was made by the hon. Member for East Mayo, confirming the original statement of Mr. O'Brien, and implying that all this agitation about prison clothes, treatment, and diet had been started for a purely political object and in the interests of a purely political Party. Therefore, though that should not modify any conclusion we may come to on the merits of the question, let us understand that it is not humanity but politics that is at the root of the whole matter. Why is it that in this Bill Crimes Act prisoners alone are contemplated? Why, because it is only in relation to Crimes Act prisoners that you can get up political excitement and manufacture political capital. You would never get a "National Protest" in favour of the victims of the Vaccination Acts or the Bribery Acts, or for the purpose of condemning the way in which members of the Salvation Army are treated. They have no political value, and therefore it is that, year after year, you allow their fate to go uncommented upon in this House; and at this moment, when you bring in a Bill which is far more applicable to them than it is to any Gentleman sitting below the Gangway, even within the four corners of that Bill there is no reference, however remote, to the lot of any one of these classes of prisoners. But will this Bill satisfy the Gentlemen themselves who have brought it in? Here I note a curious and interesting contradiction. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, in explaining his views, told us that, roughly speaking, the persons he wanted to relieve were the persons who made speeches and wrote articles. That, however, is not the view of the hon. Member for Cork and his Party sitting below the Gangway, for the hon. Member for Cork, at a dinner at the Eighty Club the other day said that "Larkin was convicted of a political offence—just as much a political offence as those committed by Mr. O'Brien and Mr. Carew." Now, what was Larkin committed for, and who committed him? Larkin was a man tried before Chief Baron Palles for resisting the process of the law, and Chief Baron Palles sentenced him to 18 months' hard labour, and at the end of that time to find security for his good behaviour, which would, as the learned Judge said, give an opportunity to those who induced Larkin to commit this crime to come forward and find the sureties. Now, the House will observe these two doctrines; the one propounded above the Gangway, that the man who makes a speech or writes an article, and he alone, is a political offender, and should be treated exceptionally; and the far more logical doctrine expounded by the hon. Member for Cork, that the man who violently resists the process of the law—is, not less than the man who incites him to that act, a political prisoner, and is to be treated as a first-class misdemeanant. This Bill will not satisfy either the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby or hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, because it is founded on no principle, will stand no examination, and will not bear a moment's argument. Remember that if you pass this Bill you will make first-class misdemeanants of men guilty of boycotting, of riot, of unlawful assembly, of taking forcible possession, and of promoting the objects of illegal associations. Now, are you really prepared, in the face of experience and Irish history, to carry out a policy like that? You had the experience in Mr. Forster's time of making these people first-class misdemeanants, and the result was that it ceased to be a punishment and became almost a luxury to be sent to prison. I, therefore, venture to say that I have shown, in the first place, that administrative interference is not the proper method of dealing with this Question, and not the method that any previous Government has adopted, and not the method that this Government could adopt without grave danger to law in this country and in Ireland. I have also shown, in the second place, that if the Courts of Law have not carried out the intentions which the right hon. Gentleman thinks they ought to have carried out, it is because persons have not appealed to them. In the third place, I have shown that this Bill, if carried, would satisfy neither the Member for Derby nor the Member for Cork, and I have suggested what I believe to be the case, that if you are really to carry this Bill into effect, and make the grave crimes I have enumerated only punishable by imprisonment as first-class misdemeanants, you would rob punishment of that which alone makes it valuable or justifiable — namely, its deterrent effects. A few words in regard to my own view of this question. I have been told over and over again that there is a great tide of public opinion arising upon this subject. I am not at all prepared to say that the judicious efforts of the gentlemen who get up the “national protest” may not have produced an effect upon the public mind in some parts of the country. I do not doubt it at all, but it is poor statesmanship to make irrational and wholly unjustifiable alterations in the fundamental law and procedure in this country in obedience to any mere passing phase of public opinion. While I say that, I also fully grant that it is equally poor statesmanship not to try and find out what there is defensible, rational, and logical at the bottom of the feeling which at any particular crisis has been excited in the country. I am utterly unable to accept, the particular solution which has been given either by this Bill or in any of the speeches which I have heard from gentlemen who support the Bill. It seems to me irrational, indefensible, and destructive of equality before the law; but I quite admit that there may be, and very likely is, something entirely justifiable in the feeling which has been aroused, and of which the Bill is the illogical and unreasonable expression. With regard to prison rules I do not profess to speak as one who has either time or inclination to study the question, and I also have to recognize that while the tendency of modern legislation has been in the direction indicated in the rules embodied in the English Act of 1865, and the Irish Act of 1877, by which a rigid uniformity of practice has been imposed on every prisoner, be he whom he may, and be he condemned for what offence he may. That is the whole tendency of modern legislation and our prison discipline both in England and Ireland has been subject to so many and such recent revision at the hands of Royal Commissioners that I confess I have the utmost doubt of my own views on the subject, and I should reluctantly venture to differ from any conclusions at which the Royal Commissioners arrived, or which have been embodied in the legislation that has been from time to time passed by Parliament. Yet I confess at the same time that for my own part I never have been able to understand on what principle such things as prison clothes, hair cutting, and matters of that kind have been enforced on every kind of prisoner, wholly irrespective of his condition. They are classed under the prison rules, I believe, as matters appertaining to health; and I apprehend there is no doubt whatever that the origin of all those rules was a sanitary origin. But though they arose simply from considerations of health and cleanliness they have been enforced by a rigid iron rule of uniformity on every prisoner, even although he did not require the application of them either on the ground of health or of cleanliness. Consider a case which I heard of only a few hours ago. I heard of a respectable woman, the wife of an English tradesman, who got into some trouble by refusing to have her child vaccinated. She was brought up before the magistrates, was convicted, and went to prison; she was forcibly stripped and put into the bath; she was in fact treated in precisely the same manner as if she had been the dirtiest of tramps taken up in the streets. [“Shame!”] You may say “Shame,” but recollect that these are the rules which the Royal Commissioners have adopted, and which you have sanctioned and acquiesced in for years. It certainly appears to me, in so far as I understand the philosophy of punishment at all, that these kinds of punishment which do not inflict discomfort, but which are thought by some persons to inflict degradation, need not, and ought not to, form part of the penal system, because the evil of that kind of punishment is this—that the hardened criminal is not punished by it at all. The hardened and habitual criminal suffers no discomfort, no degradation by being compelled to put on the prison clothes and all the rest of it; and to the tramp who has not a good suit of clothes I believe it may often be a positive luxury to get the prison clothes. There are other classes of rules that are equally absurd. Controversies have been raised about my action in Ireland in regard to priests. Now, the question of the clerical habit of the priest is only one of a series of similar problems which you may have to meet at any moment in your treatment of prisoners in regard to their religion both in England and Ireland. Take, for instance, the case of Jews. If you rigidly enforced your prison rules, the Jew necessarily would suffer in his religious feelings; and the result is—I believe illegally—that some modification has been made in the English prisons in respect to Jews. A corresponding question arises in the case of other religions and nationalities. As I have just stated, these rules as to prison clothes, dietary, and the like, as in those questions of religious feeling, have a cast iron uniformity which recent legislation has imposed that appears to me to be highly absurd. Many suggestions have been made on both sides in favour of classifying prisoners according to their offences. I have myself no objection to that experiment being tried; but I am told by those possessing experience, that it is almost certain to fail; and unless there be very strong authority for doing it I should not embark on such a futile enterprise. But I think it is eminently worthy of consideration by the prison authorities, both in England and Ireland, whether we cannot remove whatever may be repulsive in the administration of the prison rules in England and Ireland. Of course, I need not say to those hon. Gentlemen who have done me the honour of listening to my innumerable speeches in the House on this subject, that I see no distinction that can or ought to be made in favour of prisoners who were committed under a particular Statute passed the year before last. I do not think that they ought to have or deserve to have any special treatment; but they ought to receive, like all other prisoners, the benefit of any modification that may be made in the prison rules of England or of Ireland. But the prison rules are embodied in an Act of Parliament, and they cannot be altered in England without another Act of Parliament. In Ireland, I believe, the case is somewhat different. I believe that the Lord Lieutenant in Council, with the sanction of Parliament, may make such modification to the rules as I have suggested. My present idea of dealing with this matter—mind I pronounce no final decision—is to ask one or two gentlemen in whose judgment and knowledge of prison rules we have confidence to investigate this Question from the point of view which I have, however imperfectly, attempted to sketch to the House; and possibly by their aid we may be able to remove any shadow or semblance of grievance connected with any class of prison treatment, either in this country or in Ireland. I cannot sit down without expressing in the strongest language my conviction that it is not the Gentleman who have urged boycotting, who have urged resistance to the law, and who have carried on that agitation which, unhappily, has been so persistent in Ireland, who are entitled to special consideration in this matter, but those other persons to whom reference has been made by my hon. Friend the Member for South Tyrone. Those who have been condemned under the Vaccination Act and in connection with the Salvation Army are the class of prisoners who chiefly command our sympathies, and who ought to receive the benefit of any modification which may be made in the law.

*MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle): I think, Sir, after listening to the last quarter of the right hon. Gentleman's speech, we may feel that there is some good in the "National Protest" after all. The right hon. Gentleman said, before the end of the first part of his speech, that the proposal embodied in this Bill were not humanity but politics. Yes, but then afterwards he said he would assent to the principle of that proposal in the interests of humanity.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Certainly not.

*MR. J. MORLEY: The right hon. Gentleman says "certainly not," but after recapitulating the very ideas and arguments that were used below the Gangway this afternoon, he says with the utmost innocence "That is my view." If that is now his view, has it been his view for the last two years? Why, he now says it is perfectly natural that the wearing of the prison clothes should be objected to! But what did he say only about a week ago? He said that Mr. O'Brien, because he objected to his hair being cut and to wearing the prison clothes, was the victim of monomania. Now he is going to alter the whole system of prison discipline in order to get himself out of a scrape. Some of his remarks with reference to my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby struck me as hardly worthy of him. He says that my right hon. Friend is playing the part of a bravo for gentlemen below the Gangway. Yes, but are there no braves for you above the Gangway? Where do you go for your braves? It is said that there is a conspiracy between us above the Gangway and hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway. I should have thought that "conspiracy" was a very awkward word just now. The law of conspiracy is a two-edged sword, and who knows but that in the chances and changes of this mortal life we may yet live to see—perhaps before long—the First Lord of the Treasury himself coming down to this House and using the very arguments which we are using this afternoon on behalf of some of his very oldest friends. The Chief Secretary quoted the Report of the Commission of, I think, 1874, and said that those who signed that Commission, including my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby, ought not to make any discrimination in favour of the perpetrators of foul crime. In that we all agree. But in the case of the prisoners at Miltown-Malbay, who were sentenced because they refused to give a glass of drink to policemen who did not want a glass of drink, will the right hon. Gentleman contend that they were guilty of a foul crime? Does he say that Mr. Harrington, who was guilty of nothing more serious than the publication of reports of the meetings of a suppressed branch of the Land League, committed a foul crime? If so, would he have had the alternative of escaping his punishment by engaging not to commit it again? In the matter of Dr. Barr, I am persuaded that my right hon. Friend did not say one word too much. Why, the Home Secretary himself the other day admitted, in answer to a question, that he had rebuked Dr. Barr and requested him not to repeat his offence. The right hon. Gentleman says that this Bill is brought in to make political capital. Now, this Bill I hope, and assume, is going to be supported by my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham, because he said the other day that he would submit that on the whole question it was a fair subject for discussion, whether the gentleman, or the majority of those gentlemen, convicted under the Crimes Act should or should not be treated as first-class misdemeanants, and he added—

"If a Bill or Resolution were brought before the House dealing with the subject, I confess I should be inclined to support it."

Of course, it is not to be supposed that my right hon. Friend made that remark with a view to make political capital. I am perfectly sure that on this side of the House, almost as much as on the opposite side, there is a feeling of repugnance to the policy which the right hon. Gentleman, has been carrying out [Cries of "No" on the Ministerial side.] Someone says "No" but if there had not been that repugnance we should not have had these philosophic doubts of the right hon. Gentleman. Sir, the right hon. Gentleman opposite does not understand the Bill. I almost think he cannot have read it, because he said, and said truly, it would be absurd to treat the perpetrators of certain violent acts with special favour. But these acts are acts that are dealt with under a provision in the last line of the Bill. The Bill says that this favour is not to be extended, unless it is declared and adjudged that the offender has been guilty of assault, or attempted assault, on the person. And if these words are not enough, what would be easier than to put into the Bill a proviso meeting that case? You have only to except from the Bill the third sub-section of the 2nd section. The right hon. Gentleman referred to another class of cases, but these I would point out were cases tried before a jury; and what we ask is, that as by a special Act we have referred special conduct to a special tribunal, there is a prima facie case for treating the prisoners convicted under that Act in a special manner. The right hon. Gentleman did not think fit to deal with a single one of the most powerful arguments brought forward by the Lord Mayor of Dublin, who put a case the force of which was irresistible. The right hon. Gentleman did not answer the challenge as to the directness of connection between speeches inciting to crime and the perpetration of murder and outrage. The right hon. Gentleman has gone off too much on the question of the difficulty of defining a political prisoner. No definition is wanted of political prisoners. All that we want is an amendment of the administration of this special and

been in the first instance started. I could admit that the people of this country who have been affected by the agitation are influenced by motives of humanity and of humanity alone. But those who started the agitation, by their own confession, have been moved by political considerations, and political considerations almost entirely. Mr. O'Brien stated, I think in the Pall Mall Gazette, that the primary object of his action with regard to prison treatment was to make the government of Ireland impossible. A similar declaration was made by the hon. Member for East Mayo, confirming the original statement of Mr. O'Brien, and implying that all this agitation about prison clothes, treatment, and diet had been started for a purely political object and in the interests of a purely political Party. Therefore, though that should not modify any conclusion we may come to on the merits of the question, let us understand that it is not humanity but politics that is at the root of the whole matter. Why is it that in this Bill Crimes Act prisoners alone are contemplated? Why, because it is only in relation to Crimes Act prisoners that you can get up political excitement and manufacture political capital. You would never get a "National Protest" in favour of the victims of the Vaccination Acts or the Bribery Acts, or for the purpose of condemning the way in which members of the Salvation Army are treated. They have no political value, and therefore it is that, year after year, you allow their fate to go uncommented upon in this House; and at this moment, when you bring in a Bill which is far more applicable to them than it is to any Gentleman sitting below the Gangway, even within the four corners of that Bill there is no reference, however remote, to the lot of any one of these classes of prisoners. But will this Bill satisfy the Gentlemen themselves who have brought it in? Here I note a curious and interesting contradiction. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, in explaining his views, told us that, roughly speaking, the persons he wanted to relieve were the persons who made speeches and wrote articles. That, however, is not the view of the hon. Member for Cork and his Party sitting below the Gangway, for the hon. Member for Cork, at a dinner at the Eighty Club the other day said that "Larkin was convicted of a political offence—just as much a political offence as those committed by Mr. O'Brien and Mr. Carew." Now, what was Larkin committed for, and who committed him? Larkin was a man tried before Chief Baron Palles for resisting the process of the law, and Chief Baron Palles sentenced him to 18 months' hard labour, and at the end of that time to find security for his good behaviour, which would, as the learned Judge said, give an opportunity to those who induced Larkin to commit this crime to come forward and find the sureties. Now, the House will observe these two doctrines; the one propounded above the Gangway, that the man who makes a speech or writes an article, and he alone, is a political offender, and should be treated exceptionally; and the far more logical doctrine expounded by the hon. Member for Cork, that the man who violently resists the process of the law—is, not less than the man who incites him to that act, a political prisoner, and is to be treated as a first-class misdemeanant. This Bill will not satisfy either the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby or hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, because it is founded on no principle, will stand no examination, and will not bear a moment's argument. Remember that if you pass this Bill you will make first-class misdemeanants of men guilty of boycotting, of riot, of unlawful assembly, of taking forcible possession, and of promoting the objects of illegal associations. Now, are you really prepared, in the face of experience and Irish history, to carry out a policy like that? You had the experience in Mr. Forster's time of making these people first-class misdemeanants, and the result was that it ceased to be a punishment and became almost a luxury to be sent to prison. I, therefore, venture to say that I have shown, in the first place, that administrative interference is not the proper method of dealing with this Question, and not the method that any previous Government has adopted, and not the method that this Government could adopt without grave danger to law in this country and in Ireland. I have also shown, in the second place, that if the Courts of Law have not carried out the intentions which the right hon. Gentleman thinks they ought to have carried out, it is because persons have not appealed to them. In the third place, I the service of the country. I hope it will not be necessary for the House to sit past midnight; but the circumstances are such that we must provide for anything which may arise to prevent the Votes being taken before 12 o'clock. I trust, therefore, the House will assent to the arrangement I propose to make.

*MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): I understand the right hon. Gentleman only proposes to take business till 1 o'clock. I heard just now something said about Report of Supply being taken as the first Order of the day to-morrow. No one knows how long that would last. I suggest the Votes should be taken first. There is no urgency in regard to the Report of Supply, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will only suspend the Rule until 1 o'clock.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: If the right hon. Gentleman can give me an assurance that the public business will be completed, I shall be very glad to accept his suggestion. I do not desire to keep the House sitting one moment longer than is necessary. No attempt will be made to make progress with the Supplementary Estimates.

MR. CHILDERS: I suggested to the right hon. Gentleman to take the Navy Votes first, and not the Report of Supply.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It must be obvious that the business of the country must be carried through; but if the right hon. Gentleman can assist the Government in getting the Votes by a certain time I shall be very glad to give him the assurance he desired.

*MR. CHILDERS: So far as any influence I may have is concerned, I hope the Votes may be taken before 1 o'clock; but it would be extremely difficult to do that if Report is also taken. I repeat that there is plenty of time for the Report.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I wish the right hon. Gentleman would point out where that time is to be found. I must entirely deny the accuracy of the right hon. Gentleman's calculation. If the right hon. Gentleman looks into the matter, he will find that unless the Government appropriate fully to themselves hon. Members' time on Tuesday next, which we should be very unwilling to do, Report of Supply must be taken before that day.

Mr. W. H. Smith

*SIR R. N. FOWLER (London): I think it is useless suspending the Rule till 1 o'clock, as, if there is a fixed hour, it puts it in the power of any hon. Member to talk out the business of the House, and the right hon. Gentleman opposite cannot answer for every Member on his side of the House.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I should like to see the business of the House conducted with more smartness. The Government do not possess the confidence of the country, and Members on my side are not anxious they should continue to exercise the power of government. If there is not time now to get through the business, it is because the Government have not called Parliament together at an earlier date.

DR. TANNER (Cork, Mid): I should like to take this, the first opportunity I have had, of asking if the Government still stick to the statement made in this House the other night as regards my treatment in Scotland Yard? I understand that last Friday week it was stated that I had received most luxurious treatment at the hands of the Government, and I now ask whether the Government are prepared to substantiate or deny that statement?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. Gentleman must be aware that I have no personal knowledge whatever of the circumstances which he refers to. I understand that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary made his statement on information supplied to him by the Chief Commissioner of Police.

DR. TANNER: As I think it is in the interest of the House that the whole truth on this matter should be ascertained, I beg to give notice that I will put a question regarding it on the Paper.

PARNELLISM AND CRIME.

MR. J. G. BIGGAR (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government propose to prosecute the firm of Messrs. W. H. Smith and Sons for publishing libels?

No Answer was given.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock.

FIRST VOLUME OF SESSION 1889.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

EARL OF LUCAN'S CLAIM TO VOTE FOR REPRESENTATIVE PEERS FOR IRELAND.

Ordered and Directed, That a Certificate be sent by the Clerk of the Parliaments to the Clerk of the Crown in Ireland, stating that the Lord Chancellor of the United Kingdom has reported to the House of Lords that the right of the Earl of Lucan to vote at the elections of Representative Peers for Ireland has been established to the satisfaction of him the said Lord Chancellor; and that the House of Lords has ordered such Report to be sent to the said Clerk of the Crown in Ireland: And it is hereby also Ordered, That the said Report of the said Lord Chancellor be sent to the Clerk of the Crown in Ireland.

The Lord Bishop of Oxford—Took the Oath for the first time.

LEE-ON-THE-SOLENT (LIGHT) RAIL- WAY BILL.

The Second Reading, which stood appointed for this day, was put off to Thursday, the 28th inst.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION PROVISIONAL ORDER CONFIRMATION (ACTON, &C.) BILL. (NO. 19.)

A Bill to confirm a Provisional Order made by the Education Department under the Elementary Education Act, 1870, to enable the School Boards for Acton, Chiswick, and Liverpool to put in force the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and the Acts amending the same—Presented by The Lord President (V. Cranbrook); read 1<sup>o</sup>; to be printed; and referred to the Examiners.

H.M.S. "SULTAN."

LORD COLVILLE OF CULROSS:
Seeing the noble Lord who represents the Admiralty in his place, I wish to ask whether he can give the House any information as to the condition of Her Majesty's ship Sultan?

LORD ELPHINSTONE: We received the following telegram at the Admiralty this afternoon:—

"Malta, 1.30.—Heavy north-east gale, with high sea, forced Sultan off rock. She sank at 11.45. Upper works visible above water. No loss of life. Ships returning into harbour."

That is really, my Lords, all the information we have. We are anxiously waiting despatches, but at present we have no fresh information.

My Lords, the question of the payment of interest out of capital is not a new one. In the year 1847, after the panic which followed the great extension of our Railway system and the Railway Legislation which took place just before that time, a Standing Order was passed by your Lordships, which remained in force for a great number of years, providing that * RETURN (ordered 2nd August, 1888) of the cases in which Payment of Interest out of Capital has been sanctioned under Standing Order 128, as altered 27th May, 1886, with the amounts of Capital authorized by the several Acts, and stating the result as far as known (No. 247).

far as I can ascertain, the Regent's Canal scheme remains exactly where it was, and nothing whatever has been done to pay interest out of capital. In the case of the Dore and Chinley Railway, the power to pay interest has been abandoned, and the line has been transferred to one of the large existing companies to make with their own money. In the case of the Manchester Ship Canal Bill the capital has been raised. How far that may be due to the prevalence of an opinion that this large undertaking would pay in itself, or how far it may have been influenced by a concession of the payment of interest out of capital, it is impossible for me to give any opinion; but, looking through all the cases mentioned in the Return and to others which have since occurred, it does not appear to me that the public are more inclined to invest in companies which have the power to pay interest out of capital than they are to invest in similar companies which do not possess that power. In fact, unless the public are satisfied that the line or the scheme has a good prospect in itself, they will not be tempted to make an investment by the circumstance that interest may be paid to them out of capital. During last Session a considerable number of applications were made before Committees for power to pay interest. That power was conceded in the case of seven companies, and yet I believe I am right in saying that the power has not been exercised in a single instance. In the present Session applications for similar powers is made in the case of 18 companies, most of them minor concerns. In two or three cases these companies have been before Parliament more than once for variations of their lines, extension of time, or similar applications. In one or two cases the parties are again before Parliament for further changes of their lines or extension of time, having in the meantime raised no capital whatever. Whether or not the alteration of your Lordships' Standing Orders will tend to the good of the country by further development of undertakings giving large employment in their construction, I think no opinion can yet be formed. In the working of the Standing Order two questions have arisen—one, whether the concession of the power to pay interest out of capital should be granted at all; and, secondly, the rate at which it should be granted. As regards the first, it will be seen from the number of cases granted that the matter has been carefully watched by Committees of both Houses, and as regards the rate of interest, the principle adopted has generally been this:—the Committees have allowed the maximum of 4 per cent. practically 1 per cent above the interest on Government Stock, but they have only conceded that rate where the Company seeking the power have in its Acts agreements or arrangements with other existing companies which give a reasonable prospect of a somewhat similar rate being a permanent rate, so that when the construction is finished investors shall not be subjected to any great fall of their rate of interest. In cases where there have been no such agreements the interest has been fixed at  $3\frac{1}{2}$  or 3 per cent. One curious feature in the Returns is that the rate of interest does not appear to have materially acted on the question of raising or not raising the capital. One question, no doubt, will present itself to the Committees this Session with regard to the rate of interest. The rate of interest of the Government funds has been reduced, and the question may arise whether the maximum rate of interest should still be given—whether, in fact, 4 per cent is not too high a rate to continue? Having regard, however, to the care that has been shown by the Committees in investigating the cases and limiting the cases in which the power should be given, I think your Lordships may safely leave the matter where it is until the completion of the works and the expiry of the powers of the Acts which were sanctioned in 1886 and in 1887. When that time has expired, then, and not before, a fair opinion may be formed as to the effect which this power of payment of interest out of capital has had. Judging from the cases which have come before me, there is no doubt that very great care will have to be exercised in selecting and sifting out cases this Session, to avoid giving that power to mere speculative schemes which have no real basis except the possible hopes of speculators of some financial gain from the operation, irrespective of the real earnings of the particular scheme, and on the other hand not to avoid giving, where the importance of the scheme, not merely to particular localities, but to a large district of the country, was undoubted, every facility consistent with the Standing Orders of their Lordships' House to encourage the development and construction of such undertakings.

House adjourned at Five o'clock,
till To-morrow, a quarter
past Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 14th March, 1889.

COLONIZATION.

Ordered, That an Address be presented for Copy of the Correspondence from Colonial Governments in answer to the Memorandum by the Parliamentary Colonization Committee of the 1st day of May, 1888, be sent to Colonial Governments for their consideration and opinion, through Lord Knutsford, during the Session of 1888.—(Mr. Seton-Karr.)

QUESTIONS.

CRIMINAL PROCEDURE (SCOTLAND) ACT.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College) asked the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to the case of John Mackinnon, of Barra, a prisoner on bail, who had to undertake a difficult and dangerous journey, occupying four days, in order to record a formal plea of "not guilty" at Lochmaddy; whether he has received representations as to the great inconvenience to which inhabitants of the Outer Hebrides are exposed through the arrangements of Pleading Diets under the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act; and, whether he will consider the propriety of modifying present arrangements?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. ROBERTSON, Bute): My attention has been called to the case of John Mackinnon, and a representation has been made to me of the inconvenience to which he was subjected. With reference to the second part of the question, I must remind the hon. Member that Pleading Diets in Sheriff Court cases not tried summarily (of which this was one) have existed for many years; the only change under the recent Statute being, that now the plea can be taken by the nearest Sheriff Substitute, instead of by the Sheriff of the Court where the case would eventually be tried. In the representation made to me this change is stated to be a great improvement—which it certainly is. It is, however, undoubtedly a hardship that such long distances should have to be traversed if it can possibly be avoided, and I shall consider whether any modification of the existing arrangements can be made.

THE LONDON POLICE COURTS.

SIR UGHTRED KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH (Lancashire, Clitheroe) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, in reference to a portion of his answer of 7th December last, to the effect that the employment and payment of female officers for female prisoners at the London Police Courts had been already sanctioned, and that steps were being taken to appoint competent attendants; at how many of the 16 London Police Courts have such attendants been appointed; whether there were in each of these cases not merely a searcher but a female attendant, or police matron, in charge throughout the day and night of all female prisoners; if not, will Recommendation No. 10 of the Committee which was presided over by Mr. Justice Wills, and which reported in April, 1888, to the effect that "besides the male officer in charge of the prisoners, there should be a female officer in charge, under him of the female prisoners," be effectually carried out without further delay; also, whether he will call for Reports from the Metropolitan and City Police Courts and the other Petty Sessional Courts showing in detail how far each recommendation of Sir Alfred Will's Committee has been adopted and carried into effect; and, whether he will lay a Return, tabulating the contents of such Reports, upon the Table of the House?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam): In answer to the question of the right hon. Baronet I have to say that at the following six out of the 14 Metropolitan Police Courts—namely, Bow Street, Worship Street, Clerkenwell, Westminster, Marylebone, and the Thames—female attendants have been appointed. Appointments will be very shortly completed at Southwark, Hammersmith, Wandsworth, Greenwich, Woolwich, Dalston, and Lambeth. With regard to Marlborough Street the Secretary of State is still in communication with the learned chief magistrate with a view to overcome certain structural difficulties in the way of accommodation which have hitherto existed at that Court. I may remind the right hon. Baronet that the services of these female attendants are only required during the day, as no prisoners are detained in the Court cells after the rising of the Court at 5 in the afternoon. Prisoners who are remanded from the Police Courts are taken to prison for the night. With regard to the second question I may say that no useful purpose at this moment would be gained by the production of such a Return as is there described. Correspondence with the authorities of local courts outside the jurisdiction of the Secretary of State is still proceeding. In several cases the requirements of the Committee, which were communicated by Home Office circular, have been satisfactorily carried out and have been approved. In others correspondence aimed at securing improved accommodation is still pending, which the Secretary of State has every reason to hope will in like measure be successful.

BALLYCOTTON PIER.

MR. LANE (Cork County, E.) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, what had been the cost of the inspection and report upon the Ballycotton Pier; what was the probable cost of the alterations and repairs recommended therein; and, when would those repairs be executed?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The total cost of inspection and report will be £330 3s. 10d. I have not yet received an estimate for the works recommended by Mr. Barry, but if the hon. Member desires I will inquire and get the information.

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): Arising out of the answer of the hon. Gentleman, may I ask whether it is proposed that the money required for these repairs and alterations is to be provided by a Special Vote or economized out of the funds already pledged to other piers, and notably that of Ballyhalbert, in County Down?

MR. LANE: Is it not possible to make the contractors who have been paid £20,500 for the erection of this pier responsible for any expense incurred in consequence of the contract not having been properly performed?

MR. JACKSON: I do not think the contractors will admit that there has been any fault on their part, and I should not like to express an opinion on the subject. In answer to the question of my hon. and gallant Friend, I think I may assure him that the money will not be found at the expense of the harbour he is interested in.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): How soon will the Report of the inspection be circulated?

MR. JACKSON: That is a question for the printers.

EXCESSIVE HOURS OF LABOUR.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.) asked the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the inquest on the death of Stephen Gurr, a platelayer, in the employ of the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company, whilst fog-signalling, on the evening of 1st of January, at Norwood Junction; whether the evidence showed that Gurr went on duty at 7 a.m. on Monday, 31st December, went off at 5 p.m., was sent on duty again at 7.30 p.m., remained on duty till 7 a.m. on Tuesday, 1st January, went on duty again at 1 p.m., having only had 6 hours off duty after having been on duty 21½ hours out of the preceding 24; and, whether any inquiry has been held by the Board of Trade, or any representation made to the Company by the Board of Trade, that such excessive hours of labour involve the greatest danger to the fog-men, and also to the trains, and that it is their duty to provide a larger staff for fog-signalling, and relieve the fog-men more frequently?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): My attention has been called to the accident to Stephen Gurr, referred to, and the hours for which the unfortunate man had been on duty are undoubtedly very long. A correspondence has taken place between the Board of Trade and the Company.

MR. CHANNING: Will the right hon. Gentleman lay on the Table the correspondence on the subject between the Board of Trade and the Railway Company?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Yes.

MR. CHANNING: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman to lay on the Table any assurances which may have been given by the railway company as to their future action on the subject?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: That hardly arises out of my answer, but I will consider the matter.

EMIGRATION TO THE ARGENTINE REPUBLIC.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked the Under Secretary for the Colonies whether he was aware that large numbers of emigrants are leaving Portsmouth for the Argentine Republic; and whether it was possible for the Emigrants' Information Office to circulate, for the guidance of intending emigrants to South America, accurate information as to soil, climate, probabilities of employment, wages, and cost of living in the Argentine Republic?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, Toxteth): The increase of emigration to South America is referred to in the last Report on Emigration, and has been continued during the present year, as stated by my right hon. Friend the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs in his reply to a question in the House on the 28th of February. Large numbers of inquiries with regard to the Argentine Republic are received at the Emigrants' Information Office, and are usually referred to the London Information Office of the Argentine Government, unless they can be answered from such Consular and other Reports as are received through the Foreign Office. The instructions given to the Committee of the Emigrants' Information Office confine them to the British Colonies, and their staff is so limited that their present work, to be done thoroughly, gives full occupation. It is undoubtedly most desirable that accurate information should be given as to foreign countries to which British emigrants go, notably at the present time the Argentine Republic; but if the office is to undertake to do so, it must be strengthened and enlarged. The Committee do what they can at present in inviting and utilizing for individual inquirers any information bearing on emigration to any part of the world, while not issuing pamphlets as to any but British Colonies.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I believe that the information already given by the Office has been of great advantage to emigrants, and prevented many of them from going to places where they could not get employment. Will the Government recommend some additional outlay, for the purpose of extending this information?

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: I should be glad to do it, but I am afraid it is a question for the Treasury. We have no money.

MR. BRADLAUGH: As the Secretary to the Treasury is in his place, and has heard the answer of the Under Secretary, may I ask whether an application to the Treasury for money for this purpose by the Colonial Office would receive his support?

MR. JACKSON: I am quite sure that the Treasury will give the most respectful and earnest consideration to any application that may be made to it.

THE SHERIFF DEPUTE OF CAITHNESS.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox) asked the Lord Advocate whether it is the case that Mr. Thoms, Sheriff Depute of Caithness, while sitting on the bench at Wick and dealing with a case, Weir against Weir, which had been appealed to him from the Sheriff Substitute, abstracted 18 pages or thereby of the written evidence taken before the Sheriff Substitute in the case; whether Mr. Thoms cast said pages aside and destroyed them, stitching up the remaining evidence; if so, was Mr. Thoms entitled to act in such a way; and, if he was not so entitled to act, what steps does the Lord Advocate intend taking in the circumstances?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON requested the hon. Member to put down the Question for another day.

MR. CALDWELL: I will repeat it on Monday.

far as I can ascertain, the Regent's Canal scheme remains exactly where it was, and nothing whatever has been done to pay interest out of capital. In the case of the Dore and Chinley Railway, the power to pay interest has been abandoned, and the line has been transferred to one of the large existing companies to make with their own money. In the case of the Manchester Ship Canal Bill the capital has been raised. How far that may be due to the prevalence of an opinion that this large undertaking would pay in itself, or how far it may have been influenced by a concession of the payment of interest out of capital, it is impossible for me to give any opinion; but, looking through all the cases mentioned in the Return and to others which have since occurred, it does not appear to me that the public are more inclined to invest in companies which have the power to pay interest out of capital than they are to invest in similar companies which do not possess that power. In fact, unless the public are satisfied that the line or the scheme has a good prospect in itself, they will not be tempted to make an investment by the circumstance that interest may be paid to them out of capital. During last Session a considerable number of applications were made before Committees for power to pay interest. That power was conceded in the case of seven companies, and yet I believe I am right in saying that the power has not been exercised in a single instance. In the present Session applications for similar powers is made in the case of 18 companies, most of them minor concerns. In two or three cases these companies have been before Parliament more than once for variations of their lines, extension of time, or similar applications. In one or two cases the parties are again before Parliament for further changes of their lines or extension of time, having in the meantime raised no capital whatever. Whether or not the alteration of your Lordships' Standing Orders will tend to the good of the country by further development of undertakings giving large employment in their construction, I think no opinion can yet be formed. In the working of the Standing Order two questions have arisen—one, whether the concession of the power to pay interest out of capital should be granted at all; and, secondly, the rate at which it should be granted. As regards the first, it will be seen from the number of cases granted that the matter has been carefully watched by Committees of both Houses, and as regards the rate of interest, the principle adopted has generally been this:—the Committees have allowed the maximum of 4 per cent. practically 1 per cent above the interest on Government Stock, but they have only conceded that rate where the Company seeking the power have in its Acts agreements or arrangements with other existing companies which give a reasonable prospect of a somewhat similar rate being a permanent rate, so that when the construction is finished investors shall not be subjected to any great fall of their rate of interest. In cases where there have been no such agreements the interest has been fixed at  $3\frac{1}{2}$  or 3 per cent. One curious feature in the Returns is that the rate of interest does not appear to have materially acted on the question of raising or not raising the capital. One question, no doubt, will present itself to the Committees this Session with regard to the rate of interest. The rate of interest of the Government funds has been reduced, and the question may arise whether the maximum rate of interest should still be given—whether, in fact, 4 per cent is not too high a rate to continue? Having regard, however, to the care that has been shown by the Committees in investigating the cases and limiting the cases in which the power should be given, I think your Lordships may safely leave the matter where it is until the completion of the works and the expiry of the powers of the Acts which were sanctioned in 1886 and in 1887. When that time has expired, then, and not before, a fair opinion may be formed as to the effect which this power of payment of interest out of capital has had. Judging from the cases which have come before me, there is no doubt that very great care will have to be exercised in selecting and sifting out cases this Session, to avoid giving that power to mere speculative schemes which have no real basis except the possible hopes of speculators of some financial gain from the operation, irrespective of the real earnings of the particular scheme, and on the other hand not to avoid giving, where the im-

land, whether a number of "passes" have been issued, in the following form, by a Sergeant of Constabulary in the Gweedore district: "Please let bearer—pass. Owen Mahoney, Sergeant R.I.C. Date—," in default of possession of one of which the people of the district are unable to pass along the roads or through the country at their pleasure; and, by whose authority this Police Sergeant is thus acting?

* MR. MADDEN: The Constabulary Authorities report that when the search for Mr. Martin's murderers was progressing Sergeant Mahoney gave passes as described to a few persons against whom he knew there was no suspicion, so that the inconvenience of stopping and examining them might be saved. It is, however, not the case that without these passes persons are unable to pass along the roads, or through the country, at their pleasure. The Sergeant acted on his own responsibility in giving the passes.

MR. WOODALL (Hanley): Arising out of the answer of the right hon. Gentleman, may I ask if he is aware that on the following day police constables were placed in a position to overhear what was going on between the accused persons?

* MR. MADDEN: The hon. Member will observe that that is not a question arising out of my answer.

MR. WOODALL: I ventured to ask the question, because the Government have invited attention to the matter. I hope they will supply the information.

MR. MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): Did Mr. Hamilton, the resident magistrate, express his disapproval of this method of Government identification?

* MR. MADDEN: I have no information on that point.

IRELAND—THE MURDER OF INSPECTOR MARTIN.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman, what number of houses have been forcibly entered by the constabulary in the district of Gweedore since the arrest of Father M'Fadden and the murder of District Inspector Martin on the 3rd February, and in how many cases was this done without warrant; what number of persons have been arrested in connection with these occurrences, how many of them have since been released, on whose direction was this done, how long had they been in confinement, and against how many of them had there been sworn information; and, how many persons have been placed on their trial for complicity in the murder of Martin, and against how many of these has any information been sworn?

* MR. MADDEN: I must ask for notice of this question.

MR. SEXTON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware of how many prisoners have been arrested?

* MR. MADDEN: I cannot state the exact number, but I will inquire.

MR. MAC NEILL: They filled a special train consisting of five carriages.

COLONEL FORBES, R.M.

MR. SEXTON asked the Solicitor General for Ireland whether Colonel Forbes, R.M. (Belfast) has received notice of his removal from Belfast; whether he is to be succeeded by a barrister; and whether this is with the view of carrying out one of the recommendations of the Belfast Riots Commission; and, if so, whether the other recommendations of the Commission will be adopted?

* MR. MADDEN: I believe Col. Forbes has either left or is about to leave Belfast. The gentleman who succeeds him is a barrister. This step was not taken with the view of carrying out one of the recommendations of the Belfast Riots Commission, though it is in accordance with the spirit of that recommendation.

MR. SEXTON: Was Colonel Forbes removed by his own desire or against his will.

MR. MADDEN: The hon. Member must give me notice of the question.

FORTIFICATION OF MILITARY PORTS.

VISCOUNT CURZON (Bucks, Wycombe) asked the Secretary of State for War whether he will give a Return showing the amount of money voted since 1885 for the defence, including fortifications and armament, of military ports, commercial ports, and coaling stations at home and abroad, the application of the money to the various localities, and the amount still required to be expended?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY FOR WAR (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): If my noble Friend will look at

FAIR RENTS.

Mr. LEA (Londonderry, S.) asked the Solicitor General for Ireland if applications for the fixing of fair rents in the union of Londonderry have been waiting since January, 1888; and when will a Sub-Commission sit in Londonderry to hear these cases?

*THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, University of Dublin): The Land Commissioners inform me that it has not yet been found possible, owing to the number of cases pending, to list any cases in the Union of Londonderry where the applications have been received since January, 1888. A Sub-Commission sat in that part of the Union which is situated in the County of Donegal last January, and for that part of the Union situated in the County of Londonderry last November. The Land Commissioners are not at present in a position to state when there will be another sitting in the Union.

BOYCOTTING A BANK.

Mr. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) asked the Solicitor General for Ireland, whether his attention has been called to the following paragraph in the Dublin Mail of the 9th inst:—

"It is stated that the Ballyshannon people are desirous of boycotting the Provincial Bank in that town for accepting, as treasurer, subscriptions to the Martin Memorial Fund. The manager has been warned that if the directors support him in this it will be at a considerable sacrifice."

If there is any truth in the statement; and, what steps the Government intend to take to protect the Bank thus threatened?

*Mr. MADDEN: I understand that Nationalists in Ballyshannon objected to a list of subscribers to the Martin Memorial Fund being exhibited in the bank, and that an article on the subject which appeared in the local Nationalist paper stated that it was a political matter, and that unless the placard were immediately withdrawn steps would be taken to prove that partizan displays are not remunerative to banking establishments. I am informed that the list was subsequently removed at the request of the gentleman who inaugurated the movement. The manager of the bank continues to act as treasurer, and no objection appears to be raised by any person to his so acting.

FATHER M'FADDEN.

Mr. JOHN ELLIS (Nottinghamshire, Rushcliffe) asked the Solicitor General for Ireland, whether, at the trial of Father M'Fadden and others at Letterkenney on Thursday, the 7th instant, the accused were passed to their places in Court before a number of constables who were placed in Court, one of them having a note-book in hand which he was using; whether, on the attention of the magistrates being drawn to this by the counsel for the accused, Mr. Hamilton, R.M., asked District Inspector Stevenson whether the constables so placed and acting were witnesses proposed to be examined by the Crown for the purpose of indentifying any of the accused, and that this was admitted to be so by District Inspector Stevenson; whether Mr. Hamilton thereupon ordered that the constables should be sent out of Court, whereupon about 30 of them left it; whether, some time subsequently, one of these men, Constable Boyle, was again in Court, and was again ordered by the magistrate to leave it, which he did; and, whether he will give such instructions to those in charge of the Constabulary as will prevent similar proceedings in future?

*Mr. MADDEN: The Constabulary authorities report that owing to the large number of prisoners who were being brought up before the magistrates on the occasion in question, four constables were placed for the purpose of noting the prisoners, with a view to prevent subsequent confusion as regards those who might be discharged by the Court and those retained in custody. On the application of counsel for the defence that all witnesses should be put out of Court being acceded to, these constables at once left with about 20 others who were also witnesses. Afterwards Constable Boyle having been sent for came back into Court, but upon counsel objecting to his presence he at once left, having been there for a few moments only.

IRELAND—POLICE PASSES.

Mr. JOHN ELLIS asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, whether a number of "passes" have been issued, in the following form, by a Sergeant of Constabulary in the Gweedore district: "Please let bearer—pass. Owen Mahoney, Sergeant R.I.C. Date—," in default of possession of one of which the people of the district are unable to pass along the roads or through the country at their pleasure; and, by whose authority this Police Sergeant is thus acting?

* MR. MADDEN: The Constabulary Authorities report that when the search for Mr. Martin's murderers was progressing Sergeant Mahoney gave passes as described to a few persons against whom he knew there was no suspicion, so that the inconvenience of stopping and examining them might be saved. It is, however, not the case that without these passes persons are unable to pass along the roads, or through the country, at their pleasure. MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Did Mr. Hamilton, the resident magistrate, express his disapproval of this method of Government identification?

IRELAND - THE MURDER OF INSPECTOR MARTIN.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: I beg to ask the right hon. MR. SEXTON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware of how many prisoners have been arrested?

* MR. MADDEN: I cannot state the exact number, but I will inquire.

MR. MAC NEILL: They filled a special train consisting of five carriages.

COLONEL FORBES, R.M.

MR. SEXTON asked the Solicitor General for Ireland whether Colonel Forbes, R.M. (Belfast) has received notice of his removal from Belfast; whether he is to be succeeded by a barrister; and whether this is with the view of carrying out one of the recommendations of the Belfast Riots Commission; and, if so, whether the other recommendations of the Commission will be adopted?

VISCOUNT CURZON (Bucks, Wycombe) asked the Secretary of State for War whether he will give a Return showing the amount of money voted since 1885 for the defence, including fortifications and armament, of military ports, commercial ports, and coaling stations at home and abroad, the application of the money to the various localities, and the amount still required to be expended?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY FOR WAR (Mr. Brodrick, Surrey, Guildford): If my noble Friend will look at the Memorandum attached to last year's Estimates, of which a copy shall be sent him, I think he will find all the information he requires. But, if not, perhaps he will tell me what further information he desires.

THE PRIME MINISTER OF CASHMERE.

MR. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.) asked the Under Secretary of State for India whether it was a fact that letters of Lachmandas, late Prime Minister of Cashmere, have been discovered, showing a course of treason on the part of the Maharajah towards the Indian Government; whether these letters, amongst other things, reveal a design set on foot by the Maharajah of Cashmere to poison the British Resident; and whether, if this information is accurate, he is in a position to inform the House what steps the Indian Government propose to take under the circumstances?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The Secretary of State is advised that the Government of India attach very little importance to the intercepted letters.

THE DISTURBANCES AT SULYMAH.

SIR ROBERT FOWLER (London) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Government had now received official information respecting the Coroner's inquest held at Free Town, Sierra Leone, on the 1st February last, on the body of the Chief Gbanna Gombo, and other Papers showing what action, if any, has been taken by the local authorities with a view to investigation of the charges against the police officer, whose treatment of the Chief is alleged to have conduced to his death; and, whether he would furnish the House with further information as to the grounds of the Chief's arrest; also with copies of the official report of the Coroner's inquest of the 1st February; of the Governor's report on the subject; and of the order which has been issued to the Sierra Leone police respecting the use of handcuffs and avoidance of undue harshness in the conveyance of prisoners?

BARON H. DE WORMS: In answer to my hon. Friend, I have to say that the Government have not received any further information beyond what I gave to the House on the 8th instant. The Secretary of State has, however, called for a full Report as to the circumstances alluded to, and the Papers will be included in the correspondence respecting the disturbances at Sulymah, which I intend to lay on the Table as soon as possible.

SIR R. FOWLER: When do the Government expect to receive the information?

BARON H. DE WORMS: I am unable to say precisely.

SHEERNESS DOCKYARD.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty what was the total estimated cost of the proposed dredging of the Medway, to allow of the largest men-of-war passing down the river at any high tide; and whether, when this work was completed, and Chatham Dockyard thus made more readily accessible, it will be practicable to close Sheerness Dockyard, thereby saving the establishment charges of the latter?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The estimated cost of dredging the Medway is £10,000. As the work carried on at Sheerness Dockyard is on the smaller classes of ships, the deepening of the Medway does not affect its present purpose. It is not considered desirable in Imperial interests to close Sheerness Dockyard.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham) asked whether arrangements could not be made in connection with Sheerness Dockyard at a less cost than the proposed dredging of the Medway would involve by merely obviating the necessity for the undertaking?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: The cost of dredging the Medway will, as I have stated, come to £10,000, but I am quite clear that no large dock accommodation at Sheerness could be obtained for that money.

ZULULAND—DINUZULU.

MR. WALTER M'LAREN (Cheshire) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies under what warrant, and issued by whom, is Dinuzulu now being detained in custody at Etshowe; and whether Dinuzulu was removed from Natal to Etshowe under a warrant, the validity of which is under appeal?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Dinuzulu was removed to the borders of Natal under a warrant which the Supreme Court of that Colony had held to be valid, but the validity of which is now under appeal. On Dinuzulu reaching the borders of Natal, he was handed over to the Zululand Police, who doubtless were armed with a proper warrant from the Zululand authorities to enable the police to receive him. He is no doubt detained in custody under a proper warrant from those authorities, but the Secretary of State is not aware by what magistrates or other persons these warrants were issued.

ZULULAND—ZIBEBU.

MR. WALTER M'LAREN asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Colonial Office will insist that the Zulu Chief Zibebu shall be put upon his trial for the murder of Umsutshwana; and, whether Mr. Richard Addison, who has been appointed a magistrate in Northern Zululand, and who is at present assisting in the prosecution of the Usutu Chiefs at Etshowe, formerly acted as one of Zibebu's lieutenants or "whitemen" during the conflicts between that chief and Cetshawayo's people?

BARON H. DE WORMS: It is proposed to proceed against Usibebu in respect of the transaction in question; but the proceedings have been delayed by reason of Usibebu having met with a serious accident, and by the fact that he is now attending as a witness before the Special Commission at Etshowe. I am assured that Mr. Richard Addison has at no time been with Usibebu.

IRISH EXTRA POLICE.

MR. LANE (Cork County, E.) asked the Solicitor General for Ireland for what purpose a large body of extra police were marched into the town of Youghal on Friday the 8th instant; whether a similar force of extra police was sent there on the 8th March 1888; whether, when a similar force of extra police was marched into the town on the 8th March 1887, a riot took place, in which a civilian was killed by the police; and, whether in future steps would be taken to prevent, or assistance tion of the people?

MR. MADDEN: The Col<sup>l</sup> authorities report that an extra<sup>E</sup> police was drafted into Youghal<sup>right</sup> 1888, and again in 1889, with a view<sup>he</sup> to preventing a demonstration which there was reason to believe it was contemplated holding to commemorate the anniversary of the death of a civilian during the riot referred to in the third paragraph of the question. The authorities were of opinion that the holding of such a demonstration might lead to serious public disturbance, and possibly loss of life.

MR. LANE: Upon what grounds did the authorities anticipate such a demonstration when there had been no placard or advertisement issued in connection with it? As far as I am informed there never was any intention of holding a demonstration.

*MR. MADDEN: The authorities acted upon the information before them. It is not customary, in drafting police into a town where a disturbance is apprehended, to notify the fact by advertisements or placards.

MR. SEXTON: Did the authorities act on sworn information? If so, will the hon. Gentleman let me have a copy of it?

*MR. MADDEN: The right hon. Member must give notice of that question.

THE MERTHYR TYDVIL POLICE.

MR. THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, if it is true that Captain Lionel Lindsay, son of the present Chief Constable for Glamorgan-shire, has been appointed Superintendent of the Police at Merthyr Tydvil; whether the invariable practice hitherto has been to appoint the Superintendent of Police at Merthyr by promotion and seniority; and, whether he is aware that the report of the appointment of Captain Lindsay, a man of twenty-eight years of age, and having no connection with the police force of the county, over the heads of those who have spent their lives in the force has given rise to great dissatisfaction in the district?

*MR. STUART WORTLEY: Captain Lindsay has been appointed as a third class Superintendent. The Chief Constable states that hitherto he has been

ROYAL MILITARY ACADEMY AT WOOLWICH.

SIR HENRY ROSCOE (Manchester, S.) asked the Secretary of State for War whether the revised Code for the examination of candidates for entrance to the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich has yet been adopted; and, if not, whether he can give any information as to the cause of the delay, and as to the date at which such revised Code will be made known and come into force?

*MR. BRODRICK: These Regulations are now completed, and will be issued immediately.

WIRE GUNS—THE LONGRIDGE SYSTEM.

CAPTAIN SELWYN (Cambridge, Wisbech) asked the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that General Maitland, Director of Ordnance Factories, stated on the 6th of October, 1888, at the annual dinner of the Royal Arsenal Foremen's Association—

"That a wire gun had been made by them on Mr. Longridge's plan which had beaten everything before it, having attained the extraordinary range of twelve and a-half miles."

Whether wire guns are made by Russia, France, and Germany on Mr. Longridge's plan, with great economy of time and money; whether he is aware that such wire guns are much stronger and more durable than the type of hooped gun now in use; whether such guns can be made in much shorter time (say one-third), and at much less cost (say one-eighth), than those in use at present; whether he is aware that Krupp, of Essen, have made several wire guns which have given brilliant results; but that they are not brought forward so long as orders are forthcoming for guns on the old system, in order that the enormous plant, which would be of no use for wire guns, may continue to be utilized; whether the same consideration influences the War Office; and, whether any, and, if so, what further trials or investigations of the Longridge system of making wire guns are in progress or contemplation?

*MR. BRODRICK: I am informed that the report of General Maitland's statement is not quite accurate. He said that a gun made in the Arsenal on a design of his own, but embodying Mr. Longridge's principle of using wire as an auxiliary to give strength, had produced the results described. I believe a gun has been made in Russia on some modification of Mr. Longridge's plans; and a few years ago some were made in France, but failed. I know of no others. Weight for weight the wire guns are stronger; but they are not more durable than hooped guns, as the bores wear out equally in either case. At present it is uncertain whether there is any gain either in time or cost from the use of wire; but it is hoped that some little saving may result. It will not, however, as regards either time or money, be in anything like the proportion suggested in the question. I am not aware that Mr. Krupp has made any wire guns, and certainly no consideration for existing plant would prevent the War Office from adopting them if otherwise found desirable. Several wire guns are being made for trial.

MR. HANBURY: May I ask whether any gun on Mr. Longridge's own plan has been tried?

*MR. BRODRICK: Yes, Sir; one was tested and burst on the first round.

CAPTAIN SELWYN: Was not that due to a flaw in the material, and not to any defect in the design?

*MR. BRODRICK: The information I have does not bear out the suggestion of the hon. and gallant Member, but if he had seen the gun after it had burst, I do not think he would have wished any further experiments made in that direction.

RAILWAY RATES.

MR. GRAY (Essex) asked the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that many railway companies have recently very considerably increased their rates and are now actually charging these increased rates; and, whether there are any means by which traders may be protected from the injury thus inflicted upon them?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH said: In consequence of the statements which have been publicly made in many parts of the country on this question, I communicated with the Chairman of the Railway Companies Association, who informs me that the railway companies made considerable alterations in rates at the end of last year in view of the operation of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act; that these alterations were generally in the direction of cancelling obsolete through rates, and also rates which appeared open to objection on the ground of undue preference; that the cancelling of these special rates had the effect of raising the charges made for carriage, as the ordinary rates would then apply instead of the special rates; that since the 1st of January the railway companies have made no advances in their rates, and have no intention of doing so without complying with the provisions of the Act; and that if, by inadvertence, any rates have been charged in any district above those in force on the 1st January, the railway companies ask that the person so charged will communicate with the General Manager of the company making the increased charge, when the matter shall be put right.

AUSTRALIAN POSTAL RATES.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy): I beg to ask the Postmaster General how the penny charge for newspapers to Australia is distributed—that is, how much to the British Post Office for transit in Britain and sea passage to Australia; how much to the Continental countries for transit to Brindisi, and how much to the Australian Colonies for transit and delivery there; whether the postage from this country to India, both countries being in the Postal Union, is not dependent on the doctrine that Postal Union rates are not obligatory on services between one part of the British dominions and another; if so, why Australia is treated more favourably than India; and whether, now that he has arranged for a cheaper postage to Australia wholly by sea, he will arrange for a similar service to India?

*MR. RAIKES: Out of the penny charged on a newspaper for Australia the Post Office pays a halfpenny for transit through France and Italy, and about 1-12th of a penny to each intermediate Colony for such newspapers as have to be conveyed from Adelaide through one Colony or more to the Colony of destination. For mere delivery nothing is credited to the Colonies. I am not sure that I rightly apprehend the hon. Member's second question; but I may say that no such doctrine as he mentions has been admitted in fixing the rates of postage to British Colonies belonging to the Postal Union. As at present advised, and in view of the large sacrifice of revenue even at the present rates, I am not prepared to recommend a cheaper postage rate to India by the long sea route.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I beg to give Notice that I shall take the earliest opportunity of drawing attention to the unfairness of treating Australia so much more favourably than India.

PARLIAMENTARY GOVERNMENT FOR WESTERN AUSTRALIA.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies what are the objects of the Bill which has passed a Second Reading in Western Australia; whether it was introduced and promoted by the representatives of the British Government in that Crown Colony; and whether the Secretary of State proposes to ask the assent of the Legislative Council of Western Australia to a Bill for giving responsible government to the Colony, and transferring to the Colony the control of the lands of the temperate zone, before he consults the British Parliament in the matter?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The objects of the Bill, which has passed a Second Reading in Australia, are to provide the Colony with Parliamentary or "responsible" government in place of its present Constitution, which is not that of a Crown Colony, inasmuch as two-thirds of its Legislative Council are elected Members entirely independent of the Government. In accordance with the precedents in other Colonies, the Bill was introduced by the Colonial Secretary, and supported by the officers of the Government in the Legislative Council. The ordinary and constitutional course has been followed by legislation in the Colony in the first instance, and reserving to the Imperial Parliament the power of amending or rejecting the Colonial legislation.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I beg to give notice that in consequence of the answer just given, I shall propose in the Vote on Account to strike out that portion of the Vote which provides for the salary of the Colonial Secretary.

COUNTY COUNCIL ELECTION REGISTERS.

MR. HOBHOUSE (Somerset. E.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that, in the precepts just issued by the Local Government Board to the Clerks of the Peace, the 20th October is fixed as the date on which the registers, both of County Electors and of Parliamentary Voters, are to be ready; that this only allows seven days from the 13th day of October, the date fixed by law for the completion of the revision of the Lists; that in these seven days the Clerks of the Peace will have to prepare for the Press, and get printed, corrected, indexed, and bound, sets of registers containing in many counties 100,000 names and upwards; and whether, in view of the great additional pressure, expense, and risk of errors that will be caused by such an arrangement, he will consider the advisability of further postponing the time for the publication of the registers?

*MR. RITCHIE: The period within which the revision of the Lists of Voters is to take place, and the date on which the Registers of County Electors and Parliamentary Voters are to be completed, are prescribed by sections 6 and 7 of the County Electors Act of last year. As the Order in Council to which reference is made merely refers to the dates prescribed by Statute, no alteration of the dates could be made without an alteration of the law. As the County Council Elections will be held on the same day as the Municipal Elections — namely, the 1st of November — no longer time can be given except by altering the preliminary stages of registration, and I am advised that to alter the dates of those stages of registration, which under the existing system are conducted by overseers, would lead to great confusion and inaccuracy. I must, at the same time, point out that the revision of the Lists by the Revising Barristers is to commence as soon as possible after the 7th of September, and that the Clerks of the Peace are furnished with the Revised Lists as the revision proceeds, and that consequently the interval between the last day within which the revision must take place and the date of the completion of the Registers does not represent the period allowed for the printing of the Register. I may add that I hope to be able to arrange that the revision shall be promptly proceeded with by the Revising Barristers, so as to secure the completion of the revision at an earlier date than the latest period permitted by the Act.

IRELAND—THE PORTUMNA EVICTIONS.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether any communication has been made on the part of the Irish Executive to the Most Rev. Dr. Healy, Coadjutor Bishop of Clonfert, or to Mr. Tener, Lord Clanricarde's agent, to the effect that the forces of the Crown will not be supplied for the purpose of certain evictions in the Portumna district, because the Government are not satisfied that the decrees obtained by the landlords are legal; whether the agent suggested that the constables guarding the emergency men in the several huts should accompany them to the proposed evictions; whether this suggestion was rejected; why evictions are facilitated by the Government in the Woodford district of Lord Clanricarde's estates, and are hindered in the Portumna district of that estate; what are the "particular circumstances" which led to the refusal to lend the forces of the Crown for evictions in the Portumna district; whether the correspondence between the Irish Executive, Lord Clanricarde, and Mr. Tener will be communicated to the House; and whether, as the Coadjutor Bishop has no objection to the publication of the correspondence between himself and the right hon. Gentleman, and as the right hon. Gentleman has drawn from the correspondence an inference affecting the Bishop which the Bishop does not accept, a copy of that correspondence will be laid upon the Table?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: With regard to the first and sixth paragraphs of the question, there is no official correspondence of the kind, as the hon. Gentleman seems to suppose. The Divisional Commissioner reports that he told Mr. Tener, in reference to his application for protection in carrying out certain warrants both in Woodford and Portumna, that, as there was a doubt about the validity of the orders on which the warrant was granted, it was not advisable to afford protection in the execution of them. The agent did make the suggestion contained in the second paragraph, but the Divisional Commissioner refused to accede to it. There is no ground for supposing that a distinction has been drawn in the action of the Government between Woodford and Portumna. The "particular circumstances" referred to in the fifth paragraph related partly to the extreme difficulty of assembling the necessary protection previous to the expiration of the decrees, partly to the doubt about the legality of the decrees. I do not know upon what grounds the hon. Gentleman expresses the opinions attributed in the last paragraph to Dr. Healy?

MR. SEXTON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that statements have appeared in the public Press to the effect that the Bishop has no objection to the publication of the correspondence between himself and the right hon. Gentleman; and is the objection on the part of the right hon. Gentleman to the publication of the letters due to his unwillingness to disclose his share in the correspondence?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The statement to which the hon. Gentleman refers is one that I think came out in a leading article in the Freeman's Journal. I do not think it requires any answering.

THE PRISONER TRACY.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to the statement that the prisoner Tracy, when in Castlebar Gaol, was denounced as an informer in the local Roman Catholic church, whether he is aware that there is but one Catholic church in the town of Castlebar, and that the parish priest, the Rev. Patrick Lyons, who is also chaplain to the prison, has declared the statement in question to be wholly untrue, and has challenged proof of it; whether, in consequence of the course pursued by him in regard to the public statement of Father Lyons, the reverend gentleman has indicated his intention of resigning the chaplaincy of Castlebar Prison; and whether, in view of subsequent information, he is now prepared to make any further statement on the subject?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My statement was that it was publicly announced in a local Roman Catholic chapel that the prisoner Tracy had turned informer. The chapel alluded to was Cappaduff, which is one of the localities in which there is evidence of the man having been actively engaged in the commission of crime.

RODDY'S HOTEL AND DERRY PRISON.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to the statement that Father Stephens, a prisoner in Derry Gaol, has been prevented from obtaining his food from Roddy's Hotel, on the ground that the hotel people had entered into collusion to defeat the prison rules, whether it is true, as stated by Mr. William Roddy in the press, that the hotel messengers never saw any prisoner, and never went further than the outer hall of the prison where the food was delivered to a warder to be taken by him to the prisoner; and, if this be so, what is the explanation of the charge of collusion; and whether the order of exclusive dealing against this hotel will be further enforced?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Prisons Board inform me that they have no knowledge of what Mr. Roddy's statement in the Press is, but the Visiting Committee, after careful inquiry into surreptitious communications between Father M'Fadden and the managers of Roddy's Hotel, were fully satisfied that collusion existed of a sufficiently serious nature to oblige them to direct that the provisions for prisoners should not in future be received through that establishment. It is a matter of prison discipline that messengers from the establishment which provides prisoners with food are not admitted to the prisoners, but hand the supplies to a prison officer, whose duty it is to bring them to the prisoners. The Prisons Board have no intention whatever under the circumstances of allowing the proprietors of Roddy's Hotel to supply any of the prisoners in Londonderry Prison with food, having regard to the order of the Visiting Committee in this matter.

MR. SEXTON: May I ask if the prison authorities have stated or indicated the grounds upon which they came to the conclusion referred to? Does the right hon. Gentleman not think that the owner of this hotel has been sufficiently punished already by being boycotted by all the Unionists in the district?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand the decision has been arrived at by the Visiting Committee.

MR. SWIFT MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask whether, in order to avoid all possibility of collusion, Father Stephens was in charge of and constantly attended by one warder, who was responsible for everything that occurred?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR did not answer.

MR. SWIFT MAC NEILL: I press for an answer.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I do not think the hon. Member is referring to the question which was asked from the notice paper.

MR. SWIFT MAC NEILL: Yes, Sir, with all respect, my question does relate to that which has been already asked; I ask it in order to show that there was no possibility of collusion.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must ask for notice of the Question.

DUMBLANE CATHEDRAL.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College Division): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works, whether it is true, as stated in the Glasgow Evening News, that the Board of Works has sanctioned a scheme for the restoration of Dumblane Cathedral, that "the Cathedral has been, or is to be, conveyed from the Board of Works to the Board of Manufactures" in Edinburgh, and that the Board has been entrusted with the selection of plans, and is to undertake, after the restoration, to maintain the fabric in all time coming, in consideration of a cash payment of £3,000; if the statement be true, under what Act do the Commissioners of Works propose to hand over the control of an important National Monument to the Board of Manufactures; whether, considering that the interior of the ruined Cathedral has been used as a burial ground for more than a century, he has made any arrangement for safeguarding the burial rights of families interested in connection with the proposed restoration; and whether an opportunity will be given the House of discussing the proposed transfer of this national monument to the Board of Manufactures, a body which many consider not at all a proper body to be entrusted with this work?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): The transaction is completed. It was completed because the matter had been gone into very fully, and I have received a very influential deputation, representing as far as I could ascertain all political parties and the peoples of the different religious persuasions. While it may seem a strange body to be entrusted with such work, I believe the Board of Manufactures is really as good a body for the purpose as can be found.

DR. CAMERON: I beg to give notice that, as there is no other way of raising the question, I will do so by moving a reduction of the right hon. Gentleman's salary.

THE PONSONBY ESTATE.

MR. LANE (Cork County, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, as the purchase of the Ponsonby estate by a London syndicate is now acknowledged by them, he will cause the local authorities in Cork to inquire into the alleged intention to evict 300 tenants on the estate, and to report to him upon the probable effect such evictions will have upon the peace and good order of a wide district?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not aware that there are any circumstances connected with the Ponsonby estate which require special inquiry on the part of the Government. I am aware that the Plan of Campaign has been in operation for two years upon the property, and it requires no profound knowledge of Ireland to be aware that under such circumstances evictions often become necessary, and that the peace and good order of the district may be seriously disturbed.

MR. LANE: Does the right hon. Gentleman think that the unjust eviction of 300 families, and the peace of the whole of the South of Ireland, ought to be a matter of perfect indifference to the Irish Government?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: An unjust eviction must always be a matter of regret to everybody; but I have no ground for believing that any unjust eviction is about to take place.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): Has the right hon. Gentleman seen a letter in the Freeman's Journal, in which Mr. Townsend, the agent of the syndicate who have bought the Ponsonby estate, declares that it is the intention of the syndicate to evict all tenants who do not purchase or otherwise settle on the terms proposed by the syndicate?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not seen that.

MR. LANE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, while negotiations were being carried on to arrange a scheme of purchase under Lord Ashbourne's Act between Mr. Ponsonby and his tenants, the hon. Member for South Huntingdonshire (Mr. Smith-Barry) publicly declared that "Mr. Ponsonby would not settle with his tenants"; whether Mr. Brunker, acting for Mr. Ponsonby, telegraphed to Canon Keller two days subsequently that "Mr. Smith-Barry's statement was utterly unauthorized;" and whether Mr. Brunker wrote on the following day that he regretted he could no longer continue the negotiations which he had hoped he could have satisfactorily concluded?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no special knowledge of the matters referred to in the question. But from what I know of my hon. Friend the Member for South Huntingdonshire I feel perfectly certain he would never give the advice to any Irish landlord not to settle with his tenants upon reasonable terms.

MR. LANE: That is not an answer to my question. The question I have on the Paper is whether the hon. Member for South Huntingdonshire, in the midst of a settlement between this landlord and his tenants, declared publicly that Mr. Ponsonby would never settle with his tenants; and, whether, in a few days afterwards, it was ascertained that the hon. Member for South Huntingdonshire and some friends had combined and conspired to prevent Mr. Ponsonby settling with his tenants?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I told the hon. Member I had no special knowledge of the circumstances; but I took care to guard against the inference he appears to draw, that my hon. Friend would ever recommend any Irish landlord not to settle with his tenants.

MR. LANE: As this is a matter of great importance to the whole of the South of Ireland, may I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will cause some authority, say in Cork or in Dublin, to inquire into the circumstances under which this syndicate intervened between landlord and tenants, and bought the property over the heads of the tenants just as they were about to purchase from the landlord?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have already stated that, as far as I understand the transaction, the position of the tenants is in no wise altered; they will now be in the same position relatively as before.

MR. LANE: I am sorry to press the matter, but it is so vitally important that I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman if he does not think the position of the tenants very much altered when, instead of being on the point of settling with their landlord—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order. That is clearly a matter of opinion, which cannot form the subject of a question.

MR. LANE: I beg to give notice that I will ask the question to-morrow.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, before he gave such a character to the hon. Member for South Huntingdonshire, he was aware that the hon. Gentleman was Chairman of a Committee, the principle of whose operations was to prevent settlements between landlords and their tenants.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no ground for thinking that at all. I believe my hon. Friend is connected with a Committee, the object of which is to prevent the Plan of Campaign succeeding. I do not think the hon. Gentleman has given an accurate description of the Committee.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): Is it not a fact that in the City of Cork the hon. Member for South Huntingdonshire made use of the language ascribed to him?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am a very inadequate reader of the newspapers, and have not seen the report.

THE SPECIAL COMMISSION.

MR. COX (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the solicitor for the defence of the Irish Members before the Special Commission has made an application to the Irish Office for information as to the whereabouts of the informer Cullinane, for the purpose of having him served with a subpoena to appear before the Special Commission; and what reply has been sent?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am given to understand that the letter from Messrs. Lewis on the subject referred to in the question was received at the Irish Office in Queen Street, and has been forwarded to Dublin, where it will no doubt be dealt with without unnecessary delay.

MR. COX: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, having regard to his statement that the Government would allow facilities to both the parties before the Special Commission, whether it is true that the police at Quin and Clooney, county Clare, tore down placards announcing a public collection in aid of the fund for the defence of the Irish Members before the Commission; and, if so, by what authority?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary authorities report that it appears that four copies of the placard in question were taken down. The collection was announced as being made under the auspices of a suppressed branch of the League.

MR. COX: May I ask whether the placards had not been issued by the central branch in Dublin, which is not suppressed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot answer that question, but the placard was torn down as being an attempt to revive the League in that district.

MR. SEXTON: Is this attempt to prevent the defendants from raising funds for their defence to be taken as an instance of equal facilities to both parties.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No attempt has been made, or can, or will be made to prevent the raising of such funds.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will lay upon the Table a copy of the written applications of the solicitors of the prisoner Tracy for leave to visit him in Belfast Gaol?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Prison Board inform me that it would be inexpedient to establish a precedent of the kind suggested in the question. They add that the grounds on which the solicitors made their request to see the prisoner were chiefly owing to alleged injustice of sentence. This is a matter upon which every prisoner has a right to memorialize the Lord Lieutenant at any time, and this course was pointed out to the solicitors as the proper one. The Board saw no reason to relax their rules in this case, as they had strong reason for believing that the alleged purpose of the interview was not bona fide.

MR. SEXTON: Does the right hon. Gentleman not consider it would be advisable for every prisoner wishing to memorialize the Lord Lieutenant to have the assistance of a solicitor?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR did not reply.

THE ROYAL MILITARY ACADEMY.

MR. WOODALL (Hanley): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether it is a fact that under the Regulations of the Royal Military Academy and Royal Military College the contribution payable for a cadet whose father is serving in the Army or Navy varies from £80 for the son of a General or Admiral to £40 for the son of a junior commissioned officer, but that a warrant officer whose son gains admission into Woolwich or Sandhurst is required to pay £150 a year, the sum required for the son of a private gentleman; and, if this be true, whether he will reconsider the decision which thus excludes non-commissioned officers from the privileges allowed to commissioned members of both Services, of paying proportionately graduated contributions for their sons who may be cadets?

MR. BRODRICK: Provision has not been made in the Regulations for the admission of the sons of warrant and non-commissioned officers to the Royal Military Academy or Royal Military College at a reduced rate, because it has been considered that the great expense of the preliminary education would deter such candidates from presenting themselves. Should, however, such a case occur in practice, my right hon. Friend would be quite ready to consider the advisability of amending the warrant.

DOVER CONVICT PRISON.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary

warrant was granted, it was not advisable to afford protection in the execution of them. The agent did make the suggestion contained in the second paragraph, but the Divisional Commissioner refused to accede to it. There is no ground for supposing that a distinction has been drawn in the action of the Government between Woodford and Portumna. The "particular circumstances" referred to in the fifth paragraph related partly to the extreme difficulty of assembling the necessary protection previous to the expiration of the decrees, partly to the doubt about the legality of the decrees. I do not know upon what grounds the hon. Gentleman expresses the opinions attributed in the last paragraph to Dr. Healy?

MR. SEXTON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that statements have appeared in the public Press to the effect that the Bishop has no objection to the publication of the correspondence between himself and the right hon. Gentleman; and is the objection on the part of the right hon. Gentleman to the publication of the letters due to his unwillingness to disclose his share in the correspondence?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The statement to which the hon. Gentleman refers is one that I think came out in a leading article in the Freeman's Journal. I do not think it requires any answering.

THE PRISONER TRACY.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to the statement that the prisoner Tracy, when in Castlebar Gaol, was denounced as an informer in the local Roman Catholic church, whether he is aware that there is but one Catholic church in the town of Castlebar, and that the parish priest, the Rev. MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My statement was that it was publicly announced in a local Roman Catholic chapel that the prisoner Tracy had turned informer. The chapel alluded to was Cappaduff, which is one of the localities in which there is evidence of the man having been actively engaged in the commission of crime.

RODDY'S HOTEL AND DERRY PRISON.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand the decision has been arrived at by the Visiting Committee.

MR. SWIFT MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask whether, in order to avoid all possibility of collusion, Father Stephens was in charge of and constantly attended by one warder, who was responsible for everything that occurred?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR did not answer.

MR. SWIFT MAC NEILL: I press for an answer.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I do not think the hon. Member is referring to the question which was asked from the notice paper.

MR. SWIFT MAC NEILL: Yes, Sir, with all respect, my question does relate to that which has been already asked; I ask it in order to show that there was no possibility of collusion.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must ask for notice of the Question.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: An unjust eviction must always be a matter of regret to everybody; but I have no ground for believing that any unjust eviction is about to take place.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): Has the right hon. Gentleman seen a letter in the Freeman's Journal, in which Mr. Townsend, the agent of the syndicate who have bought the Ponsonby estate, declares that it is the intention of the syndicate to evict all tenants who do not purchase or otherwise settle on the terms proposed by the syndicate?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not seen that.

MR. LANE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, while negotiations were being carried on to arrange a scheme of purchase under Lord Ashbourne's Act between Mr. Ponsonby and his tenants, the hon. Member for South Huntingdonshire (Mr. Smith-Barry) publicly declared that "Mr. Ponsonby would not settle with his tenants"; whether Mr. Brunker, acting for Mr. Ponsonby, telegraphed to Canon Keller two days subsequently that "Mr. Smith-Barry's statement was utterly unauthorized;" and whether Mr. Brunker wrote on the following day that he regretted he could no longer continue the negotiations which he had hoped he could have satisfactorily concluded?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no special knowledge of the matters referred to in the question. But from what I know of my hon. Friend the Member for South Huntingdonshire I feel perfectly certain he would never give the advice to any Irish landlord not to settle with his tenants upon reasonable terms.

MR. LANE: That is not an answer to my question. The question I have on the Paper is whether the hon. Member for South Huntingdonshire, in the midst of a settlement between this landlord and his tenants, declared publicly that Mr. Ponsonby would never settle with his tenants; and, whether, in a few days afterwards, it was ascertained that the hon. Member for South Huntingdonshire and some friends had combined and conspired to prevent Mr. Ponsonby settling with his tenants?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I told the hon. Member I had no special knowledge of the circumstances; but I took care to guard against the inference he appears to draw, that my hon. Friend would ever recommend any Irish landlord not to settle with his tenants.

MR. LANE: As this is a matter of great importance to the whole of the South of Ireland, may I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will cause some authority, say in Cork or in Dublin, to inquire into the circumstances under which this syndicate intervened between landlord and tenants, and bought the property over the heads of the tenants just as they were about to purchase from the landlord?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have already stated that, as far as I understand the transaction, the position of the tenants is in no wise altered; they will now be in the same position relatively as before.

MR. LANE: I am sorry to press the matter, but it is so vitally important that I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman if he does not think the position of the tenants very much altered when, instead of being on the point of settling with their landlord—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order. That is clearly a matter of opinion, which cannot form the subject of a question.

MR. LANE: I beg to give notice that I will ask the question to-morrow.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, before he gave such a character to the hon. Member for South Huntingdonshire, he was aware that the hon. Gentleman was Chairman of a Committee, the principle of whose operations was to prevent settlements between landlords and their tenants.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no ground for thinking that at all. I believe my hon. Friend is connected with a Committee, the object of which is to prevent the Plan of Campaign succeeding. I do not think the hon. Gentleman has given an accurate description of the Committee.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): Is it not a fact that in the City of Cork the hon. Member for South Huntingdonshire made use of the language ascribed to him?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am a very inadequate reader of the newspapers, and have not seen the report.

THE SPECIAL COMMISSION.

MR. COX (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the solicitor for the defence of the Irish Members it is true that prisoners in Ireland are "classed" for exercise, and that first offenders are not required to exercise with those who have been convicted more than once; and whether this rule is put in force in regard to prisoners under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The General Prisons Board report that the instructions to Governors of Irish Prisons are as stated in the question, and, unless on medical grounds, no exception is recognized in regard to convicted criminal prisoners.

GRANTS IN AID TO PROVINCIAL COLLEGES.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he is now prepared to state the names of the gentlemen who are to serve on the Committee to consider the distribution of the grants in aid to provincial Colleges; and if he can state the aggregate amount of the proposed grants?

*MR. GOSCHEN: The Committee will consist of the hon. Baronet the Member for the University of London, the hon. Member for South Manchester, the hon. Member for the Prestwich Division of Lancashire, Dr. Percival, head master of Rugby, and the Rev. G. F. Browne (hon. Fellow of St. Catherine's College, Cambridge). The Vote, which will appear in the Estimates of this year, for "University Colleges in Great Britain," amounts to £15,000.

THE METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green S.W.): I beg to ask the hon. Member for the Knutsford Division of Cheshire, as representing the Metropolitan Board of Works, whether the Board will postpone the consideration of any further grants of pensions to officers of the Board, and leave the question to be decided by the London County Council?

MR. TATTON EGERTON was not present, and

MR. PICKERSGILL said: As the representative of the Metropolitan Board is not here, may I ask the President of the Local Government Board whether Her Majesty's Government will not attempt, by means of legislation, to prevent this Board in its last hours of existence granting exorbitant pensions to a number of its officers?

*MR. RITCHIE: The hon. Member can scarcely be serious in inviting the Government to attempt to legislate in regard to matters which must occur, if at all, between now and the 31st of the month.

THE CONVEYANCE OF THE AUSTRALIAN MAILS.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Postmaster General what is the cause of the delay in submitting to the House the contract for the conveyance of the Australian mails; and, at what date were the terms of the contract arranged?

*MR. RAIKES: The terms of the Australian Mail Contracts were arranged in 1887. The Governments of New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia have formally confirmed them, but a question is still pending respecting the time tables framed under these Contracts, and I have found it necessary to take the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown before I can submit the contracts for the approval of the House.

LAKE NYASSA.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is true that a Portuguese Military Expedition under Lieutenant Cardoso has reached Lake Nyassa, and has occupied the territory near Maponda, on the borders of that lake; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will inform the Portuguese Government that they refuse to recognize any assertion of territorial sovereignty by Portugal in the Nyassa region, and demand the withdrawal of the expedition?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): We have received no fresh information regarding the expedition since, in the debate on the Address, I stated the views of Her Majesty's Government on the subject. We have no positive information that it has reached Lake Nyassa, but there is little doubt that it has. Her Majesty's Government are watching with some anxiety the progress of an armed expedition into the neighbourhood of British settlements, and they have warned the Portuguese Government of the existence of British interests on the lake which they cannot suffer to be disturbed or imperilled, but the object of the expedition has been stated by the Portuguese Government to be peaceful, and as it has not as yet touched any territory under British sovereignty or protectorate we have no right to demand its withdrawal.

RICHMOND BARRACKS.

CAPTAIN SELWYN (Cambridge, Wisbeach): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is a fact, as stated in Dr. Barr's letter to the Times of 9th March, that "There was a great deal of sickness in the Richmond Prison. The General Prisons Board of Ireland, to whom the health of the prisoners is a matter of the deepest concern, have recently closed this prison ;"

and whether a detachment of the Queen's Regiment, now quartered in the Royal Barracks, Dublin, is being moved this week into the same unhealthy building?

*MR. BRODRICK: I cannot answer for the sanitary condition of the Richmond Prison while under the Prisons Board; but since it has been occupied by troops the military authorities in Ireland report that they have been very healthy. The detachment now in Wellington Barracks (the building referred to) is to be moved to-day to Linen Hall Barracks to make room for a detachment of the West Surrey Regiment from the Royal Barracks, who had to be moved while certain demolitions are taking place there, which are regarded as of essential importance to the general sanitary condition of the Royal Barracks.

MR. SWIFT MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Was any alteration made in the sanitary condition of Richmond Barracks at the time of its conversion from a prison into barracks?

*MR. BRODRICK: No structural alterations have been made, but some are in contemplation.

MR. MAC NEILL: In fact, troops are to be sent to a place which was discontinued as a prison because of the bad drainage?

ARABI PASHA.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is true that Arabi Pasha, who is detained at Colombo, has complained that the climate there is injuring his health; and, whether the Government will consider the advisability of removing Arabi to a more suitable country, or of letting him go home to Egypt?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: We have not received any complaint from Arabi Pasha that the climate is injuring his health. Her Majesty's Government cannot undertake to press the Government of Egypt to allow him to return there, as they believe that his presence in Egypt would be inconsistent with the public interests.

MR. W. REDMOND: Might I ask whether the Government intended that this unfortunate gentleman should be in exile for the whole of his life?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I am not in a position to give an answer to that question.

MR. W. REDMOND: Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether there is not a feeling widely prevalent in Egypt that it would tend greatly to the restoration of good order and good government in that country if Arabi were allowed to return?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

THE FRENCH PROTESTANT CHURCH.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask Mr. Attorney General what steps have been taken pending the approval of a new scheme by the Court of Chancery to ensure the safe custody of the library of the French Protestant Church, and whether it has been removed to Guildhall; and whether, in view of the death of the Pasteur Daugars, and the doubts which have arisen as to the legal constitution of the present Consistorie, any steps will be taken to prevent the election of another pasteur until the legal powers of the Consistorie have been ascertained?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. E. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): Pending the approval of a new scheme by the Chancery Division, the books referred to by the hon. Member have been kept in the same room in the neighbourhood of Tottenham Court Road, near the place in which the services are temporarily conducted, and they are, I believe, in safe custody. Careful inquiries are from time to time made. Under my direction an application was made some months ago to the Chancery Division to determine whether a legal consistory now exists. That case already stands for argument. In consequence of the death of M. Daugars I have directed an application to be made to expedite the hearing of the case. The acting consistory have only appointed a pastor temporarily. From communications received I believe that they will not proceed to fill the office permanently until the question has been determined whether they are a legally constituted consistory or not.

JOINT STOCK COMPANIES.

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when the Returns relating to Joint Stock Companies, for which an Address was agreed to on 18th June 1858, and which were promised by him on the 11th December, will be laid upon the Table of the House?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I regret that delay has taken place in the issue of these Returns, but I am assured that they will be circulated on Wednesday next.

THE AUSTRALIAN SQUADRON.

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is true that the Colony of Queensland has refused to contribute its share towards the cost of building the cruisers for the Australian Squadron; whether this refusal of one of the Australian Colonies to be a party to the agreement relieves the other Colonies from their obligations; whether these other Colonies have agreed to contribute in spite of the refusal of Queensland; and whether the share of the contribution of Queensland will fall upon the Imperial Government?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The Colony of Queensland has not yet passed the necessary Act for securing its contribution towards the cost of the building of the cruisers for the Australian Squadron, but it is confidently anticipated that before the first payment becomes due she will have joined the other Colonies. As to the second and third paragraphs of the right hon. Gentleman's Question, all the Colonies with the exception of Queensland have already bound themselves to carry out the agreement by passing the necessary Acts, and I may add that the greater number of them have specially urged Her Majesty's Government to proceed with the construction of the ships, notwithstanding the fact that Queensland has not yet signified her adherence. As regards the last paragraph of the question, as already stated, it is not anticipated that this question will arise. It would, therefore, be premature to express any opinion on the subject at present.

IRELAND—TREATMENT OF PRISONERS UNDER THE CRIMINAL LAW PROCEDURE ACT—TREATMENT OF MR. O'BRIEN.

Mr. CRAIG (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government will consent to the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the prison treatment of persons committed under "The Criminal Law Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1837"?

*Mr. W. H. SMITH: No, Sir. The Government, while seeing no grounds for any investigation of the kind, would have no objection to it so far as they are personally concerned; but they do not think a Committee of the House of Commons consisting of political partisans would be a satisfactory tribunal for determining a question with regard to which there has been and is much envenomed controversy.

Mr. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he has any objection to allowing us any means of finally determining questions as to matters of fact with regard to the prison treatment of Mr. W. O'Brien, as the Chief Secretary for Ireland has questioned the accuracy of the statements which I made in the House yesterday, and the accuracy of which I am prepared to prove?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I should like to know what the investigation suggested by the hon. Member is to be. I think there would be a great advantage in having an investigation into many things in Ireland. For example, I should like to have an investigation in regard to the intimidation exercised on Irish prison officials. I should like to know what sort of inquiry the hon. Gentleman desires.

MR. SEXTON: As the right hon. Gentleman has questioned my veracity, and as I am prepared to maintain it, I will accept either a Committee of the House or a public inquiry on oath.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No; I never questioned the veracity of the hon. Gentleman; but I did question the prudence of the hon. Gentleman in relying upon the statement in the Freeman's Journal.

MR. SEXTON: The question has not been answered. I said that I would accept a Committee of the House or any public inquiry on oath. Which of them will the right hon. Gentleman give?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Leader of the House has said that he does not think a Committee of the House is a proper tribunal, and I agree with him in that respect; and the constitution of any other tribunal is not an easy matter.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I must put a question to the First Lord of the Treasury, who has said that a Committee of the House is not an expedient tribunal. I understand that there is an issue of fact on a very important matter between the Chief Secretary for Ireland and the hon. Member. The hon. Member has made a statement, and the only answer which the right hon. Gentleman makes is that he has taken it from the Freeman's Journal, which happens to be the authority on which the right hon. Gentleman himself drew up a memorandum. What I wish to ask is whether a Minister of the Crown is entitled to say—[Cries of "Order!"] I am entirely in order. I would ask whether a Minister of the Crown is entitled to give that sort of denial which the right hon. Gentleman has given? [Cries of "Order."] Perhaps the noble Lord (Viscount Crauborne) will allow the Speaker to call me to order, and not do it himself. I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will give any method whatever of ascertaining whether the point-blank denials of the Chief Secretary for Ireland are or are not well founded?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman must be aware that it has been the unhappy lot, not only of myself but of most of my predecessors, often to make statements in this House at variance with those made by hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway. I think he will admit that if every time such a collision of opinion occurred a public inquiry had been granted, the kingdom would not have sufficed to supply the tribunals. I should like to know what tribunal the hon. Gentleman would suggest before I give any answer.

MR. SEXTON: I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker. The contention is not one as to matters of opinion, but as to matters of fact determinable by evidence. And the right hon. Gentleman having stated yesterday that the declaration I made to the House is untrue, I, being prepared to prove it, ask you, Sir, whether I am not entitled to claim from him some means of proving the statement I made?

*MR. SPEAKER: That is not a question of order upon which I can be called in. The matter at issue must be decided as the House thinks proper.

MR. CONDON (Tipperary, E.): Perhaps I may be allowed to say a word or two on the subject.

*MR. SPEAKER: There is no Question before the House; but if the hon. Member desires to make a personal statement on the point that he informed me yesterday he wished to make he may do so by the indulgence of the House.

MR. CONDON: That was just what I am asking. I desire the indulgence of the House to make a personal explanation. The Chief Secretary, referring to Mr. Sexton's version of the O'Brien incident yesterday, said, "As he had repeated that calumny, he (Mr. Balfour) took this opportunity of again giving the most emphatic contradiction to every syllable of it." Now, Sir, it is a matter of public notoriety that I, in my capacity of Mayor of Clonmel, have sent reports similar to that which appeared in the Freeman's Journal to hundreds of persons in this country and in Ireland, in reply to inquiries as to Mr. O'Brien's condition and his treatment in Clonmel Gaol. I may also inform the Chief Secretary and on which they can be taken, unless the time of private Members is encroached upon, is Monday next. I believe it is the desire of right hon. Gentlemen opposite that the debate on the Vote on Account should be taken on Monday. Under these circumstances I hope the Supplementary Estimates will be agreed to to-night, in order that it will not be necessary for us to make any proposal to the House for further facilities.

DR. CAMERON: Might I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he did not most distinctly say yesterday he would not take them, and is it fair, now that hon. Members have made their arrangements accordingly, that we should have sprung upon us a very important debate?

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): Would not the best way out of the difficulty be to withdraw the remainder of the Vote to Sheriff Ivory?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It is not in our power to do that. The Supplementary Estimate is asked for expenses incurred, and we must take the judgment of the House on it. I have endeavoured to be frank with the hon. Gentleman. I have explained the circumstances in which we are placed, and if the hon. Gentleman is of opinion that, instead of meeting for an hour or half an hour after 12 o'clock, it is better that the time of private Members should be taken, that course can be taken. But then the responsibility will rest with him.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask whether, supposing an hon. Member moved to report Progress after 12 o'clock, if the Naval Estimates had been taken before 12, the right hon. Gentleman will assent to the Motion.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am compelled to take this course by the exigencies of the public service. It has been considered better that the House should sit for half-an-hour after 12 than encroach upon the time of private Members.

MR. LABOUCHERE: If any hon. Member moves to report Progress after 12 o'clock in the event of the Navy Estimates having been taken, will the right hon. Gentleman assent to the Motion?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think it would be undesirable, if the majority desire to go on with public business, that Progress should be reported at the instance of some three or four Members.

Mr. W. H. Smith

MR. LABOUCHERE: Then I will only ask what becomes of the pledge that was given by the right hon. Gentleman yesterday?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am adhering to that pledge.

NEW MEMBER SWORN.

William George Spencer Scott Compton (commonly called Earl Compton), for the Southern Part of the West Riding of the County of York (Barnsley Division).

MOTION.

SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE (EXEMPTION FROM THE STANDING ORDER).

Motion made, and Question put,

"That the Proceedings of the Committee of Supply, if the Committee be sitting at 12 o'clock this night, be not interrupted under the Standing Order 'Sittings of the House.'"—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

The House divided:—Ayes 215; Noes 143.—(Division List, No. 18.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

The Report of Committee of Supply was brought up and agreed to.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

GUNS AND ORDNANCE STORES FOR THE NAVAL SERVICE.

*MR. DUFF (Banffshire): At the present moment the attention of the country is more directed to the new Naval Defence programme than it is to the details of administration. As that programme will be fully discussed on future occasions I shall not refer to it, except incidentally so far as it affects the Motion I have to submit to the House. But, Sir, the question involved in the subject I desire to bring forward is one of such vital importance, that I make no apology for raising it, and I am glad of an opportunity of doing so when naval affairs are receiving a more than usual amount of public attention. Sir, everyone at all conversant with naval affairs has known for several years that the delay in procuring guns and Naval Ordnance Stores has been the weakest part of our administrative system. Were it necessary, I could give the Committee endless statistics to prove that vessels, otherwise complete, have been kept waiting for their guns, but after the admission of the First Lord, on Thursday, "that ships have been kept waiting for months, and in some cases for years, for their guns," I will not inflict figures on the Committee in support of what I regard as the complete collapse of our present system. In reference to the delay attending the delivery of guns, the First Lord told us that there had been a block in the road, and that he and the Secretary for War had determined to widen the road. What we want, in my opinion, is not to widen the old road, but to make an entirely new one. Sir, dealing with the Motion I am submitting to the House, I desire to remind hon. Members what our present system is. The money for Naval Ordnance, since last year, has been taken in Naval Votes. But the contract for guns, and most Naval Ordnance Stores, continue to be made by the War Office. This creates a dual control, and a divided responsibility, fatal to efficiency, and most detrimental, in my opinion, to the public interest. If I am asked how this is to be remedied, I reply at once by saying the Admiralty ought to adopt the conclusions arrived at by the Conference between the Admiralty and the War Office, held in June, 1886, whereby the Admiralty undertook to take the entire responsibility of providing themselves with guns and Ordnance stores. Although they were only a short time in office, Lord Ripon's Board of Admiralty, with the full concurrence of the Director of Naval Ordnance, came to the conclusion that that was the only way out of our present difficulty. And although the change was not effected when the late Board went out of office, yet the principle, as I will presently show, had been adopted, and the change was in a fair way of being accomplished. But the present Board would not undertake the responsibility, at the same time they fully admit the weakness of the existing system. Here is what the First Lord said in introducing the Estimates last year—

"Our difficulty, and I will be quite frank with the House, is not one of want of funds, or of want of shipbuilding power, it is one of gun-producing power."

That we all know, but what I complain of is that the noble Lord's energy is not equal to his frankness. He takes no effective steps to improve our gun-producing power. Then, on the same occasion, the Secretary to the Admiralty, in reply to some remarks of mine, said—

"The hon. Gentleman suggests that we should take more money for guns and less for ships. They (the Admiralty) had taken as much money for guns as the manufactories could turn out, and in proof of that the War Office would have to return to the Treasury a very large amount of money which they had taken for naval armaments this year, and which they had been unable to spend. It would, therefore, be idle for the Admiralty to take an excessive amount, knowing the difficulty there would be in expending the money asked for last year."

So here we have the First Lord of the Admiralty, and the Secretary to the Admiralty, coming down to the House, and telling us, while they are scandalously short of guns, and at a time when they have never turned out more than 15 guns above 9 inches in diameter in any one year, that although they have plenty of money, yet they do not know how to increase our gun-producing power. Sir, I must say, to me this is a pitiable, I might say a humiliating, admission. Here are we, the greatest mechanical and manufacturing country in the world, turning out guns for half the Foreign Navies in the world, yet when we want guns for our own Navy, the authorities of the Admiralty quietly fold their arms, and say, "Though we have plenty of money, yet we can't get the guns." This is what the administrative capacity of the First Lord and the commercial genius of the Secretary of the Admiralty have brought us to! Sir, there used to be a saying in my day in the Navy that there was no such word as "can't" on board a man-of-war. I fear the determination to overcome difficulties which that saying implies, though still retained in the Navy, is not to be found controlling the policy of the present Board of Admiralty. Now, Sir, the difficulties the Admiralty have to overcome are not, in my opinion, insurmountable—they involve some responsibility and require some administrative capacity, such as we have a right to expect in a First Lord of the Admiralty. All you have to do is to go into the market for your guns, make your own contract for them, just as you do for your ships and your engines. I do not suggest this on my own responsibility; it was the system which, as I have said, the late Board had agreed to adopt in accordance with the recommendation of the Conference to which I have referred, confirmed in its main principles by an Interdepartmental Committee on which the War Office, Admiralty, and Treasury were represented. The whole departmental correspondence which led to the Naval Ordnance Vote being taken in the Navy Estimates is contained in the Appendix to the 5th Report of the Army Estimates Committee of 1887. It is full of valuable information on this subject; and I do not think any work which the Committee so ably presided over by the noble Lord the Member for Paddington has done will be more useful in exposing, as this correspondence does, the hopeless confusion which prevails under the existing dual system. Whoever peruses these Papers impartially will understand the cause of the delay in the delivery of our guns and the disaster the present system would inevitably bring about in time of war. I must also say that, in my opinion, the War Office comes very well out of the existing muddle, as the Papers show that the entire responsibility for not adopting the Committee recommendation is due to the timidity of the present Board of Admiralty. The reasons for adopting the Resolution I am submitting to the House are so amply sustained in the Papers I have alluded to that I must briefly refer to them, and will, in doing so, give a short statement of what occurred. In December, 1884, the Director of Artillery, General Alderson, revives an old discussion as to the desirability of the Admiralty taking the responsibility of providing their own guns and warlike stores. He says—

“The great changes which have taken place since 1868, amounting to almost a revolution in our armaments, have tended to accentuate the importance of making the Admiralty entirely responsible (as indeed they are at this moment partially so) for the provision of all warlike material required for the Navy. . . . It is high time that the system detrimental to both Services should be brought to an end, especially now the completion of naval armaments is becoming more and more urgent. The responsibility heretofore has been dangerously divided, and I can only repeat that such a division of responsibility is certain to lead to great inconvenience in any case, and to absolute disaster in case of war.”

General Alderson explains further on—

“That if the Admiralty take their own money they will of course make their own contracts.”

After this date there is a long correspondence between Admiralty and War Office, and partly on account of changes of Government the contemplated alteration in the system is delayed. In the spring of 1886 the Cockinwood's guns burst, and that led to the revival of the subject. The matter was fully discussed at Lord Ripon's Board of Admiralty, of which I was then a member; a decision was arrived at that a radical change was required in the then existing system. This led to a conference between the Admiralty and War Office which recommended the change, only effected last year, of the transfer of the Naval Ordnance Vote from Army to Navy Estimates. They further said they approved the views of General Alderson, I which have just quoted, that the Admiralty should make their own contracts. These views were approved by Lord Ripon and his colleagues. I should, perhaps, mention that my right hon. Friend, Mr. Hibbert, presided at the Conference—he is a gentleman well known in the House, and his approval of the scheme will I am sure be accepted by many hon. Members as an assurance that it was financially and administratively sound. Admiral Hopkins, then Director of Naval Ordnance, was prepared to take the responsibility of ordering guns directly from the trade. No doubt in sanctioning this change the Board did undertake a serious responsibility. But what was felt by Lord Ripon and his colleagues, was that there would be a still greater responsibility in continuing a system which had so conspicuously failed. The Conference I have referred to was followed by an Interdepartmental Committee, in which the Treasury was represented. They confirm the views adopted at the Conference. I will read the paragraph in their Report which to the Resolution refers—

“In regard to the provision of future supplies, it is agreed that the Admiralty shall annually furnish to the War Office notice of their probable requirements for warlike stores of all kinds, in time for the preparation of the Estimates, in order that the War Office may state the extent to which the requirements of the Navy can be met from the Government establishments at the date to be settled between the two departments for delivery; but it will be understood that the private trade may be resorted to by the Admiralty, not merely for articles which the War Office cannot supply within the required time, but on due notice to the office, for any articles which may be obtained by the requisite dates more cheaply from the private trade."

So far as heavy guns are concerned the present Admiralty have paid no attention to that recommendation. In the correspondence every possible objection is raised by the Admiralty to carrying out the Committee's recommendation. It is quite clear to me that the present Board never realized the intention of their predecessors. What the late Board contemplated was this. They would go to the War Office in the first instance and say, we want so many guns by the end of the next two years, say 100 guns, how many can you let us have? Woolwich might reply. "We can let you have 20." These would be ordered by the Admiralty direct from Woolwich; but regarding the other 80 guns, the Admiralty would go into the market for them. Take in tenders for so many, not only from Armstrong and Whitworth, but from any firm in the Kingdom that was willing to compete and could satisfy the Director of Naval Ordnance that they were prepared to fulfil the conditions of the contract. If it was found by experience that guns could be obtained cheaper and quicker from private firms than from Woolwich, then the latter, so far as naval ordnance is concerned, would be gradually dropped. I ventured to say something to this effect last year; the idea was received with ridicule on the bench opposite. I was told that if I understood the subject I would know that no private firm would go to the expense of laying down plant unless they received a continuous order. But what has happened since then? You have employed Messrs. Vickers, of Sheffield. Are you satisfied that there are no other firms that would undertake orders on the same conditions as Messrs. Vickers? I believe, from reliable information that has reached me, that there are many firms in the country that are equally capable and willing to undertake Government work. In my opinion, the country ought to have the full benefit of competition in the open market. Instead of that, your policy seems to be to create and perpetuate a monopoly. By going to the market, you keep a check on Woolwich and other Government establishments, just as by building ships by contract you keep a check on your Dockyards. But there is a far more important advantage than this. You develop the resources of the country, and you have an enormous and powerful reserve to fall back on in case of an emergency. In the correspondence between the Departments, the War Office are constantly urging the Admiralty to adopt the recommendations of the Committee; but the only letter which seems to have produced any effect is that of the 13th June, 1887, when the War Office remind the Admiralty that the Government have given pledges in Parliament that the existing system will be changed. This appeal to the Admiralty is of course irresistible, and consequently a change to a certain extent is made. The money required for naval ordnance is taken in the Naval Estimates in 1888, but the system of divided responsibility and dual control remains exactly where it was. The Admiralty will not make their own contracts. They decline to adopt the recommendations of the Committee which I have quoted to the House. In case anything goes wrong, they prefer to shelter themselves behind the War Office to taking the responsibility which really belongs to them. I alluded just now to the pledge given in Parliament, as the lever by which the Admiralty had to a certain extent been moved. It is contained in a speech of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, when he was War Minister in September, 1886. It must be remembered that he speaks with the authority of an ex-First Lord of the Admiralty. He says—

"I agree with all that has been said about making the Navy alone responsible for its own munition of war. I have urged that in and out of office for a very long time. For the future the responsibility will rest with the Navy for the supply of all materials of every kind which is required for its own branch of the service. They may go to Woolwich for such guns as Woolwich may supply, or to Whitworth Co., they will have a perfectly free hand."

From this statement I at once came to the conclusion that the Admiralty were going to adopt the policy which Lord Ripon's Board had sanctioned, but which they did not remain long enough in office to carry out. I got up at once, and expressed my satisfaction that there was to be a continuity of policy in this important branch of naval administration. But the hope I entertained was soon doomed to disappointment, as the present Board, as soon as they got comfortably settled in office, continued the old custom of ordering their guns through the War Office, the results we know having proved the complete failure of the present system. Now I have quoted military authorities I am advocating, let me refer to a naval authority. Admiral Hopkins, the present Controller of the Navy, was examined before Sir James Stephen's Commission. He had been three years Director of Naval Ordnance. He is asked by the Chairman of the Commission—

"(2) Do you think it would be a better plan to have the supply of the two services separately provided for?—I think it is the only plan; I think in the event of war the amount of work that the Commissary General at Woolwich would have to do would be excessive."

Then the Chairman says—

"He has in fact to do duties of a very different kind: he may be called upon at one and the same moment to send all sorts of stores to an army in the field, and also to a naval squadron in the Pacific Ocean?"

Quite so.

"They require very different things?—Yes, I may say that it is all in process of alteration. I was a Member of that Committee at the War Office lately which put before the Treasury very strongly that really the only way to insure what may be considered a respectable system is for the Naval Authorities to take money in Naval Votes, and provide their own naval material, and then it would be in their own hands."

My noble Friend opposite the Member for Marylebone has expressed himself in favour of that system. Admiral Sir J. Commerell, a very distinguished and experienced officer, lately a Member of this House, expressed himself very decidedly from the Benches opposite in favour of what he termed "Home Rule" at the Admiralty; and he gave an instance of the absurdity of the present system, by telling us of a vessel which had been sent to the West Indies, while her Ordnance stores were all despatched to the Mediterranean. Now, Sir, in this matter the Admiralty have taken up an isolated position. They are opposed to naval opinions; they are opposed to the recommendation of the Inter departmental Committee; they are opposed to the War Office as represented by the Director of Artillery; and they are opposed to the views expressed by the First Lord of the Treasury in the House. In some of their letters the Admiralty have put forward an alternative policy, and suggested the revival of the old Ordnance Department, common to both services. But this system has already been tried and failed. There was constant friction between the Admiralty and the Ordnance Department. The naval men and the Secretary of the Admiralty of the day, Sir John Barrow, were all opposed to it, as the Papers I have referred to will show. Now, I may be asked why I bring forward this Motion. My reply is, because I regard the failure of the Government to supply us with guns as one of the grossest administrative blunders of modern times, and because I entertain a sincere conviction that, if the policy I am advocating had been adopted in 1886, we should not be in the weak position we are in to-day. I may be told that this is a mere speculative opinion; but in support of that opinion I am able to appeal to the experience of a neighbouring country. Before the Franco-German War, France had a system analogous to ours. It completely broke down. They have now a system which works admirably. The naval authorities and the military are thoroughly independent. They each apply directly to the market for tenders when material is wanted, get supplied either with guns, or with the blocks of steel or finished material, as they think best. The Navy have an establishment at Rueil, the Army at Bourges, where material is taken and guns are finished. The Marine Department have Artillery officers attached, for testing the guns and material; but these officers are directly under the Marine Department. As open competition prevails, there is no limit to the number of firms that compete. I can give the names of the five principal ones—Le Creuzot, St. Chamond, Châtillon, Fives Lille, Forges et Chantiers de la Méditerranée. These are in addition to the two Government establishments. Contrast this with the three sources of supply we have hitherto relied on—viz., Woolwich, Whitworth, and Armstrong, and bear in mind that the two private firms make largely for foreign countries, and it is not surprising that France has less difficulty in getting guns than we experience. The encouragement given to the trade, as opposed to our system of practically subsidizing two firms, has largely developed the steel trade in France. The American Commission, sent to Europe by U.S. Foundry Board to report on the different systems, speak with unqualified approval of the French system. They remind us that France has been forced into the system of relying mainly on private firms, by the complete collapse of the Government establishments during the Franco-German War. The First Lord of the Admiralty is never tired of telling us how infinitely superior we are to France regarding the rapidity with which we can build our ships. He made an eloquent speech on the subject at Glasgow; when I read it I could not help thinking that our boasted superiority was entirely neutralized by our inability to supply the ships with guns. I believe in this respect France is three or four years ahead of us. Now, let me turn to the "statement" of the First Lord. It is almost superfluous to say that when I come to the Ordnance Department, I find he has to tell us that there has been a very great delay in the delivery of guns; of course, this statement, as usual, is accompanied by a hope—no; it was a hope last season—but that perennial spring is nearly dried up at the Admiralty; it is a "belief" that guns will be delivered more punctually in the future. We are then told that much of this delay is due to faulty liners. This may be the case to a certain extent, but when we have guns delayed for two years, as in the case of the Collingwoods, and the gun only takes one year to make, it is absurd to attribute the delay to the "liner." Now, let me ask the House to consider for a moment how we stand according to the Estimates with the promised gun programme and its fulfilment. On the 6th August last the First Lord told me in the House that we then required 81 guns over nine inches diameter, and that 45 of these would be delivered by the end of the financial year. According to the First Lord's statement, only 22 guns of the description I am speaking of were delivered in the course of last year. What our exact deficiency is at this moment is it is impossible for me to say, as I have no means of knowing the number of guns delivered since 31st December, and I do not know how many of the older armour clads it is proposed to re-arm this year; but so far as I can form an opinion, our arrears of large guns, dealing with the old programme, must be somewhere about 70, and we are making that up at the rate of 22 a year. Now, from the statement of the Secretary of State for War on Monday, I am willing to believe that the rate of delivery will be accelerated; but as he did not distinguish between land and naval service, and I think included the 8-inch gun in his calculations, it is difficult to arrive at any definite conclusion as to when, even on paper, the lee way will be made up. But the Committee will bear in mind that the Secretary for War has to provide a very large number of guns for military ports and coaling stations; the heavy guns required for this programme cannot be less than 100, and these are drawn from the same source as the naval ordnance. If the new naval programme is carried out, we shall require, with reserves, 70 large guns for naval service, above the 70 I have already referred to; but even if it is not adopted in its entirety, we shall still require a considerable number of guns to arm the ships that would be required under the ordinary programme. I urge these considerations on the Committee, as a reason for taking advantage of the present moment, when a large supply of guns is required by both Services, to improve our system, and increase our gun-producing power. The mere addition of Messrs. Vickers to the firms who are to enjoy the monopoly of Government employment, which is all the Secretary for War promises us, is not a sufficient remedy for a deficient supply of guns, and a defective system of administration. I should like some information regarding the Ordnance Vote. In his statement the First Lord says there is a "serious deficiency" in ordnance stores this is accompanied by a reduction of £400,000 in the Vote, £238,712 of which centre under the head of projectiles and ammunition. I think this requires some explanation, because even if we get the promised guns, it seems to me we shall be very short of ammunition for them. I have said I would not allude to the new programme, except in so far as it is referred to in the Ordnance Vote. The attitude I take up is this. Whatever the strength of our Navy is, and I desire to see it strong, let it be efficient all round. We ought to frame our programme that the money granted by Parliament should be expended on all the requirements of the Service. There should be adequate proportion maintained between the outlay on men, on ships, and on guns. But we know we are short of guns, and, as I have said, deficient in ammunition. Would it not be more practical to make our existing Navy efficient before embarking, at any rate to the extent proposed, in the new shipbuilding programme. The cost of armaments has gone up enormously—far more rapidly even than the cost of ships. The armament and fittings of the Benbow, with her 12 guns, cost £207,000, the hull and machinery £617,000. Thirty years ago the Duke of Wellington's 131 guns, including all their fittings, only cost £17,000. Looking to the enormous increase in the cost of armaments, and they are likely with the development of quick-firing guns to go on increasing, I think it would be a wise course to arm properly the ships we have and lay in a stock of ammunition, before we build more ships to join the large "expectant" squadron, now waiting for their guns, which the present Admiralty have so thoughtfully provided for the protection of our shores. On this matter I think the patience of the country is getting a little exhausted, and before the House grants the present Board of Admiralty a single sixpence, we ought to have definite information on three points—namely, what our calculated output of guns is in the year, the sources from whence the guns are to come, and the penalties to be inflicted on contractors for non-fulfilment of their contracts; and, above all, we ought to insist on a radical change in our Ordnance system. I believe so long as you continue this plan of divided responsibility in spite of the warnings of the ablest officers of both Services, you will be liable to the delays and failures of which you have already had so large an experience; and in addition to that, the Naval Service will be deprived the advantage it ought to possess, of being enabled in its hour of need to rely on the endless mechanical and manufacturing resources of this country.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): In seconding the Motion of the hon. Member for Banffshire (Mr. R. W. Duff), I would point out that his Motion naturally divides itself into two sections, and I am surprised that the Government do not accept the first of these at once, and declare themselves under an obligation to the hon. Member for bringing it forward in such a clear and simple form. The proposition that the First Lord, as representing the Admiralty, should be responsible for all the naval guns has very often been put before the House, and it has always been accepted by the Government in theory, but it seems that it is not acted upon in practice. This House and the country like to know who to hang in case anything goes wrong, and I am sure the First Lord would not object to the responsibility for supplying naval ordnance being definitely fixed upon the Admiralty. At present the responsibility is divided and complicated between the Admiralty, the War Office, and the Ordnance Committee, of whom the great majority are military officers, and when anything goes wrong you have to hunt all the way down, attacking first the First Lord of the Admiralty, who falls back upon the Secretary for War, who again retires upon the Ordnance Committee, who will endeavour to cast the responsibility on the Director General of Ordnance, then there will be an intermediate dispute between naval and military advisers as to who recommended the gun, and by the time responsibility is fixed—if it ever is—the country is tired of the whole question. There is truth in Solomon's maxim that there is safety in a multitude of counsellors, but it is safety for the counsellors, not for those who receive the counsel, for, of course, the counsellors can shift about the responsibility from one to the other. If he consults the safety of the country, I think the noble Lord should accept the first part of this Resolution. The difficulty with the First Lord is to know to whom to go for advice as to pattern and class of guns. You may say there are very few people capable of giving advice on the subject. Certainly an engineer, if he has studied the subject for eight or ten years and is an able man, may give an opinion and know more about the manufacture of a gun than the man whose business it is to fight the gun. There are very few of these men, and they are mostly connected with the trade, and so are not available to give advice to the First Lord. Then he must rely on military or naval officers. But the ordinary Naval or Artillery officer knows very little indeed about manufacturing guns; his business is to work the guns; and of the Artillery officer, I should say that he knows a great deal more about how a horse is groomed than he does of how a gun is made. In the Navy there is no great opportunity to obtain experience, but there are some officers who have gathered much experience and information from Shoeburyness and on board the Excellent. I may mention that the present Director General of Ordnance, quoted by the hon. Member for Banffshire, derived much of his information from Shoeburyness. There is another quarter where the knowledge can be obtained, and that is at the Gun Factory, Woolwich. There are only a limited number of officers employed there, not more than two or three at a time, I think, and probably there are not more than six or eight who have passed through the Factory, and are capable of giving advice as to manufacture. I do not know that there are any Naval officers who have been so employed, but until the First Lord can avail himself of the service of Naval officers, let him attach to his Department Artillery officers, who have the necessary knowledge acquired by experience on the Excellent at Shoeburyness and at Woolwich. It would be much better so than that the responsibility of the Admiralty should be weakened by passing through the War Office. As to carriages, Naval officers ought to be far better advisers than Artillery officers, because the naval gun-carriages are of an elaborate character, and worked by steam machinery, whereas there is nothing of the kind with land artillery. The supply of shot and shell is a much simpler matter, and hardly requires elaborate manufacturing knowledge. As to the first part of the Resolution, I have no doubt that all difficulties could be met. It is well to notice that, on any question between good guns and moderately good guns, the best must always go to the Navy. The reasons are obvious, the gun-carriages and arrangements on board ship are elaborate, and calculated to make the best use of the conditions existing on the ship, and it is not possible—as it is, as a rule, on land fortifications—to substitute, say, six moderately-good guns for four first-class guns. The Navy must have the precedence in the supply of guns; but under the present system, if naval guns turn out badly, I defy you to say whose fault it is. The Admiralty, the War Office, the Director of Artillery, the Ordnance Committee, would have the blame amongst them; but such an elaborate correspondence would result from an attempt to apportion the blame, that it would require legal training to say where actual responsibility should rest. The second part of the hon. Member's Resolution, I am afraid, the Government will not adopt, for I pressed something of the same kind upon their attention quite lately. There are, no doubt, few firms now who are ready to produce guns, but I imagine if you tell them you are going to lay out a million or two on gun contracts, thrown open to general competition, there would be no difficulty about raising the capital to set up the necessary machinery, and anyone accustomed to working steel would, in a short time, produce good guns, though not perhaps equal to those of Krupp. I need hardly enlarge upon the advantages of open competition—how you would at once get rid of the suspicions and innuendos that it was influence brought to bear on officials that secured this or that contract; and how you would sometimes get guns even below market price, because there are times when it would pay a manufacturer, in order to keep his plant going and his staff together, to work at cost price. Of course the manufacturer will look forward to recoup himself when a large or sudden demand arises. But the idea of the manufacturer under the system of restricted competition seems to be that he is always to get his 15 or 20 per cent from a Government order, and when the pressure comes he may get over 100 per cent. This is not the usual practice of large manufacturers, who are content sometimes to forego their profits, seeing their gain in the long run from transactions over a long period. I hope the Government will even accept the second part of the Resolution, perhaps in a modified form, but as to the first part I do not see why they should not at once adopt it.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words, "in the opinion of this House, the Admiralty ought to assume the entire responsibility of providing guns and ordnance stores for the Naval Service, and that the delivery of guns would be accelerated, and the gun-producing power of the Country developed, if the private trade, as recommended by the Report of the Inter-Departmental Committee, dated 11th November 1886, were more largely resorted to than at present for the supply of guns and ordnance stores,"—(Mr. Duff),

—instead thereof.

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The hon. Gentleman who opened this discussion used some very strong language about the present Board of Admiralty, while he used some complimentary epithets in reference to the Board to which he belonged. Now it struck me that although the hon. Gentleman used this strong language he did not display intimate knowledge of his subject. The hon. and gallant Gentleman who seconded the Motion does know his subject; he is a thorough artilleryman and knows what the difficulties are. Let me state those difficulties in a few words. There have been many Committees, Commissions, and Conferences on this question of supplying warlike stores, but although there have been many different recommendations and much diversity of opinion displayed as to the administration of the Ordnance Department, they have been absolutely unanimous on this point, that all guns or stores, whether for the Army or Navy, should be uniform in pattern and interchangeable. That is the guiding principle that the hon. Gentleman ignores. He asks us to imitate France, where they have guns differing in design and not interchangeable between Army and Navy, and separate stocks of stores and ammunition for each service. This is what I think the House would never tolerate, that we, with our possessions and interests scattered all over the world, should have at our different stations two supplies of stores, one for our naval and the other for our land forces. No one disputes the fact that guns should be interchangeable, and it follows that there can be only one Designing Department, not one for the War Office and one for the Admiralty. The hon. Member, in moving his Motion, has censured the Admiralty because they have not adopted the decision of the Conference. Now, the decision of the Conference was to refer the matter of stores to a Committee.

*MR. R. W. DUFF: I must take exception to that statement. The Conference adopted the principle laid down by General Alderson that the Admiralty should make their own contracts for naval stores.

*LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: A Conference was appointed, and the Conference recommended that a Committee should be appointed, and the Committee arrived at the conclusion that the Admiralty should not make separate contracts so far as guns, gunpowder, projectiles, and other stores were concerned. In paragraph 10, page 4, the Committee distinctly recommends the very system now in force. The hon. Member laughs. Has he the smallest estimation of the quantity of stores which are not interchangeable. It is infinitesimal. What I have quoted is the result of the Conference appointed by the Board of Admiralty, to which the hon. Member belonged, and it is that at which the hon. Member laughs. I contend that the present Board has done identically what, if the hon. Member had been in office, he would have been compelled to do. The hon. Member went further and said there were certain members on the Board of Admiralty, notably Admiral Hopkins, who agreed in his view. The hon. Member is utterly in error. Admiral Hopkins is Controller of the Navy, and he entirely dissents from the hon. Member.

*MR. DUFF: I read his evidence in support of my views before Sir James Stephen's Commission.

*LORD G. HAMILTON: The hon. Member may have referred to his evidence, but as against that I had myself the advantage of a conversation with the Controller of the Navy this morning, and he said he entirely dissented from the view advanced by the hon. Gentleman, and for the reason I have stated, that the Admiralty would not undertake to order guns unless they had a special department for designs. The fact is, there are very few persons in this country who can design heavy guns. The hon. Member has so little idea of the difficulties attending the manufacture of guns that he proposes to put them on the same footing as the hulls of ships and machinery but there is all the difference in the world between the cases. If your engines do not come up to test, you can make a reduction in the amount of money paid to the contractor, and you still have ships which will be able to drive at a certain speed. If a hull is not satisfactory, the result probably will be that the vessel will go a knot or two less. But if a gun does not work it will in all probability burst, and then what is to be done?

MR. DUFF: Reject it.

LORD G. HAMILTON: Yes, but the rejection of the gun affects all the guns made on this principle, and the hon. Member does not appear to understand that. There is an insuperable difficulty in the way of establishing two designing Departments, one for the Army and one for the Navy, and, as a matter of fact, there is no alternative between the present system and the establishment of a separate Ordnance Department. It seems to be a great reflection upon this country that there should be a considerable number of ships waiting for their guns, and I can quite understand the hon. Gentleman's wish to make some practical suggestion by which the difficulties can be obviated, but it is quite clear his recommendation would aggravate the evil. There is not much difficulty in obtaining small guns, but we cannot entrust firms, who have had no experience, with the making of the heaviest ordnance. They must learn their business gradually. To go into the market for great guns might be to put into the hands of inexperienced firms the manufacture of guns which it is almost impossible to assume they could produce. As to the second part of the proposition, I quite agree with the hon. and gallant Member that we ought to do everything in our power to increase the sources of supply; but that is a work which must be done gradually. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War has been very successful in getting existing firms to extend their works, and also in getting fresh firms to undertake the business, and by distributing the work amongst different firms he has been able to get a considerably larger amount of work done during the past year than previously. It may interest the House to know what has been the delivery of guns during the past three years. There have been delivered to the Naval Service during the three years ending 1st April, 1889, 594 guns above 4-inch calibre; of the guns required to be delivered in the year 1889-90 there are 235 over 4-inch, all of which have been ordered. In addition to that, there are 269 guns which will be required before 1st April, 1891, if the shipbuilding proposals of the Government are assented to. It is estimated that all will be practically completed within two years, leaving only 48 incomplete at the end of that time. Past experience, however, should not make us over-sanguine that they will be delivered to the exact date named. I can assure the Committee that the Board of Admiralty are not in the slightest degree inclined to shirk the responsibility which legitimately attaches to them of supplying the Navy with guns; but they could not undertake the responsibility of designing them. If we had gone into the open market, there would have been two of us—ourselves and the War Department—competing against each other, and, in all probability, driving up prices. Many of the difficulties which have hitherto attended the manufacture and delivery of these guns are being solved, and I believe that, if we continued on the lines we are pursuing, we shall gradually surmount these difficulties, and, at the same time, improve our guns. I hope the House will, by a large majority, reject the proposals of the hon. Member, which would only aggravate the trouble we wish to cure.

*LORD C. BERESFORD (Marylebone, E.): I quite agree with the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty as to the immense difficulty of the question, but I do not see why the difficulty should not be faced. I think the remarks of my noble Friend have wandered away from the question. This state of things undoubtedly does exist—that we have many ships without guns—and the noble Lord is not over-sanguine that the demand which will be made for guns in time to come will be readily met. We want to know whether that demand will be met, and that is a point the country also wants to know. We ought to have, first of all, a sufficient number of guns for immediate use; then we want enough to re-arm the Fleet; and we want to know how many guns there are in the Reserve. The life of a heavy gun, nowadays, is very short, owing, probably, to the enormous explosive power of the new powder, and we have frequently to relieve the guns, which renders it necessary that we shall have an efficient Reserve. From a Return of the ships waiting for their guns, as at May of last year, I find that there are eight ships which, in the aggregate, are short of 78 guns. I wish to know how many of those ships are still waiting for their guns? On another point I will ask the First Lord if he has now any orders out to supply the place of the obsolete guns—the wrought-iron guns with steel linings. The new gun manufactured in this country since 1885 is a good gun—as good a gun as is to be found in Europe; but before 1885 the guns were neither good in material nor manufacture. In the matter of reserve of guns, the present system is wrong. For instance, when the Amiral Duperré burst a gun, its place was supplied in a few weeks; but when the Colossus burst a gun many months elapsed before she got another, simply because there is no reserve guns. Why is this? The right hon. Gentleman does as his Predecessors did—the best he can do under the present system; which is nothing. On the question of liners there is a generally wrong impression. The French, German, and Italian Governments do not use them—why I do not know, as the result will be that they will have to get rid of their guns before they are very old, which will cost an enormous amount of money; but the British Government do use liners, and, by putting them into guns to some extent disabled by erosion, we make the guns as good as new. This is a good system; and I do not understand the statement of the First Lord in regard to it—namely,

“The delay (in the production of guns) is due to the faulty principle adopted with regard to a number of the guns in replacing liners.”

That rather implies that he does not approve of liners; but we must have liners in the guns when they are eroded. I have seen recently at Woolwich a gun which is to have a new liner shipped with it; so that at sea the old liner can be blown out and a new one put in its place. This is a new system, and only shows what a great deal has to be learnt by our sailors nowadays. At one time our seamen were supposed to be useful to us on account of the smartness with which they could reef topsails, but in the present day they are to be distinguished for their ability in taking out old liners and putting in new ones. The present system of gun manufacture is very unfair to the manufacturer, largely on account of the financial year system. Guns, as well as ships, ought to be carried straight through to completion and paid for at once, thus assisting the manufacturer, and enabling the country to get what it wants. The manufacturer at present has to wait for orders, and then has to complete them within a certain date; and when the workmanship is hurried the result is apt not to be good. They cannot get continuity of orders, and accordingly, with such plant as they have, they cannot afford to take all the orders that the Government can give them. They are compelled either to discharge men or to work for foreign Governments. This brings about the condition of things in which British manufacturers are working very largely for foreign Governments, while the British Government is itself waiting for guns. This matter requires to be looked into; and I also think the matter of delivery should be worked out better. Krupp always guarantees to turn out his heavy guns, running up to 14 in., at the rate of one month for every inch of calibre. That is not what we do in this country or anything near it. Probably remarks will be made on the opposite side of the House about the great expenditure on guns. But in reply I will ask, first, whether the country is to be defended or not? And next, I will point out that the steel gun manufactured since 1885 is a cheaper gun than any other heavy gun in Europe. The French guns of over 9-in. calibre cost £320 per ton; the Krupp guns cost £240 per ton; and the English guns since 1885 cost only £200 per ton. If the services are to have guns at all, the country cannot afford to supply such as will be inferior to those brought against them. As to the Committees to which the noble Lord referred, there have been no actual practical results from them, although, no doubt, a great many things have been inquired into. My noble Friend, I see, dissents from this statement, but if we have not sufficient guns for our ships, surely I am justified in saying that there have been no practical results. What I ask is, will the supply in future equal the demand? The noble Lord said he was not sanguine that he would be able to get guns up to date. That is all nonsense. We must get the guns up to date. If it takes longer to make them put the date further back; but have the guns up to that date. Every Committee which has sat to consider this question has come to the sound common-sense conclusion that we must have one pattern for the Army and Navy. That is necessary in order that we can transfer guns from ships to fortresses and vice versa where necessary. The Committee of 1887 forming the subject of Paper 259 reported that "The funds allotted by Parliament from time to time for the production of ordnance for the Navy have been diverted to other purposes;"

that,

"No organization has existed or yet exists by which the gun-producing resources of the country can be developed so as to meet the requirements;"

that the Admiralty

"Have no information as to the number of rounds of ammunition in store for the various guns or as to the available stock of tubes, &c., or how much the stock of warlike material has been increased or diminished from year to year;"

and that

"The Admiralty receives no account of the money spent on guns for the Navy."

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): That has been altered.

LORD C. BERESFORD: I am glad to hear that. It came out most distinctly the other day in debate that the Admiralty ordered a large number of quick firing guns and refused to allow ammunition for them. This is the sort of thing that must be continually brought before the public if any alteration in the system is to be effected. Will the noble Lord kindly make a note of the point, as I should like to have an answer? Another remark made was that the late Financial Secretary to the War Office pointed out that either the Admiralty asked a great deal too much, or the War Department gave too little. Fancy such a thing as that taking place with regard to the supply of guns. The Committee in their Report also say that:

"The Administration as it now exists has been pronounced by most competent authorities to be one of 'dangerous divided responsibility,' which will probably lead to disaster in the event of war,"

"in the interest of the public service a radical change is imperatively demanded."

I think the French system is the best that can be adopted, but I would be the last to recommend it to the House, because it would involve a very large expenditure, and I think it better to utilize what we have got; but on the other hand the system does not work well. There is a great deal of irritation between the two services, and I believe the thing will never work well until we get for the supply of guns a Department independent both of the War Office and the Admiralty. I would have the Department formed of soldiers, sailors, engineers, and others, but presided over by a civilian. Such a Department would see in a moment where the guns ought to be supplied, whether to the Army or the Navy, and somebody would always be responsible, whereas under the present system it is impossible to bring responsibility home to anybody. As far as the hon. Gentleman's Resolution goes I cannot agree with the first part of it, but I entirely agree with the second part, and I think the hon. Member has rendered a most valuable service in bringing the matter before the House.

*SIR W. PLOWDEN (Wolverhampton): I cannot help thinking that the Resolution of my hon. Friend (Mr. Duff) has been productive of an extremely useful discussion. My hon. Friend expressed a desire that the Admiralty should assume the entire responpressure comes he may get over 100 per cent. This is not the usual practice of large manufacturers, who are content sometimes to forego their profits, seeing their gain in the long run from transactions over a long period. I hope the Government will even accept the second part of the Resolution, perhaps in a modified form, but as to the first part I do not see why they should not at once adopt it.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words, "in the opinion of this House, the Admiralty ought to assume the entire responsibility of providing guns and ordnance stores for the Naval Service, and that the delivery of guns would be accelerated, and the gun-producing power of the Country developed, if the private trade, as recommended by the Report of the Inter-Departmental Committee, dated 11th November 1886, were more largely resorted to than at present for the supply of guns and ordnance stores,"—(Mr. Duff),

—instead thereof.

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The hon. Gentleman who opened this discussion used some very strong language about the present Board of Admiralty, while he used some complimentary epithets in reference to the Board to which he belonged. Now it struck me that although the hon. Gentleman used this strong language he did not display intimate knowledge of his subject. The hon. and gallant Gentleman who seconded the Motion does know his subject; he is a thorough artillerist and knows what the difficulties are. Let me state those difficulties in a few words. There have been many Committees, Commissions, and Conferences on this question of supplying warlike stores, but although there have been many different recommendations and much diversity of opinion displayed as to the administration of the Ordnance Department, they have been absolutely unanimous on this point, that all guns or stores, whether for the Army or Navy, should be uniform in pattern and interchangeable. That is the guiding principle that the hon. Gentleman ignores. He asks us to imitate France, where they have guns differing in design and not interchangeable between Army and Navy, and separate stocks of stores and ammunition for each service. This is what I think the House would never tolerate, that we, with our possessions and interests scattered all over the world, should have at our different stations two supplies of stores, one for our naval and the other for our land forces. No one disputes the fact that guns should be interchangeable, and it follows that there can be only one Designing Department, not one for the War Office and one for the Admiralty. The hon. Member, in moving his Motion, has censured the Admiralty because they have not adopted the decision of the Conference. Now, the decision of the Conference was to refer the matter of stores to a Committee.

*MR. R. W. DUFF: I must take exception to that statement. The Conference adopted the principle laid down by General Alderson that the Admiralty should make their own contracts for naval stores.

*LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: A Conference was appointed, and the Conference recommended that a Committee should be appointed, and the Committee arrived at the conclusion that the Admiralty should not make separate contracts so far as guns, gunpowder, projectiles, and other stores were concerned. In paragraph 10, page 4, the Committee distinctly recommends the very system now in force. The hon. Member laughs. Has he the smallest estimation of the quantity of stores which are not interchangeable. It is infinitesimal. What I have quoted is the result of the Conference appointed by the Board of Admiralty, to which the hon. Member belonged, and it is that at which the hon. Member laughs. I contend that the present Board has done identically what, if the hon. Member had been in office, he would have been compelled to do. The hon. Member went further and said there were certain members on the Board of Admiralty, notably Admiral Hopkins, who agreed in his view. The hon. Member is utterly in error. Admiral Hopkins is Controller of the Navy, and he entirely dissents from the hon. Member.

*MR. DUFF: I read his evidence in support of my views before Sir James Stephen's Commission.

*LORD G. HAMILTON: The hon. Member may have referred to his evidence, but as against that I had myself the advantage of a conversation with the Controller of the Navy this morning, and he said he entirely dissented from the view advanced by the hon. Gentleman, and for the reason I have stated, that the Admiralty would not undertake to order guns unless they had a special department for designs. The fact is, there are very few persons in this country who can design heavy guns. The hon. Member has so little idea of the difficulties attending the manufacture of guns that he proposes to put them on the same footing as the hulls of ships and machinery but there is all the difference in the world between the cases. If your engines do not come up to test, you can make a reduction in the amount of money paid to the contractor, and you still have ships which will be able to drive at a certain speed. If a hull is not satisfactory, the result probably will be that the vessel will go a knot or two less. But if a gun does not work it will in all probability burst, and then what is to be done?

MR. DUFF: Reject it.

LORD G. HAMILTON: Yes, but the rejection of the gun affects all the guns made on this principle, and the hon. Member does not appear to understand that. There is an insuperable difficulty in the way of establishing two designing Departments, one for the Army and one for the Navy, and, as a matter of fact, there is no alternative between the present system and the establishment of a separate Ordnance Department. It seems to be a great reflection upon this country that there should be a considerable number of ships waiting for their guns, and I can quite understand the hon. Gentleman's wish to make some practical suggestion by which the difficulties can be obviated, but it is quite clear his recommendation would aggravate the evil. There is not much difficulty in obtaining small guns, but we cannot entrust firms, who have had no experience, with the making of the heaviest ordnance. They must learn their business gradually. To go into the market for great guns might be to put into the hands of inexperienced firms the manufacture of guns which it is almost impossible to assume they could produce. As to the second part of the proposition, I quite agree with the hon. and gallant Member that we ought to do everything in our power to increase the sources of supply; but that is a work which must be done gradually. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War has been very successful in getting existing firms to extend their works, and also in getting fresh firms to undertake the business, and by distributing the work amongst different firms he has been able to get a considerably larger amount of work done during the past year than previously. It may interest the House to know what has been the delivery of guns during the past three years. There have been delivered to the Naval Service during the three years ending 1st April, 1889, 594 guns above 4-inch calibre; of the guns required to be delivered in the year 1889-90 there are 235 over 4-inch, all of which have been ordered. In addition to that, there are 269 guns which will be required before 1st April, 1891, if the shipbuilding proposals of the Government are assented to. It is estimated that all will be practically completed within two years, leaving only 48 incomplete at the end of that time. Past experience, however, should not make us over-sanguine that they will be delivered to the exact date named. I can assure the Committee that the Board of Admiralty are not in the slightest degree inclined to shirk the responsibility which legitimately attaches to them of supplying the Navy with guns; but they could not undertake the responsibility of designing them. If we had gone into the open market, there would have been two of us—ourselves and the War Department—competing against each other, and, in all probability, driving up prices. Many of the difficulties which have hitherto attended the manufacture and delivery of these guns are being solved, and I believe that, if we continued on the lines we are pursuing, we shall gradually surmount these difficulties, and, at the same time, improve our guns. I hope the House will, by a large majority, reject the proposals of the hon. Member, which would only aggravate the trouble we wish to cure.

*LORD C. BERESEFORD (Marylebone, E.): I quite agree with the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty as to the immense difficulty of the question, but I do not see why the difficulty should that they will be completed in due time. Passing from these special points, the noble Lord spoke of foreign and of English guns, and asked one or two questions concerning Messrs. Krupp's method and the time required in turning out a completed gun. Well, I have hope that we shall be able to better it here. We have every reason to believe that in our gun factories we can produce some guns, for instance the 9·2 inch, at a quicker rate than that mentioned by my noble Friend. My noble Friend asks several special questions about gun construction. He spoke of the erosion that occurs in our guns, and from which foreign guns are free.

*LORD C. BERESFORD: I beg pardon; I never said anything of the kind. There must always be erosion, no matter where manufactured. What I said was, we relieve our guns, which Foreign Governments did not do.

MR. E. STANHOPE: Then I need not refer to erosion, as to which I have several facts that show that it occurs often more largely in foreign-made guns than in our own. I have given much attention to a comparison between the guns in our service and those of France and Germany, and I have had caused a most careful comparison to be made between the guns of similar calibres in different services, their power of penetration by projectiles, and the general power of the guns; and the conclusion to which I venture to come after very close examination is that our guns are distinctly better than those of the French Service, and equal at least to the guns of the German Service. The noble Lord has asked me a question with respect to the ships which have unfortunately been without their guns in the past, and I am perfectly ready to give my noble Friend the information I possess with respect to the ships which were waiting for their guns as presented to Parliament last year. The first ship was the Collingwood, which now has four 12-inch guns on board. I am glad to say that in the case of the Howe, her four 13·5-inch guns will be in course of proof next month, and, therefore, ought to be on board at the end of April or the beginning of May. The guns of the Camperdown will be all delivered this month. The Anson has all her guns on board. The Undaunted has her two 9·2-inch guns complete.

Mr. E. Stanhope

The Australia has ten 6-inch guns on board, and two 9·2-inch guns have been received and are now probably on board. The Narcissus has ten 6-inch guns on board, and two 9·2-inch guns will be completed this month. In the case of the Galatea, I am sorry to say there has been a block. The 9·2-inch guns due from the Messrs. Whitworth and Cain have not been delivered, and I am afraid that they cannot be relied on till the 31st of August next; but ten 6-inch guns are on board. The Immortalité has all her guns on board. Therefore, all the ships which I have enumerated, with the exception of the Galatea, either have all their guns on board or will have them in a very short period. In addition to that, the Admiralty have brought forward two ships that were not on the above list—namely, the Victoria and the Sanspareil. In both of those cases we have had expedited the guns of the largest description—namely, the 16·25-inch. The Victoria's guns are ready and at proof; while those of the Sanspareil are mostly ready, and the biggest will be ready in April. I think I have now answered my noble Friend fully and satisfactorily as to all the ships which he has mentioned. If any additional questions are put I shall be glad to answer them also; but there is some difficulty in doing so until we get into Committee.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Main Question again proposed.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I have not much to say in reference to my Motion, which I am precluded from moving because I put forward my views at some length the other day on the Military Vote. The principle I then laid down and desire to press upon the House is, that we should have wholly in view the entire proposals of the Government and the expenditure the country will be called upon to incur for the whole system of defence proposed. I did not, on the last occasion, obtain that satisfactory answer I hoped for from Her Majesty's Government, and it seems to me all the more clear, since the debate the other night, that the Government are proceeding, by way of increasing the Services, bit by bit, without showing all their hand. Take, for instance, the question of barrack accommodation. It seems it is absolutely necessary there should be a complete review of barrack accommodation, and a re-organization at great expense will have to be undertaken. But this has not been included in the Estimates laid before us. There also ought to be a better organization of the Auxiliary Land and Marine Forces, and these might reasonably claim the funds that are necessary to make them thoroughly efficient. We are called upon by a few Votes to increase the Regular Forces of the Army and Navy; but the Government have not taken the nation into full confidence. As regards the Naval Estimates, the immediate subject of our consideration, we know that in the ordinary Votes there is a large increase, and we also know that a special Vote will be submitted for contracts for a large addition to the Navy, but we have not yet learned from the statement of the First Lord how that Navy is to be employed. I know that it is a large subject, the protection of our Colonies and commerce all over the world, and this will involve a large dispersion of our Naval Force. Then we have not heard what is to be the expenditure incurred on coast defence to meet danger at home. Some suggestions, it is true, have been dropped; for instance, that we are to rely a good deal upon sub-marine batteries. This is all very well as one of the incidents of coast defence, but I do not believe that this will afford security. When the Government come to tackle this question of coast defence, rely upon it, we shall find ourselves involved in grave additional expenditure. I want to know, if we agree to this great addition to the Navy, whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to rely on the Navy alone as a means of defence for the British coasts, or whether it is to be only the first line of defence, and that further expenditure will be necessary on coast defences? The other day, when I referred to this subject, the exposure of our shores to naval attack, the Under Secretary taunted me with having the desire to make Kirkcaldy a first-class military port. Now, I suggested nothing of the kind. But this I do believe—that if our coasts are to be made secure, it is absolutely necessary that we should incur considerable additional expense in each locality, and for ports all round the coast, by placing guns in position to protect those ports against occasional marauding attacks of hostile vessels. Guns, men, and matériel are required to meet such an unfortunate contingency; and I am forced to the conclusion that this naval expenditure is but the first line of defence, and I am unwilling to vote this large increase until we know what is the whole of the Government plan of defence. An important question is to be raised by the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), which very much dovetails with the remarks I would make. The Motion of which the right hon. Gentleman has given notice, and upon which he is not here just now to speak, has relation to what took place in the course of the Naval Manœuvres last year. What I understand the right hon. Gentleman wishes to know is, do Her Majesty's Government, by the series of sham attacks on defenceless towns, mean to recognize that it is part of the system of legitimate warfare that towns should be attacked, bombarded, burned, and sacked, or laid under contribution? It seems very like it. We remember how the town of Greenock was subjected to a sham attack during the hours of Divine Service on a Sunday morning. I think, in relation to the subject of coast defence, we should know what are the views of Her Majesty's Government on this matter, and I think it is a little unfortunate that the Naval Authorities should by their action have suggested that this is the kind of thing to be done. If Her Majesty's Government are satisfied that, in the opinion of civilized Europe, these attacks on unprotected towns are within the rights of a belligerent, I do not see how large additional expenditure on coast defence is to be avoided, and I claim from the Government a complete exposé of the defensive scheme they would propose.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Supply—considered in the Committee.

NAVY SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

(1.) £45,000, Miscellaneous Services.

NAVY ESTIMATES.

(2.) 65,400 Men and Boys, including 14,000 Marines, for Sea and Coast Guard Services.

(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

*LORD C. BERESFORD (Marylebone, E.): I desire to bring to the notice of the Committee a case in which I myself take great interest, and in which the whole Service takes great interest—that is to say, the case of the engineers of the Royal Navy. In the Naval Service it is very hard for any class of officers and men to get their grievances brought before the country and the Admiralty, as an instance of which I need only refer to the question as to the pay of lieutenants which occurred whilst I was at the Admiralty. The lieutenants in the Service knew that there was no way of getting their grievances brought before the Admiralty except by getting it mentioned in Parliament. No doubt these officers for a large number of years were suffering under a considerable grievance, and they had a right to expect that those whose duty it was to watch their interests at the Admiralty should take their case in hand. But years went on and nothing at all was done. I draw attention to this matter, because it is very likely that the same thing will happen with regard to the engineers, who merely ask that they shall receive the same pay as others of the same rank in the Service—as paymasters and doctors. No doubt the doctors are a very able body of officers, and no doubt also the paymasters perform a very useful function, but there is no parallel between these classes and the engineers. Every officer who takes his ship into action wants to win, and if there is one man more than another who can help him in his desire, it is the man in charge of the engine-room. In the old days it was the seaman that did the most for you, but now it is the engineer who has charge of the engines and in some cases who has charge of the heavy machinery which enables you to fire and load your gun. I certainly think the time has come when the case of these officers should be carefully thought out at the Admiralty. I am satisfied that those who belong to the medical and Paymaster's branches will be the first to acknowledge that their branches are not such as to enable a commander to win an action, and are not of the same importance as the duties of the engineer. Now the engineers in this matter have done nothing contrary to the regulations of the Service. They have awakened to the fact that their position is not what it should be, and I trust that their case will receive attention to-night, as it is one of great merit. I trust the time will soon arrive when ships' companies will be constituted in such a manner as to be adapted to modern requirements, and one of the first things to be done it seems to me is to put the engineers in their proper place—to pay them and give them rank according to their duties. If I do not receive a satisfactory answer from my noble Friend at the head of the Admiralty, I shall be obliged to take other measures to secure one.

*MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I beg very cordially to support what has fallen from the noble Lord as to the engineers, and I must say I am very much surprised at no answer having been given the other day by the noble Lord at the head of the Admiralty to a question asked by the hon. Member for Portsmouth, who asked if he would grant a Committee to consider the case of the engineer officers. The noble Lord is reported to have said—

"I am not aware that great dissatisfaction exists among the officers of the engineer's branch of the Royal Navy as regards their rank and emolument, neither has any representation to that effect been made to me through the proper channels of communication."

I am surprised at that answer, as I myself put a question of the same nature last Session. In regard to the statement that no representation has been made to the Admiralty through the proper channels of communication I am at a loss to know what more proper channel of communication there could be for the grievances of these gentlemen than that of bringing them to the attention of the Government through their representatives in this House. It cannot be to the interest of the Service that a large body of officers of this kind should have any grievance unredressed and uninquired into. The duties and responsibilities of these men have enormously increased during the last 20 years, and there is now scarcely anything connected with the management of a man-of-war in which their services are not absolutely indispensable. No doubt the duties of doctors and paymasters are important, but when you compare these gentlemen with the engineers it must be admitted that the latter have every right to equality as to rank and pay. I am informed that the maximum pay of an engineer officer of the Royal Navy afloat is 22s. a-day as against 33s. in the case of a medical officer of the same rank. If that is so, I think it is an inequality which should be redressed. As to rank there were certainly some concessions made in 1886, but I believe that the engineers feel it rather a worthless and invidious distinction, being allowed to rank with, but after, officers of the Medical Service.

*ADMIRAL MAYNE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest): I think, looking at the numberless engines we now put into our ships, everyone must admit the immense importance of the functions of the engineers. Their case, and that also of the engine room artificers, should be considered by the Government, and I hope now that Her Majesty's Fleet is about to be so largely increased, that attention will be paid to these classes. Then with regard to another most valuable part of the Service—I mean the signal men—I am glad to see that some notice has been taken of them. The signal men of the present day may be said to be second only in importance to the engineers in so far as taking the ship into action is concerned. The Admiral and the Captain of each ship must depend upon the signalman, and nowadays the signalman has, for his class, to be a highly-educated man. I trust that when the school for the training of signalmen is established it will be started on a liberal scale, and that not only signalling, but telegraphy, will be taught, as it is extremely important that some of these men should be able to read off messages and transmit messages on shore—say in an enemy's country.

COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness): No doubt the noble Lord knows enough about the Naval Service to appreciate the importance of this subject of signalling. The method of signalling in the Navy at the present time is precisely that which was in use a century and a-half ago. It was an admirable method, no doubt, in former times, when fleets moved comparatively slowly, but I believe it is altogether inadequate to carry out the wishes and views of Naval Commanders at the present time when ships are in action. It may be said that it is little use pointing out a difficulty unless at the same time a method is suggested for getting over it. Well, my view is that semaphores placed at the mast-head might be very advantageously employed. Some attention was given to this matter in 1887, and I think the matter is worthy of closer investigation, and probably the noble Lord will be good enough to broach the subject to his naval advisers. Another point of some importance is that of the steaming lights carried to mark the ship's position at night. I am informed that in the merchant service the electric light is used with very good results, and I would suggest to the noble Lord that experiments should be tried in Her Majesty's Navy to see whether electricity could not with advantage replace the miserable oil lamps at present in use. Another matter I should like to mention is that collisions are often caused by the reluctance of young officers to alter the course of the vessel in good time, because altering the course is looked upon with great dislike by the captain, and is extremely inconvenient for the purpose of navigation. Therefore a young officer is very apt to maintain his course to the last possible moment. When I first took charge of a ship as first officer of the watch I did not know the simplest rule of the road, but as I happened by accident to answer correctly the simplest question in the whole code, which was the one put to me by the captain, I was allowed to take charge of the ship. That which occurred in my own case, I know, from my experience in examining young officers, happens now, and young officers are often extraordinarily ignorant of the rules of the road. I would strongly recommend the First Lord of the Admiralty to insist upon a stricter inquiry being made into their fitness to undertake responsible and important duties. It would be worth while, I think, to inquire also whether corrosion has taken place in the condensers of other ships beside the Thunderer. With regard to the personnel of the Navy, I would draw attention to the fact that a very large number of boys, who bear an excellent character up to the time of their reaching the age of 18, lapsed during the next four or five years, into the most indifferent character, and create in that time a very considerable percentage of the "crime," or rather offences in the Navy. They could be kept in better discipline if they were for a time rated as "second-class ordinary seamen." Boys in the Navy are kept under strict discipline, but men in the Navy are not, and I think it would be of great advantage both to men and boys if stricter discipline were maintained amongst the second-class ordinary seamen. That is one of the greatest blots on our system, as it is at the ages of from 18 to 22 or 23 that our young seamen stand most in need of strict discipline, and when a large percentage of the offences committed by our sailors are perpetrated. I have begun with the lowest class of our blue-jackets—the boys—and will now turn to the highest. The difficulty we have experienced for many years is the difficulty of getting suitable men to rate as petty officers. During recent years I have not unfrequently seen men made petty officers who were not at all suited to the position, simply because there was no one else to take. In my opinion the real character of the petty officer comes out better when you see him discharging the disagreeable, slow, and monotonous duties he has to perform on board a man-of-war. It is that that tries the character of the man, and shows whether he is worth much or little; and not when he is under the exceptional excitement and advantages of active service. I must say that I think it greatly to be regretted that we cannot get, upon the whole, better men than we now have for such positions. In my opinion the advantages now held out are not sufficient, I will not say, to secure the best men, but to persuade the men to keep up to the standard required in those who are made petty officers. I would suggest to my noble Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty that it would, at any rate, be worth his while to take into consideration whether he cannot decrease the number of grades amongst the petty officers and at the same time increase the advantages held out to them. One of the attractions offered is a rating which is now totally useless. It was originally given to men who were specially superior in matters of seamanship; but there is no advantage in maintaining it now. They were not originally intended to be made petty officers, but owing to a certain superiority they exhibited they were called on to do duty as petty officers. My idea is that it would better if the grades were reduced to two, and the advantages were made more substantial than they now are. Under existing circumstances, if we rate a man as a petty officer and he is found to be unsuitable, we cannot disrate him and put him back into his original rank without blasting his career; and this I regard as very unsatisfactory. It is always difficult to tell how a man will turn out, and captains are very slow to ruin a man's prospects by taking away a rating to which he has been promoted. There ought to be some method of trying a man before he is put into a higher grade, and I shall be very glad if my noble Friend can see his way, at any rate, to make inquiry into the matter. I scarcely know whether I should be in order in passing from this general survey to the question of rations. I think I notice that you, Sir, hesitate to permit this, and, therefore, I will reserve what I have to say on that subject for a future occasion. I will merely add that the four subjects I have brought under the attention of the Committee, and which I am afraid must be regarded as of a somewhat technical character, are matters which I trust will receive the consideration of my noble Friend.

*Mr. R. W. DUFF (Banffshire): I have only one or two questions to ask upon this Vote. I am glad to see from the statement that the First Lord of the Admiralty proposes to increase the number of stokers. The personnel of the Navy is apparently weak in stokers, and, therefore, it is well there should be an increase in that class. I see it is also proposed to add another 1,100 Marines, but I notice in the Estimate that only £18,000 represents the increase in the Marine Vote, and I wish to know if that amount will cover the cost of the proposed increase in the force? I also should like to know whether any of these Marines are to be added to the artillery branch?

*LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: No.

*MR. DUFF: Then we are told in the noble Lord's statement that the number of seamen has been increased, but I see that there is to be a decrease of 555 in the number of boys. I dare say that that is quite capable of explanation, but on the face of it, it hardly seems natural, for one would expect to find, with an increase in the number of men, a proportionate increase in the number of boys. I do not want to offer any opposition to this Vote, but I should be glad to have some information on these points.

*MR. DE LISLE (Leicestershire, Mid.): I would like to say a few words in support of the request put forward by the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone, and supported by my hon. Friend the Member for Pembroke, that the Admiralty should give serious consideration to the claims of engineer officers. It seems difficult, I admit, for men having no practical experience or knowledge of the Navy to speak on this matter, but I take it that owing to the development of scientific warfare, the responsibilities of this branch of the service have greatly increased, and it is curious to note that the number of engineers has been diminished, while their pay is apparently not at all commensurate with the importance of their duties. I would like to ask how it is that there are 178 engineers down in the Effective Vote, and 220 on retired pay? I cannot understand that at all. I do not think it is a wise move on the part of the Government to reduce the number of engineers, and I have a shrewd suspicion that if the whole truth concerning the Navy could be placed before us—if we could have the evidence of responsible officers such as is placed before the Board of Admiralty, we should see that there is a very different state of things in the Navy, especially so far as its personnel is concerned, from that which is now laid before us, and we should see also that the condition of things is far from satisfactory. I have heard from a good many officers that the number of officers for Service in the Navy is far from adequate, and scarcely sufficient for its proper working; that, if some of our ships should be engaged in action, and there should be a considerable loss of officers, many of our vessels would, as a consequence, be hopelessly undermanned. In regard to the engineers, I think that the number should not only be ample, but that the pay should be sufficiently remunerative, and I hope that the First Lord of the Admiralty will give us an assurance that something will be done, not only to increase the pay, but to place the status of these officers on a satisfactory basis. At present, so far as I can understand, the seniority which they are supposed to possess is more fictitious than real, and, seeing that these officers practically have the working of the ships in their hands, it is time that this matter was attended to. In the mercantile marine these officers are especially well paid. I should like to know whether it is a fact that when the Russian scare of 1878 occurred, and it was found necessary to increase the number of our engineer officers, we were obliged to pay them higher rates than were received by the engineers already in the service of the Navy? If so, I think that is a most unsatisfactory state of things. I hope the time will shortly arrive when the First Lord of the Admiralty will be able to state to the country the actual opinions of his advisers, not only with regard to the Navy, but with regard to the number of ships and the necessary ordnance to make them effective. Comparing the statements which we have had from the Front Bench during the last three years with that which we had presented to us the other night, it seems to me impossible to believe that we have had before us an adequate representation of the knowledge as to the Navy which is in the possession of the representatives of the Admiralty. The statements of those three years are glaringly inconsistent with the one made this year. I desire, of course, to acknowledge to the fullest degree the admirable advances which have been made under the present administration of the Admiralty; but, bearing in mind the assurances we received a year ago, that the country was safely defended by the existing Navy, and comparing that statement with this year's, I think there is cause for the grave suspicion that, if we knew the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, instead of our being asked to vote an extra eleven millions, which it really comes to and which we shall willingly do, we should probably find it necessary to vote an even larger sum, perhaps 20 millions besides the ordinary average yearly expenditure, to meet the requirements of complete and, humanly speaking, adequate national defence.

*LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I can assure my hon. Friend that I and my colleagues do give the House the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, and if my hon. Friend had reserved his charge as to this until we have the full discussion of the naval programme, I think he would have arrived at the conclusion that there is no discrepancy between what I propose now and the statement I made last year. An observation, which all who have ever been entrusted with naval administration will endorse, is, "do not attach too much importance to the outlay of individual years, but look rather to the results." It is not the expenditure on ships which are incomplete, or upon men not trained, which has an effect. When war breaks out, it is the number of ships that are complete, and the number of men ready for service, and if my hon. Friend will tear that little maxim in mind, I think he will find hereafter that there is no discrepancy between the statements I have made in the past, and those I hope the House will accept in the future. Now, there have been a number of questions put to me with reference to matter of detail. My hon. Friend the Member for Holderness made a very able speech on a highly technical point, and I have derived considerable information from the suggestions he has made. They shall have my very careful consideration. Almost every naval officer who has studied the subject of tactics attaches supreme importance to having an adequate and thoroughly efficient signalling staff, for in these days of rapid motion the great difficulty will be to obtain accurate information concerning the enemy, and to keep in touch with his movements.

Therefore, anything that can improve our system of signalling and telegraphing is worthy of our closest attention. As to several other questions on smaller points, I am not prepared with the necessary information to enable me to answer them now. I may say, there is no doubt that a considerable proportion of what is called naval crime occurs among men between the ages of 18 and 23, and if we are able to substitute barracks for floating ships, I believe there will be a great improvement in discipline among these men. The main question, which has been raised to-night, has related to the status and pay of engineer officers. I quite agree with my noble Friend the Member for Marylebone in his estimate of the value of the services of these officers, and in his opinion as to the necessity of having a thoroughly efficient body of them, but my hon. Friends must recollect that I have to look at this question from two points of view. I am bound to see that the men are adequately remunerated; and I am equally bound to see if the Navy can be well supplied at existing rates, that an undue charge is not put on the taxpayer by more highly remunerating any one particular class of men. There is no question but that we can obtain any number of young engineer officers, and a remarkable feature about the supply is that a large, if not by far the larger, proportion of those who wish to enter the Service are sons of engineer officers, and that is sufficient, in my opinion, to justify our refusal to increase the pay. I have looked carefully into the matter of their emolument, and I must say it compares favourably with the case of those who occupy similar positions of responsibility in the Mercantile Marine; and while purely combative officers in the Royal Navy are not paid better than those in the Navies of France and Germany, the rate of pay of engineer officers is higher than that received by the engineer branches in these foreign Navies. With these facts before me, I feel justified in not assenting to this proposal for an increased rate of pay, and, in saying this, I am expressing the views of the Board of Admiralty. My hon. Friend who spoke last seemed to think that there were serious deficiencies in the personnel of the Navy. May I remind him of one fact, that at the time of the manoeuvres every available ship was engaged, and all the vessels in the Navy which were commissioned at the time had their full complement, or ought to have had their full complement of men as in time of war. Therefore, whatever deficiencies there were during the manœuvres, they represented deficiencies which would exist in time of war, and so far as our ships were concerned, those deficiencies were not at all serious except as regards the stokers. We were somewhat short of them, and not only that, but many of them were badly trained. This is a matter we are looking into. A large number of men were brought in of somewhat indifferent physique and with but little knowledge of the duties they were called upon to perform. They were put on board new ships with complicated machinery, and under very trying circumstances had to perform their duties for the first time. I have not the slightest doubt that to this fact may be attributed the circumstances that during the first few days of the manœuvres many of our ships failed to reach the estimated speed which was expected from them. I propose to take on a considerable additional number of stokers this year, and if every year we have manœuvres on a large scale, it is clear that each year a large proportion of these stokers will have the best of training, because training in sea-going vessels is incomparably superior to training on board vessels in harbour. I hope in this way gradually to surmount the difficulty, and I hope also to be able, in the course of the next year or two, to largely augment the number of stokers belonging to the Naval Reserve. They are a class different from the stokers of Mercantile Marine, but they have the best of training, and if we can by the payment of a small maintenance fee get several hundreds, or perhaps two or three thousand upon our lists, we shall then have a valuable reserve of men, a large proportion of whom we should always be able to lay our hands upon in the case of emergency. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Banffshire asked me two or three questions. The first was with regard to the proposed increase of 1,100 in the marine force, and as to what he thinks is an insufficient provision in the Estimates for them, but I may explain that all these men are not to be added at once, and this fact will account for the small amount of money asked for for their pay. I think I have now answered all the questions which have been put to me.

MR. DE LISLE: There is the pay of the engineer officers.

*LORD G. HAMILTON: I think my right hon. Friend will admit that there are conclusive reasons against increasing the pay.

*LORD C. BERESFORD (Marylebone, E.): I am sorry to obtrude myself upon the Committee again, but there are a great number of important questions connected with the officers and men of the Fleet, and this is the only opportunity I shall have of discussing them. If the claims of the officers and men are not discussed now they will be put off for another year. Therefore I hope I shall not be considered obstructive if I call attention to some important points somewhat in detail. I think it is very hard for hon. Gentlemen who have been sent here as supporters of Her Majesty's Government—and for my own part I do support Her Majesty's Government—to be told at the last moment "There is no time to consider these matters; we want the money." I say that that sort of thing cannot go on. I do not care which Government is in power [Ministerial Cries of "Oh!"] Well, I do care which Government is in power, but for the sake of my argument it is a matter of indifference. Unfortunately it is the usual practice to slur these questions over, and to keep out of sight everything connected with the Navy. The mind of the public has been tremendously exercised upon the question of guns, but the strength and safety of the Fleet and the training of the men composing it are now intangible matters, and are, therefore, likely to be overlooked, although far more important questions. In the same way, the Secretary of State for War brings forward the question of barracks. We can see them, and know that they are unhealthy, but we cannot see the strength of the Army. It is necessary that they should say something about these matters, and I always like to say, in this House, what I think—not that I mean to maintain that I am always right. In the first place, there is the case of the signalmen. What we want are the very best signalmen, and the best arrangement for signalling we can possibly get. All nations, I am glad to say, are badly off in this respect, but other nations pay more attention to signalling than we do, devote a good deal more time to experiments and practice in signalling than this country. Signalmen form the line of communication, and upon the way in which they discharge their work the fate of a naval engagement may often depend. When I was at the Admiralty, the Board objected to everything. One member of the old Board is there yet, and I have no doubt that he still continues to object. The question of signalling is one which ought to be put to the fleet at sea, so that you should get their ideas. A signalman ought to be attached to every coastguard station, and he ought to be taught telegraphy, and placed, by means of the telegraph, in contact with the head of the Intelligence Department in Whitehall. More attention should be paid to the training of these signalmen, and they ought to be better paid and granted better rank.

*LORD G. HAMILTON: That has been done.

*LORD C. BERESFORD: My noble Friend says that has been done. What I want is, that men at sea should be instructed to send home their ideas. Prevention is better than cure, and you ought to have signalmen who will know exactly what to do whatever may occur. Then, again, there is the case of the stokers. I am sorry that I am compelled to bring these questions forward, and I can assure the Committee it is not with any desire of being obstructive. The whole of the engine-room department, in my opinion, wants reforming altogether. My noble Friend says, "You can get plenty of men; why, then, should you give more wages?" No doubt that is a fair argument; but what did the doctors do? They closed the whole of their schools against the Navy, and the result was that the Medical Service of the Navy was smashed up by the ring thus created. My noble Friend now proposes to do with the engineers what he did with the lieutenants. He says there is no necessity for paying these men according to the value of their work, because you can get plenty of them. I do not think that is a good argument. What is wanted is fair play, and the engineers should be put in position whether the supply is plentiful or not. I am sorry to think that the Government should unnecessarily invite the formation of a ring or a combination of discontented men in the Service. The stokers in the Navy have not been adequately trained. That was made manifest in the recent manoeuvres, and my noble Friend has confessed that last year the Fleet could not do what it was expected to do, because stokers were not ready. It is necessary in this country that we should be ready for any emergency at a moment's notice. We may lose our Empire unless every little detail is attended to. Instead of the stokers being trained in other and less important matters, they ought in time of peace to be thoroughly taught to do what would be their work in time of war. The whole system of training both bluejackets and stokers requires to be entirely altered. While at the Admiralty I was continually pointing out the extravagance and inutility of training men in a time of peace to do what they would not be required to do in a time of war. The men you get are no fools. You have only to teach them what they have to do, and they will do their level best to do it. I do not know how my noble Friend will get over that argument. Then there is the question of the Marines. My noble Friend says that he is going to increase the strength of the Marines. I am glad to hear it. Our coaling stations ought to be under the Admiralty and garrisoned by Marines. This would be done more efficiently than by ordinary soldiers, and Marines being long-service men, it would also be more economical, saving the expense of chartering ships for the purpose of bringing home detachments of ordinary Line regiments. I should like to see a Committee appointed to inquire into this subject of the garrisons. I am afraid you would soon find out that things are not as you think they are. The hon. and gallant Member for the Holderness Division (Commander Bethell) has spoken of the trouble into which the seamen get who were between boyhood and manhood. I think he was a little too hard upon them.

COMMANDER BTHELL: I did not blame them.

*LORD C. BERESFORD: There was a time in my life when I was fond of a row. I would not give a fig for a man who has not the pluck to get into a row. The boys who had the pluck to be always in a pickle were the best in the school. I sincerely hope that the House will not regard the bluejacket as a bad character. If I was asked to pick out a gentleman I should select a bluejacket. He is one of the best men I can imagine. He may not wear fine clothes, but he has all the qualities that make a gentleman, and I am sure the First Lord will support me in saying that the personnel of the British Navy is better now than it has ever been in its history. No doubt there are bad characters on board ship as well as good, and the greatest trouble we have on the lower deck is in dealing with these bad characters. When we can get the services of bluejackets at an early age, and insure them a pension of £30 or more when they retire at the age of 48, we are able to secure the very best men in the country; and I do not see why we should burden such men in their messes with bad characters. Send all the bad characters out of the Service; or do as the German Army does. The Germans have a really splendid Army; but in Germany a man who has been in prison is not allowed to join the Army, but in case of war he is compelled to cart food about, and to do the dirty work of the Army. When I was in command of the Thunderer there were 18 habitual "break-leaves," who were nothing but a burden to their messmates, and were perpetually grumbling. I called them up and addressed them. They were treated kindly but firmly; and in the course of eight months there were only seven left out of the 18. That shows that the men will always support you if you show that you have their interest at heart. As to the seven men, I am bound to say that they were a curse to the ship; and no kindness or civility would do them any good. The best thing is to turn such men out of the Navy altogether. If my noble Friend will get rid of the bad men in the Navy, he will do a great deal to aid the officers in their work, and at the same time confer an enormous benefit on the men. I hope my noble Friend will be able to show that he is prepared to add to the Fleet the necessary number of officers, for, at the present time, there is a deficiency of something like 300 lieutenants. The present system of educating officers is very faulty. Both the German and the French systems are better than our own. In these days of steam and exact accuracy of the gun the first aim is to knock off the head of the captain you are fighting. [A Laugh.] That may sound somewhat laughable; but what will win an action is first, speed, then the helm, and third the head of the enemy's captain. The head of the enemy's captain is the most important; and in all foreign Navies that is recognized. It certainly ought to be the object. Consequently it is important that young officers should be thoroughly trained so that, if such a thing happens, they may be prepared at a moment's notice to take command of the ship. That ought to be one of the principal points in the education of a naval officer. I hope the noble Lord will think of the matters I have mentioned. I am certain they will have to be done eventually, and why should they not be done now, when the noble Lord is proposing this most necessary addition to the Fleet, of which I hope the House of Commons will approve?

*ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): I only propose to trespass upon the attention of the Committee for a very few moments, and I regret that I was unable to offer a few observations before the First Lord replied to the first speakers. I should like, in the first place, to refer to the question of the pay of the engineers which has been alluded to. I think there is great inconvenience in bringing forward questions affecting the pay of individual classes in the Service. I do not regard it as part of my duty in this House to advocate increase of pay for any class. That responsibility belongs to the Admiralty. All that I can hope to do is to draw attention to the subject, and ask the Admiralty to consider it, and take the advice of some Departmental or outside Committee upon it. I regret that the hon. Member for Faversham (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) drew a comparison between the case of the doctors and that of the engineers. My own object in rising is to draw attention to another class—the lieutenants. I feel strongly that their case is a very hard one. Their claim has been met with one hand, but taken away with the other.

The pay of the lieutenants has been increased, for lieutenants of eight and 12 years' standing on condition, that the first named should have had three years' service in a ship of war at sea, and the latter six years. The Admiralty do not appear to have taken into account that it is hardly fair to double the sea service for four years' seniority only. If three years are sufficient for lieutenants of eight years' service, six years must be wrong for 12 years' service. Four or four and a-half years ought to be quite sufficient. I hope that the Admiralty will take the matter into consideration, and any relaxation of the conditions would be regarded by the older officers as a great boon. I really think it is worth while to make some attempt to satisfy this most deserving class of officers who are serving now as lieutenants, and in all probability will obtain no higher rank. There is another question which earnestly demands attention. Lieutenants are deeply distressed at the way in which they are treated in respect of leave. Many of them complain of the gross breach of faith committed towards them by those in authority. When a lieutenant comes home he is entitled, in the ordinary course of things, to six weeks' leave; but frequently, owing to the dearth of lieutenants, he is ordered off again in a fortnight. Leave is looked upon by lieutenants as of the greatest importance, even of as much importance as pay and rank. Certainly, if men are deprived of leave, as lieutenants are, they ought to be given consideration in the form of pay. My hon. and gallant Friend the Member for the Holderness Division (Commander Bethell) has spoken of the rating of leading seamen. I look upon leading seamen, especially for small vessels, as most valuable men, and I do not agree with his proposal to abolish the rating. As to the question of signalling, I heartily concur in the remarks made by the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone. I believe that the question of connecting all the coastguard stations of the country with the Admiralty is now ripe for settlement. I trust that some effort will be made to bring about the connection. My attention has been called elsewhere to the importance of raising the status of engine-room artificers when in charge of torpedo or gun boats. I think there is something in their contention that when they are in charge of vessels, and absolutely doing the duty of engineers, warrant rank should be conceded to them. As to stokers, I think that it is extremely desirable that their training should be improved. You have already a school at hand. Why not double the number of stokers on the Indian troopers? That would be about the very best training ground you could possibly have. Then, again, I share my noble Friend's view as to the garrisoning of certain coaling stations with Marines. I advocated this in the House last year, and I still think that there would be a great advantage in having Marines there under the orders of the Admiral in charge of the station. My noble Friend referred to the education of naval officers, and advocated a change in that education. I am fully in accord with my noble Friend when he says that the education of naval officers is a most important matter, but I cannot agree with him as to the advisability of changing it.

*LORD CHARLES BERESFORD : The Committee recommended it.

*ADMIRAL FIELD : If my noble Friend is in accord with the recommendation of the Committee, then I withdraw my remarks. I will not trespass further upon the attention of the Committee, but will only, in conclusion, again draw the attention of the First Lord of the Admiralty to the grievances, especially, of the lieutenants of the Navy.

CAPTAIN PRICE (Devonport) : Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a few observations as to the steam branch of the Navy, and am glad that the subject has been raised already by a civilian, inasmuch as we who are connected with Dockyard constituencies are often accused of partiality when we deal with these topics. My hon. and gallant Friend (Admiral Field) has taken the highly Constitutional view that the grievances of naval men ought to be examined by Departmental Committees. That is perfectly true, and that is exactly what has been done; but, unfortunately, the recommendations of Committees are not acted upon by the Admiralty. An hon. and gallant Friend who sits opposite asked a question the other day, and the answer he got was that various Committees had been appointed to report as to the steam branch of the Navy, and that effect has been given to their recommendations. I traverse that statement entirely. I complain that the recommendations of these Committees have not been given effect to in many ways which I might mention. Now, I have known the engineer branch of the Service since 1855. I have seen its growth and development, and I have no hesitation in saying that its duties and responsibilities have increased enormously. Undoubtedly there have been improvements made in the position of the men; but neither the pay nor the position is by any means proportionate to the increase and development of the duties and responsibilities of this branch of the Navy. The engineers are greatly aggrieved that the recommendations of the various Committees have not been carried out in respect to their rank. Then there is the question of messing. The late Mr. Ward Hunt, when First Lord of the Admiralty, took the matter into consideration, and promised great improvement. Certainly great improvement has been effected, but as yet the engineers are not allowed the right of messing with the other officers of a ship at the Naval College at Greenwich. This is felt to be a great hardship. Allusion has been made to the rating of the engine-room artificers. The word "rating" conveys very little idea to the House of what is meant by it. Artificers are really not so much assistants to the engineer officers, but to a great extent substitutes for them. Some years ago we very largely reduced the number of engineer officers and introduced the rating of engine-room artificers, who do actually the very duties performed by engineer officers. For that reason artificers are in a position of great responsibility. My hon. and gallant Friend (Admiral Field) thinks that in some cases they might be rated as warrant officers. I go farther than he has gone, and think that after a certain term of service the rating of warrant officers ought to be granted to all these men. Now, with regard to stokers. It has been said that we are very short indeed of stokers, a most important branch of the Service. I think there is one way in which the number of stokers might be increased, and increased at very little expense to the Service. It has been remarked that there is a great difficulty found in forming a reserve of stokers; but I do not know the reason for it at all. Some years ago I had the temerity to suggest in the House a way of strengthening the Navy generally. I think, if it could be done, an interchangeability so to speak, between the Navy and the merchant service ought to be encouraged. The way in which we do that at present is to form a reserve consisting of men in the merchant service, who, when called for, are obliged to come for service in the Navy. The suggestion I made some time ago was that a certain number of bluejackets in the Navy should be allowed to go on leave into the merchant service, receiving, of course, their pay from that service. I do not wish to go into that matter now, because there are certain objections raised to it, but I do not think the same objections could be raised in the case of stokers. The stokers would be paid by the merchant service, and the only expense borne by the Naval Vote would be the prospective portion of pension, because it is necessary that the time the men spent in the merchant service should count in the fixing of the men's pensions. The result would be that we would have at least 500 men in the merchant service always available to be called upon in time of need. There is another matter connected with the discipline of the service which I desire to mention. It is a small matter, but nevertheless a sore one—namely, the question of saluting warrant officers. There are certain men in the Service who cannot attain to the rank of warrant officers—men in the position of ships' stewards and others—and it is considered rather hard that these men should be obliged to salute warrant officers when they meet them on shore. Practically warrant officers spring from the same rank in society as ships' stewards, and it is not the latter's fault that they cannot attain to the rank of warrant officers.

*SIR JOHN COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): I should like to say I hope the Admiralty will press the Treasury to give them what is really necessary to establish a proper system of barrack accommodation for the Royal Navy. The very defect pointed out by my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for and others in the Service should receive, we must have some regard to the rates at which men in similar positions are paid in other employ—say, in the Mercantile Service. The highest pay in mercantile vessels for engineers and in ships that are continually crossing the Atlantic is £300 a-year, while engineers in the Royal Navy can rise in pay—including emoluments—to £600; so I think it must be said that the engineers in the Navy are reasonably and fairly dealt with. As regards rank there is a difficulty. At present engineers rank with, but after, lieutenants. If they were accorded equal rank absolutely with lieutenants a difficulty might arise which naval men will appreciate. It might so happen that a lieutenant might be called upon, through the death of a superior officer, to take command of a ship, yet if the suggestion of putting engineers upon an equality with lieutenants were followed out, we might find that the engineer, was the senior officer of the ship. That might be the ridiculous position in which the ship would be placed if the question of relative rank were pushed to its extreme limit as suggested. We are perfectly alive to the necessity of increasing the number of officers, and if my noble Friend will refer to the Estimates he will find that subordinate officers have been increased in number by 141, namely, 65 midshipmen, 18 clerks, and 58 Naval cadets. This increase will go in the subordinate ranks until they are sufficient. Then my hon. and gallant Friend (Admiral Field) has referred to the question of lieutenants. It will be observed that for the past 12 months the position and pay of lieutenants have been improved at the cost of something like £18,300 a year to the nation, and that I think is fair testimony to the consideration shown by the Board to lieutenants in the Service. I do not know that there are any other matters to deal with. I may just mention that communication between coast-guard stations has been carried out to a considerable extent, and that considerable sums of money have been taken for putting up the necessary semaphores.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): The noble Lord opposite (Lord Charles Beresford), to whom we all listen with so much interest on naval affairs, resigned his position in the Admiralty because in his opinion sufficient attention was not paid to the Intelligence Department of the Navy, and I wish to call attention to a point which illustrates the position he took. In other countries, I understand, and especially in Germany, there is to be found at the Admiralty, as at the War Office, an elaborate Intelligence Department, and in this Intelligence Department there are plans of campaign adapted to every variety of circumstances, and the consequence is, that if war breaks out, say between Germany and another Power, every captain of a German war ship sails with sealed orders giving him directions what to do under these or those circumstances, and it is possible for those at the head of affairs by simply telegraphing a single cipher word to all their stations to direct what steps should be taken, where vessels should rendezvous, and what they are to do. Nothing of the kind exists at our Admiralty. We are absolutely without any plans of campaign, and if war were to suddenly break out, we should find our Fleet scattered over the face of the globe, and probably be unable to utilize it before the war would be over. This is what the noble Lord complained of. A question which I put the other day will illustrate the great importance of this to the honour and interest of the country, and it arises out of occurrences in Samoa. I called attention the other day by question to an account given by Mr. Stevenson, the well-known writer of events in that Island. I asked, among other things, if it was true that a British subject—an artist—had been forcibly seized on board a British vessel by German authorities, and taken on board a German war steamer, and had only been released after the commander of a British man-of-war in the neighbourhood had emphasized his demand by clearing his decks for action. I was told by the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs that it was quite true that a British subject had been so seized, but the right hon. Gentleman said he did not know whether it was a fact that the British commander had cleared his decks for action. Since I received that answer, I have been supplied with some further information, from which it appears that H.M.S. Lizard was at Samoa, and the captain in consequence Admiralty should instruct their commanders to make a definite and immediate Report upon circumstances which come under their notice, and seem to tend against British interests. It could hardly do much to embarrass the Government, and it might be of enormous importance to all our commerce there, not only with Australia, but the whole Pacific, and British subjects should be able to feel themselves in the position of being sure of the protection of those from whom they might naturally claim it. I am quite sure that the noble Lord himself is most desirous that British interests should be protected.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): After your ruling, Sir, to the effect that it is competent for any hon. Member to bring on any question affecting the conduct of any officer whose pay comes out of this Vote, I would ask whether I am entitled to bring on a subject, of which I have given notice in a Motion, but which I was not able to move? It affects the conduct of several officers employed in the Naval Manœuvres last year, and whose pay comes within the Vote now before the House. What I desire to bring under notice is the conduct of officers who went about executing pretended raids upon unprotected towns, and levying pretended requisitions upon the inhabitants of those towns.

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not think that question is relevant to the Vote; it appears to me to be a question of policy, and the right hon. Gentleman's remarks should be directed to the Admiralty Vote.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Then I will take the opportunity to bring the question forward upon the Admiralty Vote, No. 13.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I will only detain the House a few minutes with the Motion of which I have given notice. A Conservative paper, a few days ago, challenged any Radical Member of Parliament to point out how a single sixpence might be saved in the Estimates for the Services. I am not unwilling to take up that challenge. I hold in my hand the Naval List for the current month. There I find the Royal yacht Osborne, 1,850 tons, has the following complement of superior officers—namely, a commander, 2 lieutenants, a staff commander, a staff surgeon, a staff engineer, and an assistant paymaster in charge. I find also that the Victoria and Albert, another Royal yacht, 2,470 tons, has the following complement of superior officers—viz., a captain, a commander, two lieutenants, a staff commander, a fleet surgeon, a fleet paymaster, a fleet engineer, an assistant paymaster, and an assistant engineer. This yacht has also two tenders, the Alberta and the Elfin. The Alberta has, I find, for superior officers, a staff captain and a fleet engineer, and the other tender, the Elfin, has a staff commander and an engineer. In other words, these yachts have as large a complement of officers as a battle-ship of the first line. What the actual cost may be at the present time, of course, it is very difficult, if not impossible, precisely to ascertain; but I have referred to the last Return we have on the subject, presented in 1883, and I find there that the total annual cost of pay, allowance, and victualling for officers and crew of this fleet of Royal yachts was £34,480. Now, I think I should be perfectly justified if I moved to reduce the total cost by one-half; but I am anxious not to leave to hon. Members opposite any reasonable excuse for declining to vote with me. I have, therefore, selected two items, two especial and specific items, relating to these yachts, amounting together to £80—the allowances to the navigating lieutenant of the Osborne, and the staff commander of the Victoria and Albert for a charge for state furniture. Now, I submit this is absolutely indefensible in the first place, for it is ridiculous that a charge for state furniture should be put down especially for the Naval Service; and if it were necessary to establish an expenditure of this kind, it is clear that the navigating lieutenant and commander are not the proper persons to be trusted with it. When a proposition of this kind is brought forward, vested interests are generally urged against it. In this case, however, no vested interest can possibly arise; you cannot have a vested interest in a mere allowance. Of course, when the service is discontinued, the allowance ceases, and with it all claims for compensation. For these reasons I beg to move the Motion which stands in my name on the paper.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £3,201,620, be granted for the said service."—(Mr. Pickersgill.)

*LORD G. HAMILTON: All the officers serving in Her Majesty's ships who are in charge of valuable stores receive additional remuneration and are liable for any deficiencies. The emoluments attached to those particular duties are—in the Victoria and Albert £25, and in the Osborne £30. These payments are made in accordance with the general practice in the service.

MR. PICKERSGILL: Does the noble Lord consider "state furniture" naval stores?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: Yes, certainly; and far more valuable than most stores.

DR. CAMERON: Will the noble Lord reply to the points I raised a few moments ago?

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): Before this subject is disposed of, there is another matter I should like to mention as requiring consideration. It is in connection with the appointment of a certain foreign nobleman to a certain post in the Navy. Of course, having been recently imprisoned—"Hear, hear!"—yes; it is a circumstance of which I am proud—I do not know whether this foreign nobleman still holds his appointment in Her Majesty's Navy, but I presume he does. I should like to know how it comes to pass that, with such a patriotic Government in existence, we have these foreign noblemen placed in these positions—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member evidently does not appreciate the fact that there is a specific Amendment before the Committee which must be dealt with.

DR. TANNER: I understood that the Amendment had reference to the Royal yachts generally, and not merely to the furniture in them. If, however, the Amendment deals only with furniture, I would point out that the furniture of Prince Leiningen—who is neither ornamental or useful—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

DR. TANNER: If I am not in order in going into this now, Sir, I will raise the point at a future stage.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 66; Noes 160.—(Div. List, No. 20.)

Original Question again proposed.

DR. CAMERON: I would ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he can now say whether any progress has been made with the construction of an effective Intelligence Department in connection with the Admiralty? The noble Lord the Member for Marylebone has rendered immense service to the country by pressing upon the Government the formation of such a Department, and I had hoped that the noble Lord's resignation would have secured the serious attention of the Government to the matter. I would ask the noble Lord to reply on that point, and also to tell us whether any information has been received from the Commander in Samoa as to the action he took against the German war-ships in connection with the forcible abduction of a British subject from a British vessel?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: The Naval Intelligence Department is in a most efficient working condition. Every single officer in the Service has definite instructions what to do in these cases. The reason why the Government has not received such late intelligence from Samoa as has been received by private agencies is because the captain of the man-of-war there observed the well-known and universal rule of communicating all particulars to his Commander-in-Chief.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): We really must take these two Votes together—the Army as well as the Navy. We find that there is to be an increase in the number of men for the Army, and the First Lord of the Admiralty told us the other day that when the new ships are built we shall have an increase of 3,000 men in the Navy. Now, I do object to all these extensions of our armaments. Everybody who raises such objections, I know perfectly well, is told that he is unpatriotic; but I do not favour the patriotism which is considered to be proved by the reckless voting of any proposal for increased expenditure. I am determined, always and invariably, to divide the House whenever I see these 30 millions sterling per annum, which we expend on the two Services, exceeded. Although I desire to see the country in possession of a strong and efficient Navy, I think 30 millions a-year is quite enough to spend on this species of insurance. If, at any time, you want more, take it from the amount spent on the Army, which, I think, will easily bear reduction. I think the country is determined that there shall be reasonable economy in our defences, and that these perpetual increases shall not continue. In 1848 the amount spent on the Army and Navy was only 18 millions. Have we been invaded since then—have we been conquered since that time? Not at all. We have been attacking other people, but have remained secure ourselves. I always distrust those gentlemen who “ask for more” in connection with the Army and Navy. When I heard the big Jingo drum being beat before Parliament met I knew what the game was. I knew we should have demands for more money, more men, more marines, more stokers. Things are not going well with the Government at home, and they want to draw a red herring across the trail. I am opposed to the whole thing, and I move that the Vote be reduced by £89,500, being the cost of wages, &c., for the extra 3,000 men.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That a sum, not exceeding £3,112,000, be granted for the said Service.”—(Mr. Labouchere.)

MR. PICTON (Leicester): I rise cordially to support the Amendment, of the hon. Member for Northampton, and do so on the ground that no reason whatever has been given for any increase of expenditure such as should justify a man of common sense increasing his household expenses. There ought to be some reason given. We have increased the expenses of the Navy enormously, and that in a year which we have been assured by Her Majesty in the Speech from the Throne is one of profound peace. Unless some cause is shown—some threatened danger to the country—I do contend that we ought not to allow a single shilling of increased expenditure to be paid for increased armaments. Hon. Members do not, I think, appreciate the enormous waste which goes on in matters of this kind. Were it not for the terrible drain on our industries necessitated by the immense expenditure upon our Army and Navy, I am persuaded that the workers in the country would be far better off than they are. Our imports and exports are continually increasing; capitalists are making money still—perhaps not so fast as they desire, for they never do that—but still they are making money, whilst complaints are heard on every hand on the part of the industrial population. No one would grudge spending money on the Army and Navy if there were a common-sense probability of danger to the country; but what the working classes complain of is that money should be extracted from them on dreamy grounds of remote and improbable, and almost impossible, contingencies, which no man in his senses expects to happen. On these grounds I cordially support the Motion for the reduction of the Vote.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I have much pleasure in supporting the reduction, because I do not want to see any of that insane rivalry in fleets of which we see so much in regard to armies on the Continent. The expenditure on the Army and Navy in all countries is becoming heavier and heavier, because every one is trying to have more powerful forces than his neighbour. If we now increase our Navy, there will be some Jingo or other in France who will want to increase the French Navy; and when an increase is effected in the French Navy, there will be a demand made by the Jingo in this country for a further increase of our Navy, and so on. As H.M.S. Sultan has gone to the bottom the Government will have the Navy strengthened by her full complement of men, so that the number of men and marines now asked for will not be required.

MR. COSSHAM (Bristol, E.): We have heard a great many conflicting opinions on this subject, but one thing is clear—namely, that all gentlemen connected with the naval services want to get hold of more money. Though they cannot agree as to how it is to be expended, they all agree in this, that they must have more from the National purse. We are wasting to a large extent the National resources. Depend upon it that sooner or later these extravagant expenditure will come home to us. The poverty of this country—notwithstanding its wealth on the one hand—is increasing. [Laughter.] Yes; I say that the wealth is increasing amongst certain men, but poverty is increasing in larger numbers. [Renewed laughter.] I am speaking of what I know. The poverty of the country is becoming a sad scene of trouble to us, and a sad scene of danger to us, and I am sure that unless we look at the question carefully, before long it will become a matter of great danger to us. I hear our right hon. Gentleman very much exercised as to an increase of the Navy. Another is exercised as to the expenditure on the Navy; but there is far more danger from this increase of armaments than from anything else. The rivalry is continually going on, and the result is, we are bringing the whole of Europe into such a condition that there is danger for us all. If we increase our Navy on the one hand, another Power increases its Navy, so that the relative position is unchanged. I do ask the House to put a stop to this rivalry that is going on. I support with all my heart and might the Amendment of my hon. Friend, and I hope he will press it to a division. [Laughter.] Those who laugh to-day will have to appear before their constituents, and when they do—and my impression is that it will be much sooner than many of them expect—this effort to increase the national expenditure will be one of the things they will have to face. I believe the time is not far distant when the rule that is applied to those who are on the business of the House will also be applied to Members of this House who receive pay in the Services to which they vote money. There are so many Members of this House interested in this expenditure that when persons like myself, representing those on whom taxation bears heavily, try to call attention to it, they are laughed at by the very men who receive pay in the Military and Naval Services.

DR. TANNER (Mid. Cork), who rose amidst laughter from below the Ministerial Gangway: I like to treat that laughter with the contempt it deserves.

Excuse me if I refer to the more important point which has been brought forward by the hon. Gentleman who sits on this Front Bench beneath me. I think that there are many questions connected with the Navy, and with the men who are employed in the Navy, that deserve some consideration from Members of this House. There is one point that I should like to get a specific answer upon from the First Lord of the Admiralty. I should like to know how it comes to pass that Catholics—and I speak as an Irish Protestant—are boycotted when they endeavour to enter the Navy. I should like hon. Members to look into this question, and ascertain how it comes to pass that in the South of Ireland, where we possess a body of fishermen, of men who are trained to the sea and to seafaring work, when these men come forward and try to get into the Royal Navy their services are rejected. I can tell the First Lord of the Admiralty that I have received information, not from any gentleman who sits on this side of the House, but from officers of the Royal Navy who belong to the same Party as the noble Lord, which is of a character such as to justify me in asking him to look into this matter. Let him see how many Irishmen or Irish fishermen —

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member's observations are not relevant to the proposed reduction of the Vote.

DR. TANNER: I thought, Sir, that this Vote was attacked by my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, who moved a reduction of the Vote in consequence of there being already sufficient men in the Navy, and I wanted, if I might be permitted, to point out how it was that really we want a recruiting ground to make the Navy efficient and effective, if we want to continue true union—

THE CHAIRMAN: I must again point out that the hon. Member's remarks are not relevant.

DR. TANNER: Mr. Courtney, I always accept your ruling, and, Sir, as long as I remain in this House I shall always do the same. Well, Sir, that point may not be pressed, but I shall take an opportunity of bringing it to the attention of the noble Lord. Of course, we can easily understand why

Her Majesty's Government at a time like the present, when they have got their coercion and intimidation in force in England as well as in Ireland, come forward and try to promote, not the welfare of the men of the Royal Navy, not of the able seamen or the privates—no, no, Sir, it is not for that reason that money is to be spent—but in order to swell the salaries of the younger sons of aristocratic houses. Everybody knows that the major portion of the officers of the Royal Navy is composed of these sons of aristocratic houses—aristocratic to a degree. I sincerely hope this money will not be voted, and I trust hon. Members will inquire into the facts and endeavour by every means in their power to prevent money being spent in order to swell the purses of an impoverished aristocracy and a discredited Pigottist faction.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 73; No is 186.—(Div. List, No. 21).

Original Question again proposed.

DR. CAMERON: There is a rather important question arising on this Vote in connection with Scotland, and that is the frequent employment of Naval Forces and Marines on expeditions to the Highlands. On several occasions I have protested against the men being thus employed, and on one occasion I obtained from the then Secretary to the Admiralty an undertaking that greater care should be exercised in sanctioning the use of the Naval Forces in this way than had previously been displayed. Now, Sir, I wish to point out to the noble Lord that the employment of the Naval Forces in that part of the country has a most injurious effect in rendering the Naval Service of Her Majesty unpopular, on a ground which, above all others, is eminently adapted for the purposes of a recruiting ground. In the Western Highlands there is a race of hardy seafaring men, who are only too anxious to join Her Majesty's Naval Service, and who do, at the present time, largely serve Her Majesty as Naval Volunteers. It is suggested that emigration should be promoted among these people, but they might, with more advantage, be employed in the Mercantile Navy, so as to take the places now filled by thousands of foreigners in our merchant ships. Among the recommendations made in the Report of the Crofters Commission was one that naval training ships should be established along the shores of the Western Highlands; but for some reason or other Her Majesty's Government have not paid any attention to that recommendation. I must, however, protest against the employment of naval forces in connection with matters which ought only to come within the functions of the civil authorities and the police. The question of the employment of the military in connection with such things was ably dealt with in the admirable memorandum issued by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) when he was Home Secretary; but, unfortunately, since he left office the position he laid down has not been adhered to. I trust the noble Lord will be able to give us some assurance that none of the large increase which is proposed in the force of marines shall be employed in carrying out martial law and striking terror into the hearts of the Crofters in the Western Highlands; and that among his projects for strengthening the Navy he will avail himself of the recommendation made by the Crofters Commission for the establishment off the coasts of the Hebrides of training ships which would have the advantage of being fed by a population admirably fitted for Her Majesty's naval service, and who, as seafaring men, as soldiers, and as fighting men, are unsurpassed by any class of people in this kingdom.

DR. CLARK: I would also ask the noble Lord whether he will give us the assurance requested by my hon. Friend? If not, I shall be prepared to move a reduction of the Vote.

*LORD G. HAMILTON: The hon. Gentleman the Member for the College Division of Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) has expressed a wish that a certain number of Highland Crofters should go into the merchant service, and for my part I think it would be a good thing if they did, because if they would only undertake that kind of service there would be no reason for sending the Marines into the Highlands to ensure the execution of the law. But I am unable to give the assurance asked for, because when the necessity arises the military force must be used in support of the civil power.

DR. TANNER: I wish to ask a question with reference to the gunboat stationed in Bantry Bay. Is it the intention of the Admiralty in future to utilize that gunboat as a sort of steam packet for the conveyance of the forces of the Crown on particular occasions, instead of making use of the existing steam packet service?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: I believe it is true that the gunboat referred to is occasionally employed in the manner stated, and I do not see any objection to that arrangement.

DR. CAMERON: Before the Vote is passed I should like to ask what will be the next Vote?

*MR. GOSCHEN: Hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway have succeeded in protracting the discussion of this Vote until midnight, and therefore, in accordance with the promise made by the First Lord of the Treasury, the Supplementary Civil Service Estimates cannot now be taken. But there is now an end of the matter. In consequence of the discussion which has gone on for the last hour, the Civil Service Supplementary Estimates cannot now be taken. It was distinctly understood that the Supplementary Civil Service Votes would be brought on at an earlier hour; and if any inconvenience is now caused, owing to the days for which they are put down, the responsibility will not rest with the Government. The Civil Service Estimates will be put down for to-morrow.

DR. CAMERON: I wish to point out, in reply to the lecture of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that if the Leader of the House had adhered to the pledge he gave on Wednesday night this difficulty would not have occurred.

Question put, and agreed to.

(1.) £1,061,100, Victualling and Clothing for the Navy.

*MR. W. J. LANE (Cork, Co., E.): I wish to call attention to a matter connected with this Vote. I have just received three letters from gentlemen in the City of Cork who are staunch supporters of Her Majesty's Government. They have for many years been contractors to the Government for the supply of pork to the Admiralty, and they complain that the contracts have now been given to Danish firms. I need not say that such contracts are of the greatest importance to the whole community in the South of Ireland. They are important to the landlord because they enable him to get his rent from the tenant; they are of importance to the shopkeeper because they give the farmers more money to spend; and they are of moment to mercantile communities such as the City of Cork because they afford employment for so many people. I believe, in fact, that in Cork City, these contracts gave constant employment to fully 500 people. One of my correspondents writes—

"It is a great shame that the Government should give the best part of the Navy contract to the Danes. Up to the present time we in Cork have provided the supply for Haulbowline—which was about one-third of the whole contract—but this year all the contracts have been given to Copenhagen."

The loss to Cork is about 3,930 casks, or, in cash, £25,000, and this all goes to a foreign shore. Surely the Admiralty ought to have very strong grounds for giving preference to the foreigner, and I believe that taxpayers and the community at large have great and just reasons for finding fault with the Admiralty Department in this matter. Another gentleman writes—

"The difference in price, as I believe, about 5 per cent, and, taking into account the quality, I think our pork would be cheaper in the end to the Navy."

The third gentleman writes—

"I hope that your action may, in some measure, redress the wrong under which the South of Ireland is suffering."

This shows what the loyal supporters of the present Government think of the action of the Admiralty in this matter. If it be true that the saving is only equal to 5 per cent, and that the quality of the Danish pork is inferior, I say there is no justification for taking £25,000 out of Irish trade channels and giving it to a foreigner. We hear a great deal about protection of home industries and of the desirability of encouraging the farmers of this country; but what is the use of all this talk on the Conservative benches if, when there is an opportunity of practically benefiting the agricultural community, the Government neglect it, and instead get their supplies from a foreign source?

I have no desire, Mr. Courtney, to trespass unduly on the time of the Committee, but I think this is a case of great hardship and injustice, and I hope the First Lord of the Admiralty will see if it is in his power to give us some assistance and some share of the Navy patronage. I believe the Admiralty have never complained of the class of goods supplied by the Cork contractors, and I hope that in future our claims will have fuller consideration.

*LORD G. HAMILTON: I agree that it is desirable, where possible, to foster our home industries. It has been the practice of the Admiralty to give a slight preference to home growers, but it was impossible for them to put aside the lowest tenders in favour of those which were higher. The difference in the price embodied in the tenders influenced the Department in refusing the Irish tenders. These are the main grounds for which the alteration has been made; but if the hon. Gentleman will get the merchants of Cork to take a little more trouble to improve the quality of their goods, I do not think they need fear competition from the Danes or from any country in the world.

*MR. LANE: I cannot take any exception to the tone of the noble Lord's reply, but I do wish he had given us some idea as to the difference in price between the successful and unsuccessful contractors, which, he says, justified the Department in refusing the Irish tenders. I should be glad if he will also state if there has been a specific case of complaint against the Irish contractors which would justify the Government taking the contracts from them? We ought certainly to be allowed to supply the stores at Haulbowline.

*LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I am afraid I cannot give those particulars to-night; but if the hon. Member will hand me the correspondence I will inquire further into the matter.

COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness): I wish to call the attention of the First Lord of the Admiralty to a small matter connected with rations issued to the Navy. I am not going to pass any general criticisms on the general rations served to the men; but occasionally we have to make exceptional demands on the men, and to turn them out at an early hour for very hard labour. Now, it has always been found that the work is done better if the men get some additional rations on these special occasions, and that it is better too for the men. The power to issue these extra rations is one we used to possess, and it was greatly appreciated by the men, as well as immensely beneficial to the work, and I think that it is an indulgence which might now be granted, under proper control.

*LORD G. HAMILTON: I will look into the matter. It was before the Board of Admiralty some time ago, but somehow it has escaped attention.

Vote agreed to.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (SCOTLAND).

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY: Seeing my noble Friend the Secretary for Scotland in his place, I wish to ask him a question of which I have given him private notice—when it is proposed to introduce the Local Government Bill for Scotland, which was announced in the Queen's Speech? My noble Friend is aware that the meeting of the Commissioners of Supply will take place at the end of April, and that of the Convention of Royal Burghs in May; and it would be a great convenience to these bodies, who are largely interested in this matter, if the Bills can be introduced in sufficient time to allow of their being considered by those bodies at their meetings.

THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN: In answer to my noble Friend, I am afraid I am not able to give any very positive undertaking as to when the Local Government Bill for Scotland will be introduced. It is proposed to bring in the Bill in the other House, but the time of its introduction will depend on the state of public business in that House. At the same time I can assure my noble Friend that the Government are anxious to bring in the Bill at the earliest possible opportunity, and one of the reasons for their being thus anxious is, that these bodies—the Commissioners of Supply and the Convention of Royal Burghs—may have an opportunity of considering the Bills at their meetings.

STANDING ORDERS OF THE HOUSE.

REPORT OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (Earl CADOGAN): My Lords, on the last occasion when the Report of the Committee appointed by this House to examine the Standing Orders of the House referring to public business was discussed, it appeared to be the unanimous opinion of your Lordships that an opportunity should be afforded to the House to discuss each and all of the proposed Amendments in detail, and also that such discussion could more conveniently take place when the House was in Committee. I have not been able to find any actual precedent for such a course, but I do not see any valid reason why one should not be created, and if it be the pleasure of the House, I will move that the House now dissolve itself into a Committee to consider this Report.

Moved, That the House do resolve itself into a Committee to consider the Report of the Select Committee on the Standing Orders of the House of Lords relating to the conduct of public business (L. Privy Seal [E. Cadogan]), agreed to.

House in Committee accordingly.

EARL CADOGAN: My Lords, before any of the Standing Orders in which the Committee have made any alteration are reached, there is one in respect of which a notice of Amendment has been given by the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Fitz Gerald).

LORD FITZ GERALD: I must ask your Lordships to pardon me for proposing the Amendment of which I have given notice, or for intervening at all in questions concerning the Standing Orders, because I must admit that I do not carry with me the aid of any experience, but my great object is to keep those Orders right in point of law, and possibly I may be able to give the House a little assistance in that view, and in that view only. Now, if your Lordships will look at Standing Order 2 on page 6, it is—"At the beginning of a Parliament, after prayers shall have been said, and the Lord Chancellor shall have taken the oath appointed to be taken, according to the Act of Parliament made for that purpose."

Your Lordships will recollect that these Standing Orders were arranged by the Committee last year, and I believe they were published before the Autumn Recess. But during the Autumn Sitting a very important Act of Parliament passed. The Bill was first of all brought into the Commons by Mr. Bradlaugh, and altered by the Solicitor General, and in this House it was taken up by my noble Friend, whose absence at this moment I regret (Earl Spencer). That Act made a very great alteration in the law. According to the law as it now stands, the Lord Chancellor is not bound to take any oath. This Standing Order proposes to put upon the Lord Chancellor the obligation of taking an oath—the oath appointed by a previous Act of Parliament. The Act passed in the Autumn Session of last year applies to every oath from that of Her Majesty the Queen down to that of Her humblest subject. If a person says that he has a conscientious objection to taking the oath, or that it is contrary to his religious opinion to do so, or if he says he has no religious opinions, then in either of those cases, upon making that declaration, he is entitled, in the place of an oath, to make a solemn affirmation. Now, in the case of a Lord Chancellor who objected to take the oath on either of the grounds stated, the Act would allow him to make an affirmation. That state of the law renders this Standing Order, as it is now proposed, inconsistent. The Amendment which I propose in this Order is, after the words "oath," to insert the words "or solemn affirmation."

*THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (The Duke of BUCKINGHAM and CHANDOS): I think it will be my duty to point out to the House that it is not in accordance with the practice of the House to discuss an Amendment to a Standing Order without notice has been given referring to that particular Standing Order. The present position is that the House has resolved itself into Committee to consider the Report of the Select Committee on the Standing Orders—the Select Committee have not reported upon this particular Standing Order; it has only reported upon those which are proposed to be amended, added to, or omitted. I think it my duty to draw the attention of the House to that.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): I should like to ask the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Herschell) whether he agrees in the view put forward by the noble and learned Lord (Lord Fitz Gerald) that the Standing Order as proposed would be inconsistent with the recent Statute allowing affirmation in place of oath?

LORD HERSCHELL: The Act referred to simply says that on all occasions upon which an oath is required by any Act of Parliament an affirmation may be substituted.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: But unfortunately this Standing Order is not an Act of Parliament.

LORD HERSCHELL: The Act provides that "in all cases where an oath is required by law to be taken" an affirmation may be substituted, and I take it that the requirements of this Standing Order would come under those words.

LORD FITZ GERALD: This depends upon the construction, not of the Standing Orders, but of the Act itself, and the words of the Act are—

"That every person objecting to be sworn, and stating as the ground of such objection either that he has no religious belief, or that the taking of an oath is contrary to his religious belief, shall be permitted to make a solemn affirmation."

I take it that the Amendment I propose is necessary in order to keep the Standing Orders according to law.

*LORD GRIMTHORPE: Surely the noble and learned Lord (Lord Herschell) is right, because this oath is made under an Act of Parliament, not created by the Standing Orders.

*EARL CADOGAN: I think, after the explanation that has been given by the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Herschell), the noble and learned Lord (Lord Fitz Gerald) will feel that his Amendment is not necessary. With regard to the objection suggested by the noble Duke in the Chair, I should not wish to press any objection of that kind, because I am sure the House will be glad to discuss Amendments to any of the Standing Orders, although they are not affected by the Report of the Select Committee.

LORD FITZ GERALD: I am afraid I must withdraw the Amendment, as I do not find my views receive any support.

Amendment withdrawn.

*EARL CADOGAN: The first Amendment suggested by the Select Committee is on page 10, Standing Order No. 4. It is proposed, at line 12, to leave out the words—

“Though they shall desire the same.”

I will read the sentence—

“No such Peers may or shall be introduced into the House of Peers by any herald, or with any ceremony, though they shall desire the same.”

It is proposed to leave out the latter words.

Amendment agreed to.

*EARL CADOGAN: The next Amendment I have to move is on page 12. This is the insertion of a new Standing Order No. 16A—

“The absence of any Lord from this House, except for sufficient reason, shall not prevent the Committee of Selection from calling for his services.”

I may point out that this is taken verbatim from a Standing Order which stood in the former Orders which will be found in the Appendices.

The addition was agreed to.

*EARL CADOGAN: The next is also an addition No. 16B—

“Lords may obtain leave of absence at the pleasure of the House upon cause shown.”

The addition was agreed to.

*EARL CADOGAN: Next, I beg to move the omission of Standing Order No. 17, which is on page 12, and which reads—

“When the House is sitting, every Lord that shall enter is to give and receive salutations from the rest, and not to sit down in his place unless he hath made an obeisance to the Cloth of Estate.”

Omission agreed to.

*EARL CADOGAN: The next Standing Order which is proposed to be altered is Standing Order No. 20. It is proposed that the provision as to business of which notice has been given and as to Private Bill proceedings shall read as follows:—

“Any business for which notice is not required, and all proceedings relating to Private Bills, may be entered upon before the Notices of the day are called for; but the House will proceed with the Notices in preference to other matters at any time after half-past Four o'clock, at the request of any Lord who may have a notice on the Minutes.”

The time mentioned in the present Standing Order is a quarter-past 5.

The Amendment was agreed to.

*EARL CADOGAN: Then, my Lords, it is proposed to add at the end of Standing Order 20—

“If at the close of the speech of any Lord it shall be moved that the business then in hand be adjourned, or, the House being in Committee, that the House be resumed, and it shall be so ordered, it shall be lawful for the House thereupon, without notice given, to make further order that the business in question shall be taken first, either at some later hour of the evening or on some future sitting-day to be then fixed.”

The object of this, as I explained to your Lordships on the last occasion of our discussing these Standing Orders, is to provide not only that the House shall be enabled to adjourn any business at any given time, but that it shall be possible to take up the question which has been so adjourned either later in the evening or first in order at the next Sitting of the House.

*EARL BEAUCHAMP suggested that instead of the Amendment being added to Order 20 it should form a separate Order.

*EARL CADOGAN agreed to the suggestion.

The addition was agreed to.

*EARL CADOGAN: The next alterations are on page 16 in Order 24. First of all there is the addition of the words—

"Except by permission of the House."
after the words—

"Every Lord is to speak standing and uncovered."

I will first move that addition.

The addition was agreed to.

*EARL CADOGAN: Then it is proposed in the same Order to strike out the words prohibiting our calling one another by our names, instead of referring to one another as we do at present simply as noble Lords. My Lords, the object of the proposed change in reference to our mode of alluding to each other in debate is that it has been found inconvenient and almost impossible to describe accurately the noble Lord to whom reference is meant to be made. Another inconvenience has been found to arise—namely, that in newspaper reports of speeches, where a noble Lord has been referred to, it has frequently happened that the reporter has inserted in brackets the name of some noble Lord other than the noble Lord actually referred to. I may point out that the alteration leaves the matter entirely permissive; it does not prevent any Peer from alluding to noble Lords present in the way in which we have hitherto done, but it does not prohibit the calling by name.

LORD DE ROS: I cannot see any argument in support of this Amendment. As the Order stands, it has been in operation for a very great number of years, and I think that if we addressed each other by name it might be, in some cases, invidious. Surely the reporters can easily find out who the Lord is to whom reference is made as "the noble Lord who spoke last," or "last but one," and so forth.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I wish, my Lords, to record my experience of the extreme clumsiness of the present practice. It is almost impossible, sometimes, to indicate the noble Lord to whom one wishes to refer. I venture, at least, to make this appeal—that if the House will not accept this alteration, it will, at any rate, allow the benches to be numbered, so that we may speak of "the noble Lord sitting on bench No. so and so."

*EARL BEAUCHAMP: I have never heard of any difficulty arising such as would warrant this alteration. It is a small matter, I quite admit; but this is one of the links with the past, and I do not see why we should sever those links unless there is some serious difficulty which necessitates our so doing. This is not a matter which need be discussed at any length; but while fully appreciating the necessity of improvements, I very much object to change simply for the sake of change, and this seems to me a departure from ancient traditions which are founded on very sound reasons. There can be no doubt that, if debate is heated or excited, some little restraint in the manner in which we speak of each other is not without advantage. I, therefore, sincerely hope that your Lordships will adhere to the old Order, which has come down to us with the sanction of the past. Of course, it may be said that this is only permissive; but no one can doubt that, if the Amendment is adopted, the new practice will become general, and I do not think it will conduce to our dignity and decorum.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK): From the short experience I have had in your Lordships' House, I am very much disposed to favour this alteration. In former days, when Peers used to come down in their Orders, reference could be made to "the noble Lord in the blue ribbon" or "the noble Lord in the red ribbon," and so on, and no difficulty arose. We have now nothing of that sort, and great inconvenience often arises. After all, the old practice would very likely continue generally, but I think it would be well if this permission were given, so that on occasion the actual names might be mentioned.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: This proposal seems similar to the regulation existing in the House of Commons, that Members shall be addressed by the names of their constituencies instead of by their own names. Your Lordships' debates are so orderly, and so generally free from all personality, that possibly that reason does not exist here. I have no very great feeling upon the matter, but I think there is some advantage in a debate, where speakers follow each other rapidly, in being able to point to a noble Lord by name instead of by allocutory process.

*MARTIN OF FARMINGTON: I may just mention that this gives rise to

On this side of the House we have no less than three noble Lords who have been Viceroy of Ireland, and the reference by any Member of this House to "the noble Lord the late Viceroy of Ireland" leads to considerable confusion. I think the proposed change will obviate a great deal of practical inconvenience. The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) suggested—I do not know whether seriously—the numbering of the benches. Certainly an alteration of some kind is urgently required, because we have not all the force of wit of the noble Marquess, and some noble Lords, in endeavouring to properly indicate the noble Lord he wishes to refer to, may arrive at something like a nickname, which is, I am sure, a sort of designation quite unworthy of your Lordships' House. I cordially support the Amendment.

The Amendment was agreed to.

EARL CADOGAN: The next alteration is on page 16 in Standing Order 25. It is proposed to insert some new words, which will make the Order read as follows:—

"No Lord is to speak twice to any Bill, at one time of reading it, or to any other proposition, except the Mover in reply, unless it be to explain himself, in some material point of his speech (no new matter being introduced), and that not without the leave of the House first obtained."

The Amendment was agreed to.

EARL CADOGAN: On page 21 there is an Amendment proposed in Order 30, to strike out from the provision with regard to Division Lists the words—

"But in cases in which any [noble Lord] have higher or more ancient titles or dignities, the higher or more ancient title or dignity shall be added in brackets."

The Amendment was agreed to.

EARL CADOGAN: The next Amendment is on the subject of a quorum. I beg to move the following new Standing Order, which your Lordships will find on page 22, numbered 30A:—

"If, on a Division upon any stage of a Bill, it shall appear that Thirty Lords are not present in the House, the Lord Speaker shall declare the question not decided, but the debate thereon adjourned to the next sitting of the House; and if such Division take place when the House is in Committee, the Chairman shall declare the question not decided, whereupon the House shall resume, and shall be again in Committee at the next sitting of the House."

The object of this new Standing Order is to provide for a quorum, to avoid what has been considered almost to approach a scandal at times—namely, the rejection by this House, when a wholly inadequate number of your Lordships have been present, of Bills which have passed the other House of Parliament. I may, perhaps, mention that I believe the Committee fixed the number 30 as having the same relation to the number of Peers in this House as the figure 40 in use in the other House of Parliament has to the number of Members of that House. I ought not, perhaps, to anticipate any discussion that may take place upon the Amendment of my noble Friend (Lord Colville of Culross) to reduce the figure from 30 to 20; but I may say that, as a matter of fact, very few Divisions have taken place in which under 30 have voted, and when these abnormally small Divisions have taken place, I find, upon reference, that the number present has been under 20. Therefore, putting the quorum at 20 would, in that respect at all events, be no improvement. I may mention also an objection which was raised by the noble Lord, whom I believe I may now mention by name—"No!"—I must describe him then as sitting first on the Bench No. 2 below the Gangway (Lord Stratheden and Campbell). I believe that noble Lord suggested that it might be possible to defeat measures in this House by a sort of side wind—by Peers simply absenting themselves from the House instead of voting against particular measures. But I may point out that this paragraph merely defers the decision. The words are—

"The Chairman shall declare the question not decided, whereupon the House shall resume, and shall be again in Committee at the next Sitting of the House."

Consequently, if there be not a sufficient number of Peers present to insure a decision one day, the promoters of the Bill have it in their power to endeavour to bring up their friends on the following day. I cannot really think that the number of 30 Peers is an unobtainable quorum.

LORD COLVILLE OF CULROSS: I rise, my Lords, to move to reduce the proposed quorum from 30 to 20. Notwithstanding what has been said by my noble Friend who moved this Order, I that your Lordships will understand what difficulty would arise at the end of a prolonged session, say towards the end of August, when the majority disappears, if the number of votes to be required in the Standing Order is altered so that what might be a narrow majority would not then pass in the House. I must remind your Lordships that in the recent Committee which sat upon these matters the number of votes was only carried by a majority of one.

LORD HILLCOTE: I should like to point out to the noble Lord who spoke last that the number upon which there was a decision was not that which is pointed out in the House. The proposal I support of which there was a majority of one was an amendment that in the case of a vote should have voted in the majority, which is of course a different thing to the proposal that 20 only should be present in the House. The object of providing for 30 Members was that complaint had been made that measures from the House of Commons were rejected in your Lordships' House upon occasions when there was a very limited number of Lords present. The reason for fixing 30 was because that represented the same proportion to the number of your Lordships' House as the Commons' quantum of 40 represents to the number of Members of that House.

LORD GILMTHORPE: The objection to the proposal as it now stands seems to be this—that if there are 20 votes for a Motion it would be carried if 30 Members were present, but if 30 Members were present, although less than 20 might vote for the Motion, it could not be carried. That seems to be rather an absurd result. Therefore, I think that what was suggested in the Committee is the better plan—namely, that 20 Peers should be required to vote for the Resolution.

LORD BRATHAMPTON: If we decide that there shall be a majority of 20 in favour of the Motion it will have a much more restrictive result, because, suppose there are 37 Peers in the House and 18 voted one way and 19 the other, a proposition would not be carried, the number voting in favour being just short of 20, although there were 37 Peers present. I do not feel very strongly upon this point myself, but I am not in favour of any needless change in our constitution. I may just make this remark that it is no use comparing the two Houses in considering this matter of a quorum, because there are a great number of your Lordships who do not take their seats at all, and the actual number of Members of this House who take part in its business is very much below the number of your Lordships' House.

LORD BRABOURNE: I think my Lords we should be very careful in restricting ourselves at all. It is of course harder to get 30 Peers together than it is to get 20, and therefore I should be in favour of the latter figure as against the former; moreover, the larger the number necessary to the passing of a Bill, especially towards the close of a Session, the greater the encouragement to a small minority to divide against the measure, and the greater the probability that they might defeat it. I think it would be wiser that there should be no restriction at all.

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY: With regard to this question of a quorum, clearly it cannot be a matter of very great difficulty to obtain 30 Peers even at the end of the Session. The number of official Peers alone is 25, and of course they would all be prepared to give their full attention to the public service. I may say that I think it would be discreditable to this House if it were to be understood that there is any difficulty in collecting together 30 Peers to transact public business.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: I think the noble Lord opposite (Lord Rosebury) has over-estimated the number of official Peers. I cannot agree with the suggestion that there should be required a majority numbering 20 in favour of a Resolution, because, although there were 38 Peers in the House, it might be impossible to obtain the requisite majority, and it would be impossible to carry on the business, which would be a very bad result. Therefore, on the whole, I am inclined to agree with the proposal of the Select Committee.

Question put, "That the word 20 be substituted for the word 30," and negatived.

Question put, "That this paragraph be added to the Standing Orders of the House," and agreed to.

Lord Colville of Culross

EARL CADOGAN: The next Amendment is at page 24 in Order 34, which your Lordships will remember provided that Bills brought from the Commons should be dropped if not taken up within 12 sitting days. It is proposed to add to that Rule—

“Except after 12 sitting days Notice given by a Lord of the Second Reading thereof, provided that such Notice shall not be given after the 1st day of August.”

It has sometimes happened that Members of the House of Commons who had charge of a Bill sent up here have omitted to obtain the assistance of noble Lords to pilot it through this House; and not being aware of this restriction of 12 sitting days, the Bill has lapsed, because no noble Lord has taken charge of it. It is proposed now that in such a case, after 12 sitting days' notice given by a Lord, the Bill shall be again taken up; but there is a proviso that such notice shall not be given after the 1st of August.

LORD FITZ GERALD: I propose, my Lords, to reduce the number of days' notice from 12 to five, for this reason. Twelve sitting days means three weeks' notice, because we only sit here four days in the week. In the case of a Bill lapsing in consequence of not being moved, its revival upon 12 sitting days' notice would in many cases be insufficient to prevent the loss of the Bill. I propose to substitute five sitting days, because that would really give a notice of nearly nine clear days. It is not always through a slip on the part of the promoters that a Bill is not properly looked after in this House; it is often found very difficult to get a noble Lord to take charge of some complicated measure.

After conversation it was agreed that the word “eight” should be substituted for the word “twelve” in the Amendment; and the Amendment, thus altered, was agreed to.

EARL CADOGAN: My Lords, the next is at page 25. It is proposed to omit Standing Order 37 which reads—

“Every Lord is to sit in his due place when the House is put into a Committee.”

The omission was agreed to.

EARL CADOGAN: Now, my Lords, we come to page 27, where your Lordships will see eight new Standing Orders which deal with the appointment of Standing Committees. On the former occasion my noble Friend behind me (Earl Beauchamp) remonstrated with me for not having shown any cause why Standing Orders should be provided at all in this House, and I am bound to say I had intended giving him some reasons; but I thought that we should take each Standing Order in turn, and that I might, perhaps, explain the proposal when it came to its turn. One of the noble Lords opposite (the Earl of Kimberley) explained very fully and clearly the chief object of this Standing Order. It is, undoubtedly, one of the chief functions of this House to revise, and if necessary to amend, the various Bills which come up to us from the other House of Parliament; and although it is an undoubted fact that the Committees of the whole House in the House of Lords do, when they address themselves to the task, examine thoroughly every measure that is submitted to them, yet it is also true that there are a large number of Bills which, perhaps, are not of any general interest, but which are none the less important, which are allowed to pass through this House with a very slight examination and next to no discussion. That being the case, it was felt by the Committee that it would be well to provide Standing Committees to whom such Bills should be referred. I think I might point out to the House that the labours of these Standing Committees will not, after all, be very arduous, and that although each would consist of 50 Members, the quorum is fixed as low as 12. Therefore, I do not think that any noble Lord would be justified in pleading that his engagements on Private Bill Committees or any other legislative work which he may be called upon to perform would prevent his serving upon these Standing Committees. Certainly, if any objection is made to the appointment of these Standing Committees on account of the difficulty of finding noble Lords to act on Private Bill Committees, all I can say is that I think the public business should take precedence of the private business. I defer any other observation until I hear what objections can be made to these proposed Standing Orders. I think I shall be in order if I read the first paragraph, and the discussion can be taken upon that—other; they are both large Committees; those in the House of Commons consist of 86, and these Standing Committees will consist of 50. Sir John Mowbray instanced the refusal of Members to serve on Private Bill Committees, because they belonged to other Committees. I feel perfectly confident, my Lords, that the same difficulty and the same state of things will arise here if this Standing Order is carried out. I entirely agree with Sir John Mowbray upon that point; and, although this new Rule is said to apply only to public business, I am perfectly sure that it will have a good deal of influence upon the private business of the House also. I speak with considerable experience of the business of this House. I have been, I believe, for 35 years on the Committee of Selection; and for 20 years I was the Whip of one of the political Parties in this House, and that induces me to give what opposition I can to this Order. I will quote the authority of a noble Lord who is not here now (Lord Cork), but who, like myself, has taken great part for many years in the business of the House. He thoroughly concurs in the view that I have taken on this subject, and if he were here he would give me his best support. I also oppose this Order for another cause. I do not think it is quite the time to suggest such a course. The Joint Committee, to which I have referred, reported last Session, and upon their Report a Bill has been introduced into the House of Commons by Mr. Craig Sellar. The Bill was chiefly founded upon the recommendation of a Member of the present Government (Mr. Stanhope). I conclude, therefore, that the Government will support the measure in the other House, which is greatly attributable to one of its own Members. Surely, it would be far better that we should wait till we know what effect this new measure may have upon the views of Parliament, before we commit ourselves to some great alteration of our Standing Rules in this House. The Prime Minister has stated in the debate that this is not a Party question; and he further has told us that no pressure ought to be put on any Members of the Government on this question. I do hope that you will appreciate the old adage of "let well alone," and that you will give me assistance in my Motion, which is to reject any alteration such as is instanced in this new Standing Order. I beg to move the rejection of all that relates to these Standing Committees.

*LORD BRABOURNE: In seconding the Amendment I should like to make just one observation and to adduce one argument. The observation is this: these Standing Committees or Grand Committees in the House of Commons have been adopted from time to time for this reason—the pressure of business has been so great that it was necessary to establish them as a remedy for that difficulty. Now, your Lordships' complaint is precisely the contrary—that you do not get enough business here. Nobody complains of the way you perform the business, but you do not get sufficient. Therefore, to meet a disease of exactly an opposite character, you are asked to apply the same remedy. But, my Lords, my objection to these Standing Committees rests upon something wider and broader than anything that my noble Friend has advanced. I say that by the Constitution of this country every Peer in Parliament has at present a full right to consider the detail of every measure which is brought before your Lordships. This is distinctly a measure of disfranchisement. You are going to divide 200 Members—it may or may not be the best portion of your Lordships' House—into four fifties. One 50 will be able to discuss a Bill of a certain class or character, and the other 150 Lords who are considering other Bills will be to that extent disfranchised unless your Lordships make some special order that the Bill in question shall be submitted to the consideration of the whole House instead of being committed to the Grand Committee. I protest against this disfranchisement—I do not think the bulk of your Lordships' House have done anything to deserve it. I do not see that it is called for by any very great pressure of business which your Lordships' House is unable to perform according to its present method of transacting business.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, if I agreed with the premisses of the noble Lord opposite who opposes these Standing Orders, I should certainly agree with his conclusion also, but I confess that I am not under the impression that it is notorious that we do our work, which is one of the most important func-

*LARRY BRABOURNE: A Poor can only speak once on Report.

LORD HERSCHELL: What I mean is, that after a measure has been thoroughly discussed in Committee and the Report of the Committee received upon it, noble Lords will be then in a position to deal with it when it comes before the House on the Report; but further than that, the House reserves to itself, in regard to any measure which, in the judgment of the House, ought to be further considered in detail, full power to commit it to a Committee of the whole House, although it has been to one of the Standing Committees; and, with that proviso, I cannot understand the suggestion that it would withdraw from Members of this House any powers that they now possess of looking at the details of the Bill. When the noble Lord opposite Lord Selkirk says that it would diminish from the House the power of looking into Bills—we do not mean that when now it is the responsibility of these Standing Committees of the House to look into Bills we are taking away from the House the power of looking into Bills—we are not extending it. We are only looking at them in detail and the consequence is that we have measures passed into law in such a condition that amendment is almost impossible. My Lord, this will become increasingly the case because the other House will not be able to do so, at high pressure. The latter measures are so hurriedly passed that they are passed by the House of Commons now, are generally passed without discussion. You can only get these small Bills passed if they are passed without discussion and the consequence is that they come up to this House in a condition in which they ought not to pass into law—in a condition in which their promoters would not desire them to pass into law, if the matter were properly considered and put before them. This duty of revision, I venture to say, is not properly performed at the present time. Perhaps it ought to be, but when the noble Lord objects to an Amendment of the Standing Orders such as is proposed on the ground that it is unnecessary, whatever other objection there may be to it, I am perfectly unable to understand that objection, because it was the strong conviction of that necessity which I am sure induced the members of the Special Committee to recommend this Standing Order to your Lordships' House. So much as to the necessity, except one word with regard to the Standing Committees of the House of Commons of which the noble Lord opposite spoke. I have had experience of those Standing Committees, and I do not hesitate to say that the legislation which passed through the examination of those Standing Committees was far better in its form than it ever would have been if it had merely gone through a Committee of the whole House. When a measure is scrutinised in this way by a Grand Committee, there is proper attention directed to its details, and it is evolved in a shape in which it would not evolve from a Committee of the whole House. Nothing has been more satisfactory in that respect than the working of those Committees. They have dealt with the measures before them always in a thoroughly business-like and practical spirit, and an earnest desire to legislate in the best possible form, and no desire to occupy time merely by needless alteration. Now, with regard to the practical difficulties, I think they have been overrated by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Brabourne). In the first place this Standing Order does not bind the House to the appointment of four Standing Committees—four is the extreme limit. It is “not more than four.” Therefore, if it were found impossible to obtain consistently with the ordinary duties of the House four Standing Committees, there is nothing to bind the House to appoint four. Nor is 50 Members the necessary minimum. 50 is the maximum—it is to be “not more than 50”; it does not say not less. Therefore, there will be, I think, no practical difficulty in accommodating the number of these Standing Committees to the wants of the House in ordinary respects. But, my Lords, there are two other observations I should like to make. One is that, besides the 380 noble Lords whom the noble Lord left after deducting the official Members for the business of the House, there are, I believe, between 30 and 40 other noble Lords who have not at the present time taken the oath, and who are entitled to do so. I trust that this House does not mean to proclaim to the public that those noble Lords are unwilling to give the necessary time and attention to perform what this House may deem to be a necessary duty. I have no doubt if it were found that their services were really required, some of those noble Lords would take the oath. The noble Lord must remember that on these Standing Committees there would be many of those who are exempt from Private Bill Committees who would undoubtedly serve. They may be exempt from Private Bill Committees, but it does not follow that their services would not be required, and would not be at once given, upon these Standing Committees. I apprehend, with regard to many of them, they certainly would be. Then there is another matter which also is worthy of attention, and that is that there is no provision in this Standing Order as to the time at which these Standing Committees shall sit, and it would be perfectly open to the House, if there proved to be difficulty in other respects, to determine that these Standing Committees should sit after any questions have been put on one of the days of public business during the ordinary time of the sitting of this House for public business. That would get rid of one of the serious difficulties to which the noble Lord has called attention. My Lords, I consider this matter of very great importance, and I firmly believe that the result of appointing these Committees would be that both the legislation initiated in your Lordships' House and the legislation which comes from the other House would pass into law in much better form than it does at present. The difficulties and the inconsistencies which are found at present after the passing of Acts would not be found; litigation would be avoided, and the legislation of the country would be rendered more effective. These are the reasons why I strongly support this Standing Order; and I can assure the noble Lord opposite (Lord Brabourne) that it is not from any desire to disfranchise any Members of this House, nor do I believe that they will find themselves in a position to perform one whit less of their duty to the public than they do at the present time.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON: My Lords, I desire to say a very few words upon this subject. There is one remark in which I thoroughly agree with the noble Lord opposite (Lord Herschell), that this is a subject of the greatest importance. The noble and learned Lord says that the business of this House, when Bills are in Committee, is not satisfactorily carried out. I believe that if there is one function of this House that is better performed than another it is when a Bill is in Committee of the House of Lords, when every Peer is in attendance, and those Peers who think that they know something of the measure under consideration give the benefit of their experience and their knowledge of the subject; and I think I am right in saying that there is no Bill that is discussed in Committee of the House of Lords but comes out of it in a better shape than when it went in. Now, the noble and learned Lord (Lord Herschell) says that he does not propose to deal with Bills of the first importance by Standing Committees. I understand him, therefore, to lay down that Bills of the first importance would be discussed as at present in a Committee of the House of Lords, and he reserves for those measures which he considers not of primary importance the reference to Standing Committees.

LORD HERSCHELL: I did not attempt to draw any distinction as to importance. It was what I called the contentious measures of the Session, which were sure to provoke discussion, that these Committees would not consider.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON: Then I understand the noble and learned Lord to say that he professes to set up Standing Committees for the purpose of dealing with measures that are not of a contentious character. Well, it strikes me that those measures can be equally well considered in a Committee of the House of Lords and are well considered now, but if there is a special measure which requires, according to the idea of the noble and learned Lord (Lord Herschell), special inquiry, your Lordships have power to refer that particular Bill to a Committee, upon which you elect those Peers who either take an interest in the measure or who may thoroughly understand the question. The noble and learned Lord says, supposing these Bills go to the Standing Committee, there is nothing to prevent any Member of the House from discussing them and moving Amendments upon the Report. I would ask the noble and learned Lord what chance he thinks a peer would have of amending a Bill that had passed through the ordeal of a Standing Committee. Would not the argument at once be put that the Bill had been thoroughly discussed and thrashed out in the Standing Committee upstairs, and therefore the time of the House should not be wasted upon it? The noble and learned Lord says that some Bills are not amended as they should be. But why is that? It is in the power of the House to discuss any and every Bill, and I venture to assert that the reason why Bills are unamended is that they do not require amendment. There are plenty of Peers in this House who take part in the business of the House, and who would bring under the consideration of your Lordships any Amendment to a Bill which they thought were necessary. I think that, with regard to the private legislation of this House, nothing is more perfect. I have always understood from members of the legal profession who practise before both Houses of Parliament that the Private Bill Legislation of this House is carried out even better than in the House of Commons, and I was astonished to hear my noble Friend below (Earl Cadogan), in moving this Standing Order, say that the public business of this House must give way to private legislation.

EARL CADOGAN: I said the reverse, that public business must come before the private business of the House.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON: My noble Friend talks of the Private Bill Legislation of this House as if it were a small matter. He says that it should be secondary to public business. Does not my noble Friend know that there are Bills that are promoted in this House, and which come up to this House for discussion, in which millions of money are involved, in which the interests of vast numbers of people are concerned; and, when my noble Friend below me (Earl Cadogan) says that it is perfectly easy for a noble Lord to sit upon the Standing Committees and also to attend to the private business of the House, I do not think he can have thoroughly looked into the matter. I had the honour of presiding over a Committee which dealt with the Manchester Ship Canal Bill. The undertaking involved, I think, something like eight millions of money, and we sat for 42 consecutive days. How would it be possible for me, being the Chairman of that Committee, to take any part whatever in any discussion that took place upon any measure referred to one of the Standing Committees? My Lords, I feel very strongly upon this matter. I think we had much better leave things as they are. The noble and learned Lord (Lord Herschell) says that contentious measures would not go to Standing Committees, and, therefore, I think I may assume that what would come before the Standing Committees would be matters of less importance than those greater measures which he himself proposes should be discussed in Committee of the whole House.

*THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I am not able to take quite the optimist view that is taken by the noble and learned Lord behind me, of the manner in which we deal with public business in Committee—public Bills, I mean, of the order to which the noble and learned Lord (Lord Herschell) referred. My impression is that they are very little dealt with in this House, that there is very little control exercised over them. It is not the business of the Government, whose Bills they mostly are, to criticize them, and nobody else thinks that it is their business to look after them. But I think that this matter is perhaps best argued by referring to what has actually taken place, and I examined for the purpose the Statutes that passed in the year 1887. I am only referring to the Acts which were put upon the Statute Book. There were 73 put upon the Statute Book during 1887. Of these seven are Money Bills and one a Mutiny Bill, and we must put them aside. Of the remaining 65 there were 2 that are what the noble Lord would call contentious measures—I mean they were the Irish Land Bill and the Crimes Bill. They, of course, received full discussion in Committee of this House, and that would never be changed. As to the remaining 63, I examined by reference to Hansard to ascertain how many of them were really discussed in this House. As a matter of fact, I find that 7 may be said to have been fairly discussed in this House. When I say fairly discussed, my interpretation and definition of the words fairly discussed is not exacting. I considered a Bill to be fairly discussed when there were two other Members speaking on it besides a Minister of the Crown. There were only 7 that came up to the limited requirement. There were 3 other Bills in respect of which one Member beside the Minister of the Crown spoke, and besides those 10 Bills there were 53 in regard to which there was no discussion in Committee whatever. Now, my Lords, it is impossible to say that adequate control and supervision have been exercised over these Bills. I do not think you can possibly take refuge in the happy view of my noble Friend that they were not examined because they did not require to be examined. If that is the case, surely revision of any Acts of Parliament at all would not be necessary. Now I turn to Private Bill business. Of course where there are all-important Private Bills there are many noble Lords who would take part in those, and the work of Standing Committees would be done by others of your Lordships. I should be sorry to have to confess that we cannot find in this House sufficient brains or sufficient assiduity to discharge both our public and private business, but if I am compelled to choose between the two, I must say, taking them all together, it seems to me a mere truism to assert that public Bills as a whole are more important than private Bills as a whole, and therefore I am unable to do otherwise than support a measure which has for its object to secure a more ample discussion of public Bills. There is only one other observation I wish to make, and that is to say that the question whether they shall or shall not subsequently be examined by a Committee of this House is a question of detail upon which we can decide afterwards. It is a question upon which there is a good deal to be said on both sides and upon which I confess I have a very strong opinion; but that is a matter which we can examine carefully afterwards. I only wish to refer to an observation made by noble Friend behind me—I may not yet name him, but who sits on the corner of the third Bench above the Gangway (Lord Beauchamp)—that these Committees on public Bills were a favourable opportunity for development of neophyte talent, that they were opportunities when bashful neophytes might come forward without a blush upon their countenances for fear that their utterances would be harshly judged. My Lords, it was a very touching argument, and I felt much moved by the consideration for this tender talent that we were said to be likely to crush; but in the course of the examination I made of the actual business of the House, I found that there was not one single man who took part in the discussions, that we did have who was not an old speaker or ordinary hack on one side or the other. I am afraid, therefore, that the neophyte argument must be abandoned.

LORD STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL: My Lords, I think our object

should be not so much to supersede Committees of the whole House as to strengthen and improve them. What you ought to aim at should be rather development than substitution; in short, instead of taking away this scrutinizing process, you should elect another scrutinizing process. In that sense, the true Amendment ought to leave the Committees of the whole House undisturbed and intact, and to subject Bills further to the consideration of the Standing Committees which are contemplated. I desire to express my full concurrence in what has fallen from the noble Duke on the other side (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon) and the noble Lords who have gone with him. I will add only one consideration in favour of not superseding Committees of the whole House. We must remember that we labour not so much under the pressure as under the scarcity of business. If you take away the Committees of the whole House, you are destroying so many opportunities of business in this Assembly, which we have not too often.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: As a Member of the Committee, I should like to say one word upon this very serious proposal. I am bound to confess that, in discussing this in the Committee room, I, for one, entertained a very serious doubt as to one particular part of this proposal. I admit, with my noble Friend behind me (Lord Colville of Culross), that there is a difficulty as to finding an adequate supply of Peers. I do not think my noble Friend's arguments have been wholly answered, if they have been touched, on that point, because when you come to consider the number of Peers who are necessarily incapacitated by age, by youth, by absence from the country on diplomatic appointments, on Colonial service, on military service, and other matters of the sort, and when you take the number which you necessarily would require for these Standing Committees, whether you adopt the maximum of 50, or whether you take a lower number, and then when you deduct from that such a list as that which hangs in the robing-room just outside where we are now discussing, it is perfectly clear that the available number for business will trench very largely upon the special class of ability to which you have hitherto looked for your Private Bill legislation, and the business of the House must accordingly suffer. But I do not regard this as the most important objection. The objection which weighed with me most, and still weighs greatly with me, is that which the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon) urged so strongly—the question of the Committees of the whole House. I think there would be great difficulty on the point; and to send Bills before the Standing Committees must very seriously shut them out from that amount of discussion which they formerly got in Committee of the whole House, and to examination which was extremely valuable. But, on the other hand, after saying all we can, I am bound to confess that the advantage seems to me, with a very large number of the Bills, to be so great, of subjecting them to the care and minute examination upstairs which they cannot receive in this House, that on the whole I am disposed to vote for the substitution, to a certain extent, of the Standing Committees for the Committee of the whole House; but I would point out to my noble Friend that this clause especially provides for a re-committal of the Bills after they have been before the Standing Committees, and I would urge very strongly on my noble Friend at the head of the Government that we should not allow that re-committal to become a mere formal matter. If we can secure by the phraseology of the Standing Order that as a matter of fact without difficulty—I will not say as the invariable rule, because that would almost do away with the use of the Standing Committees—but if we can provide that whenever it is desired without involving any large pressure on the part of individual Peers, these Bills shall be re-committed again to the House, then all I can say is that I think you will have gained one valuable advantage, and I do not think the disadvantage connected with it would be very large. But I do venture to urge most earnestly upon the House and my noble Friend who has charge of this particular Question, that the re-committal to the House should not be a mere formal matter which can be invoked on special and great occasions, but that it shall be in the power of the House to agree to it whenever it desires.

*THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I am in favour of the policy of appointing Standing Committees, but I think the number proposed to form the Committee is too large. If you take four Standing Committees each consisting of 50 Peers, you take away from other business 200 noble Lords, practically exhausting the working power of the House, and I fail to see how you could get on with the Private Bill business with the small number of Peers you would have left. I think that part of the argument of the noble Lord opposite (Lord Colville of Culross) is quite answerable, but there is one simple remedy for that, and that is to reduce the number of Members in these Committees. I would suggest that that number of 50 should be reduced to 40.

THE EARL OF BELMORE: I think there is a great deal of force in what has fallen from the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Herschell) about the advantage of Standing Committees; at the same time I think that there will be disadvantage in withdrawing Bills from Committees of the whole House. It may occasionally happen, as the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon) pointed out, that a noble Lord, like himself, of great experience, may be engaged upon one private Bill for a very long period; but that does not happen very often. I have served in Committees of this House now for thirty years, and, according to my experience, the average length of time taken by each Bill is four or five days. I do not myself see why, because a Peer is appointed at the commencement of the Session upon one of these Standing Committees, he should necessarily absent himself from private Bill work.

*EARL CADOGAN: I quite agree with the suggestion made by my noble Friend that for the purpose of the discussion of the principle the first few lines of the proposed new Orders should be put to the House. I understand that the noble Duke in the Chair will put the words—

Then afterwards, if the decision of your Lordships is in the affirmative, the details can be discussed.

*EARL BEAUCHAMP: I hope your Lordships will not make the remedy too large for the evil. The only evil which I think has been made out is, that a certain number of Bills have escaped that vigorous criticism which they ought to have had. As regards the Session of 1887, which has been cited by the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury), I do not know that any safe deduction is to be drawn from that illustration. The circumstances of the present Parliament, in another place, have been so exceptional, the number of measures sent up have been, comparatively speaking, few, the attention of that House being so completely taken up by matters more or less bearing upon the question of Ireland, that I think a very limited amount of legislation could possibly have passed through the House, except upon the responsibility of Her Majesty's Government. Your Lordships know, of course, that Bills introduced by Her Majesty's Government, and supported by them, have all the advantages of Government drafting, and all the advantage of that supervision which they get from the various offices from which they emanate. Therefore, when you have, as in the Session of 1887, a large proportion of measures of that kind, as compared with the total measures of legislation, it is natural to suppose there will not be any very long or protracted discussions in Committee of this House. I am talking now of matters not of the first class. The noble Marquess also based his observations entirely on Hansard. Anybody who has followed Hansard knows perfectly well that our proceedings in Committee receive very scanty reports in that authority, and I do not think that because the names of one or two Peers only are reported as having taken part in the debates in the Committees, that it follows that the discussion was limited to them. Our Reports in Committee are very much condensed. What is really required, as far as I understand, is that there should be some Committee of Revision, and if that is so, I can quite understand that it would be advisable to appoint a Committee of Revision; but that is a very different thing from dividing the whole House (practically it comes to that)—the whole working power of the House—into Standing Committees. Then, again, I do not see what guarantee you can have, if your Standing Committees are framed at the beginning of the Session, that you would have upon that should be not so much to supersede Committees of the whole House as to strengthen and improve them. What you ought to aim at should be rather development than substitution; in short, instead of taking away this scrutinizing process, you should elect another scrutinizing process. Then, again, I do not see what guarantee you can have, if your Standing Committees are framed at the beginning of the Session, that you would have upon that follow the procedure in that House with respect to them. As I understand, the Grand Committees of the House of Commons are appointed at the beginning of the Session, but the Bills that go before them are brought up in Committee of the whole House, besides coming before the House on Report. I hope that it will not be the exception, but the rule, that all Bills that go before Standing Committees shall afterwards stand the light of their discussion in Committee of the whole House, so that any particular Bill may be considered not merely by learned Lords, but by lay Lords as well. I therefore support the Amendment of my noble and learned Friend.

LORD HERSCHELL: Personally, I should not be at all indisposed to Bills coming before the Committee of the whole House after they have been before the Standing Committees. I do not think any harm would result. My object is to secure a greater scrutiny of the Bills—it is not in any way to withdraw them from the scrutiny of the House. I believe in the case of nine-tenths of the Bills considered by Standing Committees of this House, the going into Committee of the whole House would be merely a matter of form. But, if that is done, I hope my noble and learned Friend will not press the first part of his Amendment. All Bills, as a general rule, would come before a Committee of the whole House. I hope the proposed Standing Order will be altered so as to allow Bills that have been before the Standing Committee to come before the Committee of the whole House, but, at the same time, I think that objection would be met by leaving in the words “unless the House shall otherwise order,” leaving the House to give directions in particular cases.

EARL CADOGAN: I join with the noble and learned Lord opposite in hoping that the first part of my noble and learned Friend's Amendment will not be pressed. I understand the noble and learned Lord to say that there are certain Bills which it would not be advisable to refer to Standing Committees, and I think he instanced Government Bills. I am not able quite to agree with that. I think it will be found that there have been many mistakes made even in Government Bills, and that they are not at all so well framed that it would be inadvisable to refer them to Standing Committees. As to the desirability of providing for the commitment of all Bills that have been before Grand Committees, I think the objection could be met by the omission of the word “not” in the last line but one of this paragraph, making the provision read—

“On the Report of the Standing Committee being received, the Bill shall be re-committed, unless the House so order.”

LORD FITZ GERALD: I am afraid I must press my Amendment. My desire is that the House should pronounce its judgment upon each Bill—I mean that there should be a distinct Resolution of the House before any one Bill is referred to one of the Standing Committees. As the Order is now proposed all Bills will go, unless the House otherwise order. The point of my Amendment is that no Bill shall go unless the House shall affirmatively order. I can instance many cases in which it would be exceedingly inconvenient to commit Bills to Standing Committees without any Order of the House. I want the House to exercise its independent judgment in every case upon the question: Shall this Bill be committed to one of the Standing Committees? In the majority of cases the House would probably say “Yes,” but there are other cases in which it would be considered unwise to make such committal.

LORD HERSCHELL: My noble Friend has said that in the majority of cases the House would probably make

EARL CADOGAN: Next I have to move an amendment in Standing Order XLII., which deals with Select Committees. We propose to omit the words—

“They [Judges or Counsel attending] are not to sit there or be covered, unless it be out of favour for infirmity; some Judge sometimes hath a stool set behind, but never covers; and the rest never sit on cover,”

And to substitute the words—

“And no man, except the Lords, shall be covered in the room in which the Select Committee is sitting.”

Alteration agreed to.

LORD FITZ GERALD: I have an Amendment to move in Standing Order LXII., which now reads as follows—

“The nobility of this kingdom, and Lords of the Upper House of Parliament, whether they be plaintiffs or defendants, are of ancient right to answer or be examined in all Courts upon protestation of honour only, and not upon the common oath.”

I propose to omit the words “or be examined.” My Lords, I have traced the history of this Standing Order. I find that in the year 1612 a noble Lord had been ordered by the Court of Star Chamber to answer upon oath, and a Committee sat to consider the matter. In their Report, which was brought up by the Earl Marshal, the Committee stated that they had examined the precedents, and after consideration they agreed that the nobility of the Kingdom and Members of this House had an ancient right to answer as defenders upon protestation of honour only. The Standing Order professed to be made on this Report, but went beyond it. This practice of the old Court of Chancery was to receive the Answer of a Peer on protestation of honour; but the evidence given orally, or in reply to interrogatories, was always given upon oath. Now, however, the practice in the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice is that there is no sworn Answer, and instead of an Answer the defendant has to put in a Statement of Defence; and, no matter whom the defendant may be, this statement is not made upon oath. The privilege was in the old days undoubtedly confined to Answers in Chancery, and if a Peer came as a witness on his own behalf, or as a witness inter partes, or in a criminal case, he was examined on oath.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I do not think, my Lords, that we should be justified in making a change in that which is traditional and customary law, dating, as the noble and learned Lord has shown, from very early times, without taking the precaution of examining, by means of a Committee, how far the privilege is inconsistent with the present state of the law. I do not think it would be for the convenience of the House, at this time of the evening, and considering how few Peers are present, to discuss a matter of so great importance.

LORD FITZ GERALD: I should be desirous in all respects to consult the convenience of the House; but to pass this Standing Order, in its present form, seems to me to be asserting a privilege which does not exist, and is contrary to law. If it is more convenient to the House that this matter should be discussed on the Report, I will withdraw the Amendment; but I confidently appeal to the noble and learned Lord who sits on the Woolsack that I have not misstated the law.

LORD HERSCHELL: I strongly object to any Amendment of these archaic and historical Orders, unless the whole matter is very fully gone into. It would be better not to touch them at all rather than give them fresh sanction without the most careful study.

EARL CADOGAN: I may remind the noble and learned Lord (Lord Fitz Gerald) that we are now in Committee “to consider the Report of the Select Committee on the Standing Orders relating to the conduct of Public Business,” and we should confine ourselves to the Report of the Committee. I may mention that the Committee during its deliberations distinctly confined itself to those Orders which related to public business.

Amendment withdrawn.

*EARL CADOGAN: Then, my Lords, on page 43 I propose the omission of the words providing that the Order concerning the precedence of the Earl of Banbury shall be read at the beginning of every Session; and also consequential words on page 45.

The Amendments were agreed to.

*EARL CADOGAN: On page 50, your Lordships will see that we strike out Standing Order No. LXXXVIII., which relates to Messages between this House and the House of Commons; and we propose to make the Order read thus—

“One of the Clerks of either House may be the bearer of messages from the one to the other;

Messages so sent may be received at the Bar by one of the Clerks of the House to which they are sent, at any time whilst it is sitting or in Committee, without interrupting the business then proceeding.”

The alteration was agreed to.

*EARL CADOGAN: Then, as to Conferences with the other House, we propose to amend the Standing Order so as to allow of the meetings taking place in the Painted Chamber,

“Or other room appointed in lieu thereof;” and to expunge the words directing the Commons to be uncovered.

Amendment agreed to.

House resumed.

Report of the Amendments to the Standing Orders to be received on Friday next; the amended Standing Orders to be printed.

ARCHDEACONRY OF CORNWALL BILL. (No. 12.)

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read, and discharged.

House adjourned at a quarter before Eight o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 15th March, 1889.

QUESTIONS.

THE ORDERS OF THE DAY—POINT OF ORDER.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask you, Sir, as a point of order, if there are any official means of accounting for the fact that two Notices of Motion in the name of the First Lord of the Treasury, one suspending the Standing Order as to time and the other shutting out Notices of Motion on Friday appear in the Times newspaper this morning and do not appear in the Orders of the Day?

*MR. SPEAKER: I cannot give any account of it. I saw them in the journal to which the right hon. Gentleman refers, but I did not see them on the paper.

MR. SEXTON: Thank you, Sir; I shall recur to the matter at the close of the questions.

POSTAL CHARGES.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) asked the Postmaster General whether he was aware that making ample allowance for the difference in exchange, the merchant in Austria can post 120 letters for £1 to England, whereas the merchant in England can only post 96 letters to Austria for the same money; and, whether he could state, since these countries are in the Postal Union, when the next Postal Union Conference will be held?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, University of Cambridge): I am quite aware of the fact brought to my notice by the hon. Member. The explanation is that, according to the Postal Union Convention, 25 centimes is fixed as the initial rate of postage; but, as only a few countries use the decimal currency, each State of the Union collects its postage in its own currency, avoiding fractions in calculating the equivalent to 25 centimes. In Austria 10 kreutzer is the equivalent adopted; and in this country 2½d. is the nearest equivalent. I do not see the logical connection of the hon. Member's second question, and I cannot say when the next Postal Union Congress will be held. No precise date has yet been fixed.

IRISH EVICTIONS.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) asked the Solicitor General for Ireland if he could state the exact number of actual evictions from agricultural holdings in Ireland during the year 1883 at the suit of the landlord; and how many of the number took place on estates under the Plan of Campaign?

*THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Madden, University of Dublin): The number of actual evictions of the class referred to in the first paragraph was 655 tenants and 118 sub-tenants. Of these, 129 tenants and 14 sub-tenants were evicted on estates under the Plan of Campaign.

MR. SEXTON: How many tenants have been deprived of the legal estate in their holdings by means of eviction notices?

*MR. MADDEN: I have not the figures at hand.

THE VOLUNTEERS.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) asked whether, if, during the temporary absence on leave of the officer commanding a brigade of Volunteers, the charge of the Brigade devolves on the next senior officer of the brigade?

*SIR H. E. MAXWELL (Wigton), on behalf of Mr. E. STANHOPE, said: If a Volunteer brigade should be assembled in a brigade camp and the brigadier should be absent, the senior Volunteer commanding officer present would assume command; but on other occasions there would be no necessity to replace the brigadier during his temporary absence.

MR. J. E. BLAKENEY.

MR. LANE (Cork Co., E.) asked the Solicitor General for Ireland whether Mr. J. E. Blakeney was still a magistrate for the county of Cork; whether Mr. Blakeney's sole qualification for being appointed a magistrate for the County of Cork was the fact of having been appointed agent on the Ponsonby Estate; whether it is a fact that Mr. Blakeney owns no property, and never even rented a house within the county of Cork; whether he has long since been dismissed from the agency, and left the district and county of Cork; and, whether, under these circumstances, it is the intention of the Lord Chancellor to continue him in the Commission of the Peace for the county of Cork?

*MR. MADDEN: I understand that the gentleman referred to is no longer a Magistrate for the County Cork, as upon resigning the agency of the Ponsonby Estate he likewise resigned the Commission of the Peace, his connection with the county having ceased.

ROMAN CATHOLIC MAGISTRATES IN YOUGHAL.

MR. LANE asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether there is any Roman Catholic Justice of the Peace resident in the Petty Sessions district of Youghal; and, if not, whether he will take steps to remedy such a state of affairs in a district chiefly inhabited by Roman Catholics?

MR. MADDEN: I am informed that there does not appear to be any Roman Catholic Magistrate in the Youghal Petty Sessions district. The Lord Chancellor of Ireland is ready to consider the names of any properly qualified Roman Catholics that may be submitted to him by the Lieutenant of the County, who is always glad to be in a position to submit such names.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): Will the hon. and learned Gentleman say whether the boycotting of Protestants in Youghal has ceased?

MR. LANE: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman say by what means the people of the locality can bring the name of suitable Roman Catholics under the notice of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, seeing that the Lord Lieutenant of the County is the Master of an Orange Lodge, and would certainly not recommend a Roman Catholic for the Commission of the Peace?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

DOUBLE INQUESTS.

MR. MONTAGU (Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the report in the Star of the 4th instant, of the double inquest in Whitechapel, from which it appears that Louisa Ellesden died suddenly in Spitalfields; that an inquest was held in that locality by the Coroner for North East Middlesex; and that, when the body was subsequently removed to the Whitechapel mortuary, which serves the entire district, Mr. Baxter, Coroner for the South East Division, held a second inquest; and whether he will take steps to prevent the unnecessary repetition of inquests, entailing inconvenience to the relatives of the deceased, and additional cost to the ratepayers in Whitechapel?

Mr. MATTHEWS: (1) The facts are correctly stated. (2) Mr. Baxter has written me a letter, in which he contends that the Statute of 1887 left him no option but to hold a second inquest. I cannot admit the soundness of this contention, and I consider that holding a second inquest was improper. If such a case occurs again, I shall consider it my duty to represent the matter to the Lord Chancellor, in order to prevent the occurrence of any such clashing of jurisdiction.

LORD LURGAN'S AGENT.

Mr. BLANE (Armagh, S.) asked the Solicitor General for Ireland if at Lurgan (county Armagh) Petty Sessions, held on the 5th instant, James McAleese brought an ejectment against a cottier tenant named Sarah Poland, of Derrytagh North, on Lord Lurgan's estate, and decree granted; if Mr. James Ford obtained an ejectment against a cottier tenant named Cairns, of Derryadd, and decree granted; if same farmer obtained a decree of ejectment against a cottier tenant named James Scullion, of Derryadd, both on Lord Lurgan's estate; if Mr. C. Brownlow, agent for Lord Lurgan, adjudicated in the cases; if the cottier tenants mentioned will lose the benefits of the 4th section of the Land Purchase Act of 1887; and if he will communicate with the Irish Land Commission, with reference to those ejectments, when arranging the proposed sale of Lord Lurgan's estate?

*Mr. MADDEN said, that the tenants referred to all held under weekly agreements, but none of them were on the estate of Lord Lurgan. Mr. Brownlow was one of eight magistrates who adjudicated on the occasion; but as he had no connection with the estates involved, there was no reason why he should not do so.

Mr. BLANE: Is the same gentleman the estate agent of Lord Lurgan?

*Mr. MADDEN: He had no connection with the estates on which the evictions took place. The hon. Member has been misinformed.

LETTERS TO ZANZIBAR.

Mr. JOHN TALBOT (University of Oxford) asked the Postmaster General whether there is any reason for a charge of 5d. per half-ounce being imposed upon letters from England to Zanzibar, whilst letters from Zanzibar to England are only charged half that rate; and whether the inequality can be redressed?

*Mr. RAIKES: Letters posted at the Indian Postal Agency at Zanzibar are charged 4½ annas per half-ounce, which is about the equivalent of the 5d. charged in this country on letters sent to Zanzibar. The French Post Office has recently set up an agency at Zanzibar, and I believe that, in accordance with French practice in other parts of the world, the initial Postal Union rate of 25 centimes the 15 grammes (about 2½d. the half-ounce) is accepted in prepayment of postage on such letters as may be posted at the French Agency. So far as the mails are conveyed by British packet, the French Post Office incurs no loss, as the postage more than covers the payment made by them to us for sea conveyance under the Postal Union regulations. As to the French mail lines, they are maintained more for political than for postal purposes, and the loss on the mails is apparently disregarded.

ARREARS OF RENT.

Mr. KILBRIDE (Kerry, S.) asked the Solicitor General for Ireland whether his attention has been called to the fact that at the Land Sessions, held at Listowel, county Kerry, on the 7th inst., the Commissioners reduced an aggregate rental (Messrs. Browne and Mulling landlords) of £408 3s. 2d. to £244 5s. 0d.; whether it is a fact that the presentment for the maintenance of extra police at the March Assizes in Kerry was £5,825; whether this cost for extra police is due to the fact that the landlords in many instances proceed for the recovery of the arrears of the rack rent after the judicial rent has been fixed; and, whether, in cases similar to the above, he will refuse the forces of the Crown for the recovery of arrears of rent which a legal tribunal has declared to be 65 per cent in excess of a fair rent?

*MR. MADDEN: I believe the facts are as stated in the question.

MR. KILBRIDE: If the hon. and learned Gentleman finds that the rent has been declared by a legal tribunal to be 65 per cent above a fair rent, will the forces of the Crown be lent to assist in its recovery?

*MR. MADDEN: I cannot answer such a question.

SEA BOARD COUNTY COUNCILS.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.) asked the President of the Board of Trade whether he could forward a Circular to the Sea Board County Councils, directing their attention to the first section of the Sea Fisheries Act, having reference to the formation of fishing districts, for the purpose of prohibiting the discharge of any substance detrimental to sea-fishing?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, Bristol, W.): The Board of Trade are about to issue the Rules which they have drawn up for the guidance of those applying to them for Fishery Orders. These Rules will be published very widely, and will be accompanied by a circular calling attention, amongst other matters, to the point referred to by the hon. Member.

LOCH GOIL AND LOCH LONG.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton) asked the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that the pollution of the waters of Loch Long and Loch Goil, by the deposit of dredgings by the Clyde Trust, is still persistently continued, such deposits amounting to many thousand tons per month; whether these deposits were first made with the consent of the Admiralty, under the view of the right of the Crown to the soil of these inland seas; whether, since the scientific Report on the pollution of these lochs, made in 1887, the Admiralty consent has been withdrawn; and whether the Government will take steps on behalf of the public to abate the nuisance now continuing in waters legally under Crown control?

Mr. Kilbride

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Butehire): I regret to find that the Clyde Trustees continue the deposit of dredgings in Loch Long, without any diminution of the amount. The consent of the Admiralty, which was given in 1862 to the deposit of certain dredgings, expired long ago, and did not apply to the present operations. The present deposits are entirely without the sanction of any Department of Government. While the action of this body of Statutory Trustees is open to grave observation, the persons with whom the remedy primarily lies are those who are directly injured. I pointed out in February last to a deputation of proprietors and inhabitants of the district that if a nuisance has been created they have their action at Common Law, that it would be difficult to justify the institution of legal proceedings at the cost of taxpayers in the interests of a comparatively small number of persons affected by a local nuisance, where there is no active injury to Crown property. I by no means imply, however, that the Government renounce their intention, if need be, to take measures for stopping what cannot be regarded as a proper exercise of statutory powers.

BUSBYHEAD PIT.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanarkshire, N.W.) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the inspector obtained his information anent the dispute at Busbyhead Pit from the workmen or the manager; and whether he will cause an inquiry to be made by some independent party into the facts of the case, since the men allege that they have documentary and oral evidence to prove the inspector's statement to be untrue?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the inspector that he obtained his information from the manager, as none of the miners were at the pit at the time when he made his visit. I consider the inspector to be an independent party, and I have requested him to make full inquiry from the men, and to report further to me on the matter.

MINING ROYALTIES.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN (Merthyr Tydvil) asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he would state, or if he would consent to a Return, showing what amounts have been paid to the Treasury annually, by way of royalties for minerals raised on the Crown lands of Wales, from the year 1860 up to the present time, and for what metals and minerals have such royalties been paid; what amounts have been received by the Treasury as royalty from "mines royal" on freehold lands during the same period, and what amount for gold and what for silver; what has been the approximate cost per annum of administering this department of the public service, and of collecting these royalties; and whether the Government intends in future to charge any royalty upon gold and silver obtained from mines royal on freehold property when such gold and silver is not being obtained at a profit to the adventurers?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I cannot state the particulars asked for in the first paragraph of the hon. Member's question without a Return; and a Return distinguishing the royalties received for each mineral for 28 years would be a long and costly business. As the total amount derived from these royalties has been less than £8,000 a year on the average for the last eight years, I do not think I should be justified in authorizing the expenditure of time and money necessary to obtain such a Return. As to royalties received by the Treasury from "mines Royal" on freehold lands during the same period, they were quite insignificant till the present financial year, when they amounted to £832. The cost of administering the Crown mineral property in Wales cannot be separately stated. The cost of collection and local supervision somewhat exceeds 8 per cent. The Commissioners of Woods and Forests will be willing to consider the claim of adventurers working "mines Royal" without profit to be exempt from royalties; but it must depend upon the circumstances of each case. I think the hon. Member can call to mind the case of a mine being sold to a company for, in shares and cash, £190,000, not so long ago. If the company in question were, in consequence of paying such a price, to make no profit, I should not consider that a reason for remitting the royalty due to the Crown. Until a few years ago, the Crown would have received one-fourth of the profits of the sale in question, and I am sorry that the Exchequer does not get such a share now.

CRIMINAL CHARGES.

MR. A. L. BROWN (Hawick) asked the Lord Advocate whether it was the case that, on the 24th day of October last, Peter Robertson, gamekeeper, Gala-shiels, was convicted by the Sheriff Substitute, at Selkirk, of an assault upon one James Brown, a convicted poacher, against whom he had himself lodged a charge of assault with the district constable; whether the Chief Constable of Selkirkshire, to whom the district constable had communicated the charge, did not transmit the same to the Procurator Fiscal of the county, who was thereby kept in ignorance of material facts; whether he will state whether the police are required to forward to the Public Prosecutor all essential information bearing upon a criminal charge undergoing investigation; and, if so, why the Chief Constable failed in his duty in this case; and whether he has declined to give Mr. Robertson's solicitor the information now asked for?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The statements of fact in the first part of the question are correct. The Procurator Fiscal was informed of the counter charge by the Chief Constable; and, on the information given, the Procurator Fiscal made inquiries and considered that there was no ground for such a charge. It is certainly the duty of the police to supply all essential information, and I am not aware that he failed in his duty in this case. The Secretary for Scotland has not declined to give the information now asked for. Robertson's solicitor, in reply to a request to know what the information was that influenced his decision not to interfere, was informed by the Secretary for Scotland that his judgment was formed on consideration of the case as submitted by the Solicitor himself, and after due inquiry.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL.

GENERAL SIR WILLIAM CROSSMAN (Portsmouth) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty if, with reference to the recent investments of the sums of £130,000 and £200,000 on mortgage of freehold estates from Greenwich Hospital Funds, referred to by the Comptroller and Auditor General in his Report on the Capital and Income Accounts of Greenwich Hospital for the year ending 31st March, 1888, he will state what is the rate of interest to be paid on these mortgages, and what margin of security the Admiralty consider necessary in investments of this kind?

THE CIVIL LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT, Sheffield, Ecclesall), who replied, said: The rate of interest to be paid on each of these mortgages is 3½ per cent per annum, and the margin of security is over 300 per cent in the first case and over 200 per cent in the second. The margin of security considered necessary in investments of this kind is about 200 per cent.

FACTORY INSPECTION.

Mr. RICHARD POWER (Waterford) asked the Home Secretary how often the Inspector of Factories had visited Waterford within the last three years; and, if he has made any Report as to the condition of the working classes in that town?

Mr. MATTHEWS: The Inspector of the district has visited the factories and workshops in Waterford seven times in the last three years. No special Report has been made on the condition of the working classes there.

KING LO BENGULA.

Mr. ALEXANDER M'ARTHUR (Leicester) asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Envoys from King Lo Bengula, now in London, are charged with any special mission; and whether the Government will avail themselves of this opportunity afforded by the presence of the deputation in London to impress upon the King their views with regard to the concessions recently made by him to Mr. Rudd and others?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, Toxteth): Lo Bengula's Envoys say that they were sent in order that they might report to him about the Queen and her country, and request her protection against foreign invasions and agree-sions; Lo Bengula has also asked for advice about the white men who came into his country to dig for gold, and he will be recommended not to grant concessions without careful consideration and advice, and not to give to any individuals a monopoly of enterprise in his country.

SCOTCH LEGAL PROCEDURE.

Dr. CAMERON (Glasgow, College) asked the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to the case of Alexander Murray, of Tarbert, Harris, tried at Lochmaddy on Friday last on a charge of reset and discharged; whether it is true, as stated in the Scottish newspapers, that Murray, having been apprehended at Tarbert, was brought to Lochmaddy, committed to prison, liberated on bail, and had again to travel from Tarbert to Lochmaddy to tender a formal plea of not guilty; that he was then cited to take his trial before the sheriff and jury at Inverness, and on arriving there found that, without any notice, the Procurator Fiscal had deserted the diet; that after returning to Tarbert he was again cited for summary trial at Lochmaddy; and that he had in all to travel about 400 miles at his own expense to meet the charge against him, which finally broke down; and whether he will recommend the Treasury to recoup Murray for the needless expense to which he was subjected by the abandonment without notice of the diet against him at Inverness?

*Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: My attention has been called to this case. The facts as to the preliminary proceedings at Lochmaddy are accurately stated. Lochmaddy is the Court nearest to Tarbert, the distance those places being 3 hours, sailing, and the fare 1s. 6d. The trial at Inverness was countermanded, as it was considered that, the principal delinquent having been already convicted on his own plea, Murray might be tried summarily at Lochmaddy so as to avoid expense. Notice was duly sent for Murray's information, but it was found that he had already left home for Inverness two days sooner than was necessary. The inconveniences suffered are, to a large extent, inseparable from the geographical conditions of the country; and for the long journey to Inverness the accused was himself responsible. As I stated to the hon. Gentleman yesterday I shall see whether any modification of the arrangement of pleading diets can be made, so as to mitigate the difficulties of the district.

SHANNON DRAINAGE BILL.

MR. PATRICK JOSEPH O'BRIEN (Tipperary, N.) asked the Solicitor General for Ireland whether he has received from the Shannon or Limerick Board of Conservators, more than three months ago, a Petition in reference to the proposed Shannon Drainage Bill, and the serious injury that would accrue to the valuable salmon, trout, and eel fisheries of the river in the event of said Bill being passed; whether the only reply the Board of Conservators have received was a printed acknowledgment of the Petition; and whether, having regard to the great importance of the subject, he will cause a satisfactory and speedy answer to be returned to the body referred to?

*MR. MADDEN said, that the Memorial in question had been received, and was duly acknowledged. The prayer of the Memorial was that the Bill, before it became law, might be referred to a Select Committee. This would be the natural course after the Bill had passed a Second Reading, and the Memorialists would be so informed.

BURGLARS AND CORPORAL PUNISHMENT.

MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has received the following presentment lately made by the Grand Jury of Hampshire, with the approval of Mr. Justice Hawkins—

"That, owing to the increase of the crime of burglary, we would suggest that when burglars are found in possession of firearms or other dangerous weapons, the law should provide that such persons should be liable to corporal punishment, and that this punishment should also be inflicted on persons convicted of brutal violence towards women and children;"

and, if the Government will take any steps to carry out this presentment of the Grand Jury?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; I have received such a presentment. The infliction of corporal punishment is contrary to the spirit of recent legislation, and the Government would not propose to revert to this system of punishment unless there were strong grounds for supposing that the present law is not sufficiently deterrent in the case of the crimes referred to. There may, however, be cases where the violence is exceptionally brutal, and where the evidence of identity is beyond question. In such cases the application of corporal punishment might have a useful effect. I will consult the Lord Chancellor whether any amendment of the existing law is desirable or necessary.

GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS AND COUNTY COUNCILS.

MR. HANDEL COSSHAM (Bristol, E.) asked the President of the Local Government Board whether gentlemen in Government employ, and in receipt of salaries from the State, are eligible for County Councillors or Aldermen?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's-in-the-East): The fact that a person is in Government employ, and in receipt of salary from the State, does not render him legally ineligible for the office of County Councillor or County Alderman. With regard to the view of the Government on the question whether members of the Civil Service should be permitted to become candidates for County Councillors, I can only refer the hon. Member to the reply which was given by the First Lord of the Treasury to a question on this subject on the 6th of December last.

THE COASTGUARD.

MR. BOND (Dorset, E.) asked the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the Coastguard will participate in the proposed increase of pay to the signalmen of the Royal Navy whilst serving afloat for annual exercise?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (LORD G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): Not under existing regulations, but a proposal has been put forward, and is now under the consideration of the Board, to give the Coastguard signalmen, when embarked, an increase of pay.

COUNTY COUNCILLORS.

MR. SEALE-HAYNE (Devon, Ashburton) asked the President of the Local Government Board, whether, having regard to the state of the law, which permits clergymen and ministers of religion to become members of county but not of municipal councils, he will deal with this question in the Local Government Bill of this Session, or give facilities for the passing of a short Bill removing the anomaly?

*MR. RITCHIE: It is not proposed by the Government to introduce a Bill this Session altering the law as regards existing disqualifications for the office of Town Councillor, and I cannot undertake that, if any such Bill should be introduced by a private Member, facilities would be given for the consideration of the measure in preference to that of other Bills.

PROTECTION OF RAILWAY SERVANTS.

MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.) asked the President of the Board of Trade whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the Circular Letter of the 19th December last as to the regulations for the protection of plate-layers and fogmen, and the replies of the railway companies to that Circular Letter, and any other communication from the railway companies since the issue of the Circular, stating what they propose to do by way of amending their regulations, as suggested in Major Marindin's Report on the Syston accident, or otherwise to prevent risk?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. Hicks Beach, Bristol): I think I shall probably be able to lay some papers on this subject on the Table when the correspondence is complete.

THE SPECIAL COMMISSION.

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Mayo, S.) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, seeing that counsel for the Times have not produced before the Special Commission certain prisoners who allege that temptations have been held out to them by Mr. Andrews, Governor of Downpatrick Prison, policemen, and other persons acting for the Times, to induce them to concoct evidence against Members of this House and others, he will now consent to afford some means for inquiring into the truth of those allegations, seriously affecting the honour of the Government on the one part, and then charged before the Special Commission on the other part—namely, by a public investigation on oath?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I imagine the means for inquiring into the truth of the allegations which the hon. Member desires is already provided by the Special Commission, before whom it is in the power of any of the defendants to call M'Nulty and Mullet and examine them upon oath.

MR. SEXTON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Commissioners have decided that their function is simply to inquire into certain charges and allegations made against Members of Parliament and others in the case of "O'Donnell v. Walter"; whether they have declared that it is not in their power to extend the scope of their inquiry; and whether it is in the power of the House to ascertain whether officials in the service of the Government have been employed to suborn perjury?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe it is in the power of the Commissioners to call any of these persons before them.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has seen in the report of the proceedings before the Royal Commission on Tuesday last that Timothy Coffey, a witness for the Times, swore that a member of the Irish Constabulary asked him to make certain statements before the Royal Commission, and assured him that he would be remunerated if he gave valuable information, and whether he will cause inquiry to be made into the truth of these allegations; whether the solicitor of those who are charged by the Times before the Commission will be allowed access to all official information in regard to the charges made against his clients which, as stated by the Times on Thursday, was placed at the disposal of the solicitor of that journal, and whether, as in the case of the Times, Mr. Anderson will place at his disposal any reports that he has received in regard to the actions of Mr. Lewis's clients; and whether the names of the police constables and the magistrates who furnish the Times with tabulated information will be given on application to Mr. Lewis in order that he may apply for all or any of that tabulated information that he may deem it in the interests of his clients to possess?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not seen the proceedings; but I understand that the witness referred to is the one whom the Commission committed for contempt on the ground that, by his own showing, he was utterly untrustworthy. I have more than once stated in the House the desire of the Government to furnish all legitimate information either to the Commission or to parties charged before the Commission, and I have further stated that the proper method of obtaining such information is the ordinary one of writing a letter to the Irish Government, asking for the information which is required. Any application of that kind from Messrs. Lewis will be dealt with without unnecessary delay.

MR. SEXTON: Will the Government place in the hands of our solicitors all the information at present placed at the disposal of the Times?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I shall wait until the application is made before I answer it.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, as the case of the Times before the Special Commission has closed without Mr. Robert Anderson having been called as a witness, he will now answer the questions which were put to him by the hon. Member for the Rugby Division on March 5th?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed that Mr. Anderson did hand to a witness named Le Caron, certain letters which had been written by Le Caron himself confidentially to Mr. Anderson under a pledge that they should be given to no one but Le Caron himself. Mr. Anderson did give Le Caron a letter of introduction to Mr. Houston, after having unsuccessfully advised him not to come forward as a witness. Mr. Anderson culled out from letters he had received from Le Caron those which related to private matters, and were not necessary for the purpose of giving evidence. Mr. Anderson is not aware whether the documents remained in Mr. Houston's custody. I have not been able, from such reports as I have seen, to verify the whole of the hon. Member's account of Le Caron's evidence, but I must decline to ascertain or to express any opinion whether Le Caron's evidence is true. That is a matter for the Special Commission to determine. Although Mr. Anderson acted without my knowledge or sanction, I think he acted properly in handing to Le Caron documents which had come from Le Caron, and which were necessary to enable him to give full evidence on any matter that the Commission deemed material.

SIR W. HARCOURT: May I ask why Mr. Anderson was not called before the Commission to explain his conduct, according to the pledge given in the House by the Home Secretary?

MR. MATTHEWS: I gave no pledge on the subject. I stated what Mr. Anderson informed me—that he had been summoned—but I cannot give an explanation why the counsel representing the Times has not called upon him. It is probable that Mr. Anderson will still be called at a later stage.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Did those papers of Major Le Caron belong to Mr. Anderson or to the Government?

MR. COBB: Did Mr. Anderson tell Major Le Caron, "that Mr. Houston was a gentleman upon whom he could rely implicitly, and that Houston had been selected as representing the interests of the prosecution?"

MR. MATTHEWS: I am not aware. I have given all the information in my power. I apprehend that the documents belonged to Le Caron.

MR. SEXTON: Was Mr. Anderson authorized to hand over to Le Caron documents necessary for his evidence in Court, and what has become of the portions of the documents handed over to Houston which were not used by Le Caron in Court?

MR. MATTHEWS: I informed the hon. Member that Mr. Anderson acted without my knowledge and without my sanction. If he wishes for further information he must put a question on the Paper.

MR. SEXTON: The right hon. Gentleman said that he approved Mr. Anderson's action in handing the papers to Le Caron. Does he also approve of allowing those papers to be further committed to Houston, and what has become of the portion of the papers handed over to him which were not used by Le Caron in Court?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have stated that I thought that Mr. Anderson acted rightly in giving to Le Caron documents which had emanated from him and which were legitimate ones for him to refer to in order to give fuller and more accurate information to the Commission. To that expression of opinion I adhere. The hon. Gentleman asks about certain other documents, and of those I know nothing.

MR. SEXTON: Was Le Caron authorized—[Ministerial cries of "Oh, oh!" ]—perhaps you would like the adjournment of the House? Was Le Caron authorized by Mr. Anderson to hand to Houston documents given to Le Caron because they were necessary to his evidence; and what has Houston done with the remainder of the documents handed to him which were not used in Court in his evidence?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have given all the information in my power. The documents were handed to him for the purpose of being used in evidence, and have been published to all the world.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): If these were private documents of Le Caron's, I would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he considers that the documents which Le Caron swore had been sent, over a period of years, to the Government, and for which he had received money from the Government, remained the property of Le Caron after the payment of the money?

MR. MATTHEWS: When I stated that the letters remained the property of Le Caron I stated the ordinary rule of law—that the writer of a letter does not part with the property in it. As for the rest of the hon. Member's question, I must decline to answer it.

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman inquire whether all the documents were used in the Commission, or whether any of them remained in the hands of Houston?

MR. MATTHEWS: The hon. Member must put a Question on the Paper, and I will then consider whether I can answer it.

SIR W. HARCOURT: In view of the answers which have been given in connection with Mr. Anderson, I beg leave to give notice that on the Vote on Account relating to the Metropolitan Police I shall call attention to the conduct of Mr. Anderson in handing over confidential documents without leave from the Secretary of State, and its bearing upon his position as Assistant Commissioner in charge of the Criminal Investigation Department of the Metropolitan Police.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been directed to an allegation in the first leader of the Times of the 14th of March that, while the case for the Times was proceeding before the Special Commission, official information was placed by the Government at the disposal of Mr. Soames; whether the official information has been imparted at the request of the Times, or spontaneously offered; and, if the latter, by whom it has been offered; whether his attention has been directed to the following statement in the article in question:—

"We have no doubt similar information will be in like manner at the disposal of Mr. Lewis if he thinks he can make any use of it;"

and has such information been supplied?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My right hon. Friend has asked me to answer the Question. The information to which the hon. Member alludes was imparted at the request of Mr. Soames. I have observed in the House more than once that the Government desire so far as is possible to deal equally by all parties appearing before the Commission. Some information has been supplied to Mr. Lewis in the manner suggested.

MR. MAC NEILL: Was the information supplied to Mr. Soames supplied by the advice of the first law officer of the Crown?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The information has nothing to do with the first law officer of the Crown. The Government acted in accordance with what they conceived to be their duty.

MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS IN SCOTLAND.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dundee): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate, what are the intentions of the Government with respect to legislation against corrupt practices at municipal elections in Scotland.

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: Definite proposals upon this important matter have been under consideration; but, having regard to the other legislative engagements of the Government, I cannot at present give any undertaking on the subject.

POLITICAL PRISONERS.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether, pending the investigation into the rules observed in Irish prisons, he will use his influence with the Lord Lieutenant to induce him to issue a Prisons Order in Council to suspend the rules which require that a prisoner having himself clean clothes and being a cleanly person should be clothed in prison dress and have his hair cut, and his beard (if any) shaved off; to allow prisoners to be furnished with books; to provide prisoners who are accustomed to a generous diet with such additions to the prison dietary as may be advantageous to their health; and to separate those who are imprisoned for offences, the motive of which was political rather than personal, from hardened and habitual criminals?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member's Question refers to more than one kind of modification of existing prison rules. He desires, in the first place, to make prison more comfortable; in the second place, to draw a distinction between prisoners according to the motives which have actuated them; and in the third place, to carry out certain alterations which I myself suggested on Wednesday last. As the object of all imprisonment is to deter offenders, I do not see that there is any adequate grounds for adopting the first of his proposals. As regards the second, I believe all efforts at classifying prisoners according to the motives of their offences have hitherto proved ineffectual, and I certainly cannot embark upon any undertaking of the kind, except under the advice of competent authorities. As regards the third suggestion, however, I am considering whether it would be expedient to advise the Lord Lieutenant to carry out, without unnecessary delay, the ideas which I laid before the House the day before yesterday.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Does the right hon. Gentleman wish the House to understand that the provisions of the Prisons' Act of 1877, classifying prisoners according to their offences have proved ineffectual?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, I made no comment as to whether they were right or wrong. I intended to indicate that the elaborate classification according to motive has hitherto proved impossible to carry out.

THE PONSONBY ESTATE.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether his attention has been called to a letter in the Freeman's Journal, of 13th March, in which Mr. H. H. Townsend, agent for the syndicate which has bought the Ponsonby estate, declared it is the intention of the syndicate to evict all the tenants who do not purchase their holdings or otherwise settle on terms proposed by the Syndicate; and whether he will draw the attention of the Land Purchase Commissioners to the pressure thus brought to bear upon the tenants, and suggest to the Commissioners any steps which may protect the tenants from practical compulsion?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have seen the letter to which the hon. Gentleman alludes. It in no way conveys the meaning which he appears to attribute to it. I have no doubt the Land Commission will take note of any circumstances which may render a sale under the Ashbourne Act inexpedient or illegal.

YOUGHAL.

MR. LANE (Cork Co., E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, whether any informations were sworn indicating a probable disturbance of the peace in the town of Youghal upon any one of the anniversaries of the death of O'Hanlon; if there were, would he lay them upon the Table of the House; and, if not, would he state upon whose application those large bodies of extra police were sent to Youghal?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not had time to obtain a report on the subject, but the hon. Member must be aware that the police do not require a sworn information before taking precautions they may think necessary for the preservation of the public peace.

PEMBA AND ZANZIBAR.

SIR JOHN KENNAWAY (Devon, Honiton): I beg to ask the Under

Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is a fact that Her Majesty's Government have consented to unite with the German Government in a blockade of the islands of Pemba and Zanzibar, in substitution of a blockade of the coast?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): I shall be much obliged if my hon. Friend will postpone his Question until Monday.

FATHER M'FADDEN.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, during the confinement of Father M'Fadden, who is at present a prisoner in Derry Gaol, one warder is specially told off to guard the prisoner; and, if so, from what motive; and was the same course taken when Father Stephens was in confinement in the same prison, at the same time as Father M'Fadden, awaiting his trial before the resident magistrates?

MR. A. J. BALFFOUR: The Prisons Board inform me that they have no official knowledge as to the disposal of the prison officers by the governor of any prison for the safe keeping of those committed to his charge. The governor is solely responsible for the custody of his prisoners, and is bound to take such steps as he may consider necessary.

THE BAMFORD POST OFFICE.

MR. HOYLE (Lancashire, S.E., Heywood): I beg to ask the Postmaster General, if the vacancy at the Post Office, Bamford, near Rochdale, has been filled; and, if so, whether the appointment has been made in accordance with the wishes of the principal inhabitants, as expressed in a memorial forwarded in the usual way?

*MR. RAIKES: Mrs. Grindrod, who is, I understand, the person on whose behalf the inhabitants petitioned, has been nominated Sub-Postmistress at Bamford and, if eligible and able to perform the duties of the office in a satisfactory manner, she will in due course be appointed.

THE METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS.

SIR J. COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): I beg to ask the hon. Member for the Knutsford Division of Cheshire, whether tenders for the construction of a portion of the Blackwall Tunnel scheme have been, or were to be, opened by the Metropolitan Board of Works on this day; and, whether, in view of the fact that this Board will cease to exist in a few days' time, it is their intention to take any action which will commit the County Council with reference to such tenders?

MR. TATTON EGERTON: In answer to the Question I have to inform the hon. Member that the Board have, after a discussion of two hours and a half, opened tenders for the Blackwall Tunnel, and have approved the lowest. They have so informed the contractor. The contract will come up for sealing at the next meeting of the Board.

LORD R. CHURCHILL (Paddington, S.): May I ask the President of the Local Government Board, whether, in view of the fact—and notwithstanding his strong expression of opinion yesterday—that the Metropolitan Board of Works have proceeded to consider tenders for this project and have accepted one of them, he is prepared, as President of the Local Government Board, to intimate either to the County Council or to the ratepayers of the Metropolis any measures which may be open to them to take to render absolutely nugatory what appears to be a very gross abuse of authority?

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Motion in favour of the acceptance of this tender was first negatived, but that by some strange ruling it was put by the chairman and carried; whether the tender accepted is £38,000 over the estimate formed by the chief engineer; whether the contract is to be confirmed next week; and whether the right hon. Gentleman will exercise his powers under the Act to arrest this shameless action.

*MR. RITCHIE: After what took place last night I at once caused a letter to be written to the Metropolitan Board of Works. It is to the effect that the President of the Local Government Board wished his opinion to be conveyed to the Metropolitan Board of Works that action, such as that suggested, would, in the circumstances, be very inexpedient, and expressing a strong hope that the Board would not proceed to bind their successors in a matter of so much importance; but that they would leave the matter open for the consideration of the London County Council on their resumption of office. I have no knowledge of what took place other than that of which the House has been informed by the hon. Member for the Knutsford Division of Cheshire. I would point out, in reply to my noble Friend, that section 109 (1) of the Local Government Act is as follows—

“Subject as in this Act mentioned, the appointed day for the purposes of this shall, in each county, be the 1st day of April next after the passing thereof, or such other day, earlier or later as the Local Government Board (but after the election of County Councillors for such county on the application of the Provisional Council or County Council) may appoint, either generally or with reference to any particular provision of this Act, and different days may be appointed for different purposes and different provisions of this Act, whether contained in the same section or in different sections or for different counties.”

In the circumstances of this case, I think, if the Local Government Board were to receive from the Provisional Council of the County of London an application to advance the appointed day, either with reference to this particular power of entering into contracts or generally, prior to the contract being sealed—which I understand is to take place on Friday next—it would be the duty of the Local Government Board to give such application their most careful consideration.

MR. LAWSON: To elicit the truth, I should like to ask the hon. Member for Knutsford Division of Cheshire whether the tender accepted by the Board was for £318,000, and that the estimate of the Chief Engineer was £280,000, thus making a difference of £38,000 between the estimate and the tender?

MR. TATTON EGERTON: The hon. Member's figures are perfectly correct. But I should like to remind the House that the estimates of the Engineer did not include the liability which the contractor has to undertake of any accident taking place in the works, which are unprecedented and which have never been tried on so large a scale before.

SIR J. COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): Did the Metropolitan Board of Works receive from the County Council a request not to accept the tender?

MR. TATTON EGERTON: Yes, it is so.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the hon. Member for the Knutsford Division of Cheshire, as representing the Metropolitan Board of Works, whether the Board will postpone the consideration of any further grants of pensions to officers of the Board, and leave the question to be decided by the London County Council?

MR. TATTON EGERTON: The Board of Works have no further applications for pensions beyond those which are on the Board's agenda paper to-day, and which have been recommended for approval.

FIRST-CLASS MISDEMEANANTS.

MR. CHANNING: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he proposes to bring in a Bill to provide that persons convicted of offences under the Vaccination Acts, or of obstructing the highway by religious services, or of other offences of similar character, and sentenced to a term of imprisonment, should be treated as first-class misdemeanants?

MR. MATTHEWS: I should have been better able to answer the Question if the hon. Member had specified “the other offences” which he considers to be of a “similar character” to offences under the Vaccination Acts and the Highway Acts. The magistrates have already the power of largely mitigating the punishments inflicted on summary conviction of substituting a fine for any imprisonment, and possibly (although this is a matter of doubt) of ordering the offender to be treated as a first-class misdemeanant; and I wish they would use those powers more freely in some of the cases which the hon. Member has in view. But I have known cases under the Vaccination Acts where a parent is guilty of cruelty to his children and selfish disregard of the public welfare, with no good motive whatever; and cases under the Highway Acts, accompanied by riotous conduct and serious public nuisance, which are not deserving of lenient treatment; and I should not be prepared to bring in a Bill of the sweeping character described by the hon. Gentleman making imprisonment as a first-class misdemeanant in all cases the only penalty for offences of that kind.

PROSECUTION OF THE LALAH

MR. PICKERSILL: I beg to ask the Attorney General whether or not the prevailing is the common law and person convicted upon indictment of an assault upon a Judge can be punished with flogging and if so whether he will state the authority?

MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: Sir R. E. Webster has of Wigan. By Section 25 of the Statute Statute 4 Will. IV. c. 25 as amended by the 6th Statute of the Statute Statute 24 Vict. c. 2 a person committing a felony after a previous conviction can upon conviction for such second offence be whipped. The person in question was indicted under the Statute upon the charge of a conspiracy to murder. It was, I believe, under the Statute to which I have referred that the Chief Justice purported to order the whipping. As I have already stated in this House, that punishment was, in my opinion, illegal.

MR. MACNEILL: Were steps taken for the removal of the Chief Justice?

MR. R. E. WEBSTER: The Under Secretary of State for the Colonies has already stated that the Chief Justice was removable by the Governor and Council of the Colony, subject to an appeal to the Home Authorities.

THE TWELVE O'CLOCK RULE.

MR. LABOUCHÈRE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is correctly reported in Hansard, vol. 322, page 1,466, on the Debate upon the Rule of Procedure respecting the right of a Minister of the Crown to move the suspension of the 12 o'clock rule--

"The object in view was to afford the opportunity of closing a great Debate in a manner which would conduce to the proper conclusion of very grave and important Questions. It would be obviously improper that the Minister, or the Member of the Opposition, who had to wind up a very important Debate should be exposed to the necessity of crowding his observations into a few minutes."

and whether he is prepared to assure the House that the suspension of the 12 o'clock rule will only be moved on such occasions during the present Session?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I have already dealt with the question of the 12 o'clock rule in debate and in answer to questions put to me last Session on the subject. If the hon. Member desires me to do so that I entirely deny I entered into any engagement with the House as restrictive as that which he would put into my mouth. I referred to a great debate by way of illustration of the use of the provision of the Standing Order and it would obviously have been absurd for a Minister to deny to himself the power to move to suspend the order with regard to supply, which, under present conditions is frequently the most urgent business the House has to consider.

ESTATES IN CHANCERY.

MR. T. ROBINSON Gloucester: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill this Session to amend the law and practice in regard to the administration of estates in the Court of Chancery, with the view of preventing the great delay, and diminishing the heavy cost so frequently attending such administration in that Court; and whether he will consider the desirability of having a yearly official Return made of all estates in course of administration in the Court of Chancery, and of taking power to transfer the administration of any such estates as may be found to be insolvent into the Bankruptcy Court, to be wound up according to the practice of that Court and in sight of the public.

MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government intend to deal with the subject of the first part of the Question by carrying out as far as possible the recommendations of the Committee presided over by the Master of the Rolls, whose Report is on the Table of the House; but we are not at present able to say whether legislation will become necessary to give full effect to those recommendations. With regard to the second part of the Question, which requires much consideration, the Lord Chancellor will be communicated with.

COURSE OF BUSINESS.

SEXTON: With reference to the business of the House, I wish to call “Parliamentary Notices, House of Commons, Friday, March 15.

Notices of Motions.

At half-past 3 o'clock.

“Mr. W. H. Smith,—That the proceedings of the Committee of Supply, if the Committee be sitting at 12 o'clock this night, be not interrupted under the Standing Order ‘Sittings of the House’

“Mr. W. H. Smith,—That so much of Standing Order 11 as requires that the question shall be proposed ‘that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair’ be suspended this day; and that the provisions of Standing Order 56 be extended to this day’s sitting of the Committee of Supply.”

As there is no Notice of the Motion in the name of the right hon. Gentleman, either upon the notice of proceedings circulated to hon. Members or on the Orders of the Day now in our possession, I beg to ask whether those notices are mere inventions of the Times, or whether there is any reason to believe that any intermediary between the Government and the Times has forged them.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not responsible for anything except that which appears on the Papers of the House. I have no idea how these notices appeared in the Times newspaper.

‘THE MURDER OF INSPECTOR MARTIN.

MR. MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Solicitor General for Ireland whether he will fulfil the promise given yesterday, and say how many persons have been arrested in connection with the murder of District Inspector Martin?

MR. MADDEN: Thirty-eight persons were arrested, and either 20 or 21 were subsequently discharged. Of those discharged one has since been re-arrested, having since been identified as one of the assailants of Mr. Martin. These figures include all arrests.

CAPTAIN SEGRAVE.

DR. TANNER (Cork, Mid.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary what has become of Captain Segrave, the hero of Mitchelstown, who has been absent from his duties ever since I brought his conduct before the consideration of the House?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Captain Segrave has been on leave, and he will not be called upon to perform his magisterial duties again until we have received information from the Cape on the point raised by the hon. Member.

DR. TANNER: Could not a wire be sent to the Cape to find if Captain Segrave was not dismissed from his post there?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Documents cannot be transferred by wire, and it would not be fair to Captain Segrave to take any final action without such documents.

MR. MACNEILL: I have before called attention to the fact that these documents can be found at No. 25, Victoria Street, Westminster, the office of the Agent-General for Cape Colony in London.

DR. TANNER: I wish to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the columns of the Cape Gazette will be placed at my disposal in order that I may point out to the Chief Secretary the date of Captain Segrave’s dismissal?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will give notice of his Question.

—(Lord Randolph Churchill).

country has a right to expect from her efforts and sacrifices. But how under such a system can we expect to escape what the First Lord of the Admiralty himself described as the scandal of recent disclosures of mismanagement? The First Lord said rightly that the responsibility of undertaking expenditure must be with the Government, but of course, the Government must rely to a large extent on their subordinate and permanent officers. No one has been dismissed for the recent scandals that have occurred, and it is said that you cannot dismiss these permanent men because you gave them more to do than they could possibly accomplish. Whose fault was that unreasonable expectation? And who ought to have set it right? Why, of course, the head of the Department. But you cannot reasonably blame him, as you never gave him time to become thoroughly acquainted with the work of the Department and with its officials. He cannot judge what his men can do, or the fitness of those under him to do certain work. The country has never grudged the necessary payment for a good Navy, but it does grudge the large sums which are admitted on all hands to be absolutely wasted, admittedly without giving us satisfactory results. If the present Chancellor of the Exchequer had been allowed in 1871 to carry out those reforms in local government which he had got his hands upon, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax, who already knew the details and ropes of the Admiralty, had been allowed to carry on and carry forward the reforms initiated by the right hon. Member for Edinburgh, it is not unreasonable to suppose that we should not have been kept waiting 18 years afterwards for the necessary reforms in both those Departments. I do not want to depreciate the improvement which those statesmen effected in their respective Departments; indeed, in that which I understand best, my right hon. Friend the Member for Halifax laid the foundation for future reforms in the local government of the country, but it stands to reason that he would have been able to carry matters much further had he not been forced to commence by studying the details of what to him was an entirely new Department. But, alas for the country's interests, the present Chancellor of the Exchequer was in the Cabinet in order of promotion before the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax; and the management of our Navy was considered a Department of greater dignity with higher emolument than the Local Government Board. Therefore, in justice to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he was placed in the department of which he was comparatively ignorant, and the right hon. Gentleman for Halifax was placed in a Department of which he was comparatively ignorant, because the Department on which the health and good government of the country depend is considered of secondary dignity, importance, and emolument to the Navy, Army, &c. I repeat, it was in personal justice to an individual that that transfer was made. But where was justice to the country in this transfer, and is not the system pernicious which places personal justice to the individual in conflict with justice to the interests of the nation? Well now, to take a case from the Conservative side. I had the honour of sitting for three years in the 1874 Parliament under the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bristol, on a Committee to enquire into the Local Government and taxation of towns in Ireland. We soon found that the question could not be considered without taking the question of the whole Local Government of Ireland into consideration, and the different areas and duties of Local Government were so confused and overlapping that it was impossible to consider the urban apart from the rural side of the question. We sat for three sessions, the then Chief Secretary for Ireland showing as chairman patience, impartiality, and a thorough devotion to the work, which won for him the esteem and confidence of both sides of the Committee. The evidence showed an unexpected amount of scope and capacity for Local Government in Ireland, and led to a report upon which, undoubtedly, the right hon. Gentleman would have been able to found a Bill at once liberal and safe for the Local Government of Ireland, which might if adopted then have done much to engage the attention of the active spirits in Ireland in Local Government, given them an opportunity of representing effectually their interests and opinions without tumult or disturbance, and would thus have gone very far, I believe, in training them for self-government and in preserving order. But Lord Carnarvon retired just then from the Colonial office; and the Chief Secretaryship for Ireland, which probably has been for many years the most important and difficult office in the ministry, was, as it constantly has been, treated as an office of secondary dignity and importance. The very fact of the right hon. Gentleman having shown great ability and devotion to the office marked him out for promotion, as it is considered, from the Government of Ireland to the Government of our distant Colonies. He was transferred therefore to the Colonial office as a matter of justice to him, and Mr. James Lowther was appointed to succeed him at the Irish office, and nothing came of the labours of that important Committee. But where, I ask again, was the justice to the interests of the nation in that transfer? Did it produce compensating benefits in the Colonies? It became my duty subsequently, in order to support an Amendment which I carried against the right hon. Gentleman, to read up thoroughly papers connected with our African policy and the initiation of the Zulu War. For that policy, as Colonial Secretary at the time it commenced, Sir Michael Hicks Beach, the right hon. Member for West Bristol was officially responsible. It was perfectly evident from his despatches that the right hon. Gentleman's instinct was that that War would be a mistake; but being new in his office, he contented himself with strongly and repeatedly cautioning Sir Bartle Frere; but, new and inexperienced in his office, he did not feel sufficient confidence in his own judgment to restrain Sir Bartle, and, after strong and repeated cautions, gave him a free hand. Sir Bartle Frere, no doubt, thought that the Government at home did not feel confidence in themselves, but, as he always did feel absolutely confident in his own views, he went to war. No one now believes in the wisdom of the Zulu War, and to it may be traced all the trouble which followed in South Africa and which continues to trouble us there now. I firmly believe that these troubles in South Africa, as well as those in Ireland, from both of which we are still suffering, might have been averted by a consistent policy, had not the affairs of the two departments been in the hands of Ministers new to them. I refer any Member who wishes to convince himself of the truth of what I have stated to the Official Despatches of 1878-79 on South Africa. I will not detain the House by further instances, but I will appeal to any man who has watched the course of appointments and promotion on our Parliamentary Executive on both sides during the last 20 years, whether he could not point to instance after instance in which appointments to office or promotion have been fettered, and consequently injudicious, under the present system. Of course I know that it may be argued in reply to what I have said that it is very important to prevent the Public Departments of this country getting into a groove, and that a fresh hand coming into a Department from time to time introduces fresh life into it. But I may point out that the experience of late years shows that under a democratic constitution, such as we enjoy, changes of Government will be quite sufficiently frequent not only to ensure the infusion of fresh energy, but to make it very difficult to secure statesmen in the different Departments with sufficient Parliamentary experience and knowledge of the work of our public offices as Ministers of State. It would be, of course, absurd to contend that Ministers must be always confined to or have a vested interest in the Department in which they began official life. The talents developed by men in office, and the needs of the public service, will frequently require such changes, particularly in men of exceptional brilliancy, who may become Prime Ministers, but it should not be the rule to move men about from place to place without ever a chance of acquiring thorough knowledge of the work of the Departments and of the men under them who have to carry out the work, and whose work and promotion they have to apportion and direct. Surely such is not work to be entrusted to men inexperienced and ignorant—to mere apprentices in the department. I think it will astonish anyone who will take out as I have done, in the paper which I hold in my hand, the changes that have taken place in the occupants of the different offices when the same party is in power, to see how men have been moved about from office to office, hardly any of them having been allowed to retain the same office long enough to become thoroughly acquainted with and exercised in the duties they have to perform. The Conservatives quitted office in 1868, and returned in 1874. We find only five offices were filled by the same men in 1874 as in 1868, while 13 had new chiefs, and in 8 cases there had been more than one change of office during the same time. The Liberals left office in 1874 and returned in 1880. Only two Ministers, including the Premier, returned to their former offices, while 16 offices had new chiefs, and in no less than 16 cases had there been more than one change of office during these few years. The Conservatives left office in 1880, and returned in 1885. Here again, only two men returned to their previous offices, while 16 offices had new chiefs, and in 4 cases there had been more than one change of office in the period. The Liberals left office in 1885, and returned the very next year; yet, after that short interval, only three returned to their old offices, and 15 had new chiefs. The Conservatives left office and returned to it in the same year, 1886, but only six of them returned to their previous offices, while in one year 12 out of 18 offices were placed under new chiefs. Is it possible to conceive that the affairs of even an ordinary business—let alone the vast and complicated concerns of this great Empire—could be successfully managed with so little of that thoroughness of training or completeness of knowledge as can alone be possessed by men who serve some time, instead of being thus rapidly moved from one office to another, apparently hardly ever placed again in the same office, hardly ever having any chance of understanding their work thoroughly? Is it to be wondered at that our legislation is the constant theme of contemptuous comment by our Judges, or that the country is constantly exposed to dangers and difficulties which nothing but the tenacity, energy, and spirit of her people have succeeded in fighting her through, not under the wise guidance of, but in spite of the superficial, hasty, incomplete legislation and administration of, the Government of this country. It may seem somewhat presumptuous in one who has not been a Minister, and who, not having entered Parliament till he was 50, has never considered himself fit to be a Minister, to venture to criticize the formation of the Executive, and the conditions under which they are expected to work; but it is, according to the old proverb, the lookers-on who often see more of the play than the actors themselves, and those who have felt how very superficial and imperfect our present system is, are naturally led to study the cause of those defects. I do not wish to detain the House, or I could give other instances of the strange way in which Ministers are by both parties placed in the offices of which they have least experience, thus throwing away all the advantages of their knowledge and training previously acquired. In former days, when men came very young into the House and were put young into under-Secretaryships, there might be an advantage in giving men of exceptional ability and genius the experience of several Departments; but now that the affairs of the country have become vast and complicated, and when, unfortunately, few men are taken into the Executive sufficiently young to give time to serve an apprenticeship to one Executive office after another, the practical result, I do not hesitate to say, is a most superficial and inefficient way of carrying on the business of the country and of its dependencies. The opinions I have expressed are not confined to men like myself, who have never held, or sought to hold, office. I have discussed the subject frequently with men on both the front Benches, and I have rarely found any who have defended the present system of moving men about so rapidly and putting the round peg into the square hole and the square peg into the round hole. On the contrary, I have found those men who are most anxious to serve their country and to do their work thoroughly, complain bitterly of the injury to the country and to their chances of serving it with credit to themselves, owing to their having been moved so rapidly, even where it was nominally promotion, and just when they were beginning to feel that they were learning the work of their department and saw their opportunity of doing good work in it. Many Members of this House will remember the satirical reply of Mr. Disraeli (who could not resist a good hit at even his own acts), when remonstrated with by a man who understood Local Government, but knew nothing of trade, and whom he offered to make President of the Board of Trade. "Well, I suppose you know as much about trade as the First Lord does about ships." By the Resolution I am about to move I maintain that it is desirable at any rate to remove difficulties arising out of personal claims for promotion, from the path of the Minister who has to decide who is to be placed at the head of any vacant department. With this object I contend that all the great departments of State except those held by the Lord Chancellor and Prime Minister, should, as regards salary and dignity, be put on an equal footing, and that we should remove the most absurd anomaly of all, that of treating such offices as that of the Education Department, the President of the Local Government Board, upon whom depend the internal good government of England, or that of the Chief Secretary of Ireland, upon whose devoted head most of the important departments of Irish Administration are concentrated, as secondary departments of the State, only to be held by men till they have tried their 'prentice hand upon them, and shown sufficient ability to be transferred to some more dignified and higher-paid office, and their places supplied by some raw hand who has to practise upon them as the corpus vile of the Constitution. I do not, for a moment, suggest or believe that it is the difference in the pecuniary value of the different offices that produces the evil I complain of. I have no doubt that our Statesmen would prefer an office of higher dignity and importance at a sacrifice of pecuniary emolument. But the difference of salary is held to denote a difference of dignity and importance in the several offices; and it is that difference of dignity and importance that causes the supposed necessity for what is considered due promotion from one to the other. I will just sum up the present position of the twelve most important State Departments as they have been handed down from time immemorial, without material change. There are five Secretaries of State, a First Lord of the Treasury, and a Chancellor of the Exchequer, each receiving £5,000 a year; the First Lord of the

Admiralty, £4,500. [Sir G. TREVELYAN: And a house.]—The Chief Secretary for Ireland, £4,425. [Sir G. TREVELYAN: He has a house also.] And the Presidents of the Board of Trade, of the Local Government Board, and Education—who do not have houses—each with salaries of £2,000 a year. It cannot be for a moment contended that, in this commercial country, with its dense population, vast and complicated interests and problems, the Ministers who are to direct the Boards of Trade, of Local Government, and of Education are of less importance than the Secretaries of the Colonies, &c., or that the office of Chief Secretary for Ireland, who is at once Home Secretary, President of the Local Board, and chief of a number of important offices all rolled into one, requires a less able man at the head of it, or is of less importance than the office of Home Secretary or Secretary of the Admiralty or the Navy; and, again, no one will contend that for England the management of the Navy is a less difficult or less important department than the management of the Army. To equalize all, leaving present total cost the same, would reduce them to an average of £4,160 a year, while to level up and give each £5,000 a year would add only £10,000 to the payment of those who are responsible for the economical and efficient expenditure of about £60,000,000 a year. We ought to do one or other, to make it more easy than it is now to place in each Department the best man for it, and to keep him there so long as he is the best man for it, and no longer. The payment of the heads of our great Departments has been hitherto liberal, but not excessive, as compared with the payment for work requiring similar ability elsewhere. The manager of a great railroad and of other large establishments gets about the same salary permanently that the Minister at the head of the Navy gets temporarily; but it should be borne in mind that in autocratic Russia and in democratic France and America, you have men growing rich in office and by office, notoriously, from corruption and connection with the Stock Exchange, and any one who knows the frightful waste of public money and mismanagement and disaster which have in those countries arisen from their system will be most anxious to avoid anything of the same nature here. As a man of business, if the business were my own, I can only say that I should consider undue parsimony in these matters as waste and not true economy. I wish to repeat that I do not pretend to find fault with the Prime Ministers of great ability, Conservative as well as Liberal, who have during the last 20 years presided over the Government of this country. The blame attaches to the system which they have inherited, and which has interfered with the free exercise of their discretion and judgment, to an extent of which they and other men brought up under this system are perhaps themselves hardly aware. Of course it is not desirable that the House of Commons should interfere with the discretion of the Prime Minister in the appointments of the several departments, but what we can do, and ought to do, is to remove from his path personal difficulties in the way of his selecting for a particular appointment the best man. We may facilitate this by putting all the higher Executive Offices of the State, except of course those of the Prime Minister and the Lord Chancellor, on the same level as to standing and emolument. But there is another evil and a growing one in the condition under which the duties of Ministerial Offices are now discharged. I need only say a single word, for everyone admits the evil, but almost everyone submits to it. I mean the great and growing evil of expecting that Ministers are not only to attend to the increasingly heavy duties which are placed upon them as the Executive of this country, but also to undertake out-of-doors an immense and increasing amount of public speaking, absolutely incompatible with the proper discharge of their departmental and Parliamentary work. The talents and genius of our first-class statesmen are a national treasure, and too valuable to be wasted by this absurd practice. When Ministers and Members of Parliament made only one speech a year to their constituents, they put all they had to say about their department or about politics carefully into it. The speeches were worth reading, and were read, and were the source of most of the political education of the country; but who can read, does read, or would be profited by reading, all the voluminous and superficial talk and violent abuse that have taken the place of these valuable political speeches? Of course, every place likes to have a great man come and talk to it; but this, their amusement, is at the expense of the political education of the country, which is becoming as superficial and impoverished as the administration of the country is becoming enfeebled by this severe drain on the power of our statesmen. It is not a question that this House can legislate upon; we cannot give a Minister or a Member of Parliament a month's imprisonment, even as a first-class misdemeanant, for neglecting his duties to go on the stump; but we can protest—and I think it is a duty to protest—against a practice which demoralises and weakens the efficiency of the administrative and legislative powers of the Executive and Parliament.

MR. HOWORTH (Salford, S.): I rise with great pleasure to second the Resolution which has been moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Carnarvonshire (Mr. Rathbone), and I do so with more pleasure, because he has carefully, as he always does, avoided any party or political controversy, and has divested the question of everything except those matters which are interesting to us all. It seems to me that any one who reads carefully the history of the changes of Ministry in this country since the great French war can come to no other conclusion than that my hon. Friend has made out his case most completely against a system which inevitably leaves the choice of men to fill great posts to be made, not on account of the aptitude or special knowledge of the persons selected, but simply because there has been arranged a hierarchy of offices which renders it necessary to give a man a particular amount of prestige when he is asked to join a government. Under such a condition of things you cannot avoid, and you inevitably have in many cases, the appointment of men who are neither fitted by their antecedents, or by special gifts, to fill the posts to which they are appointed. Now it seems to me that it requires a peculiarly elastic Parliamentary conscience to justify the putting, in this way, of the round men into square holes. There is no doubt that a round man may be put into a square hole and that he is put into one very frequently, but it can only be done, to use the words of a worthy neighbour of mine, on the condition that he is a very soft man. A man of ordinary spirit and knowledge would refuse to be bound by the conditions of such a choice, which in reality must be intolerable and irksome to him beyond measure. Moreover, it seems to me that the remedy suggested is one that is easy in form and perfectly applicable in practice, and that it has other advantages besides those referred to by my hon. Friend. I cannot help thinking that one of the great evils in this country at the present moment is that the permanent officials have necessarily imposed upon them a greater weight than they ought to have in shaping the policy of the country. Of course, that is necessary under a system by which men are appointed to posts with regard to which they have no direct or special knowledge. It is obvious that in such cases they must depend upon the permanent officials. It is inconvenient and not Democratic in the best sense of the word, that Ministers in many instances should for a long period after their appointment be under the necessity of shaping their views not in accordance with the opinion they may have formed themselves after a study of the subject, but rather upon the conventional views which are held by the permanent officials. If we can emancipate Ministers from this influence, it seems to me that we should have a much more speedy response than we often have now to the demands which are made for economy and those other virtues which I am afraid are spoken about in this House a good deal more than they are put in practice. Then again, it appears to me that, in choosing a Cabinet, the Prime Minister very often has to make a selection of men upon principles which are not altogether desirable. Men are put into the Cabinet very frequently because they have filled posts of considerable prestige in connection with former Governments, and not because they are specially followed to discharge the particular duties of a Cabinet Minister, which are not merely administrative, but duties that require a good councillor and a man of broad views in shaping a general policy. Because a man is an able administrator, and fit to control a great Department in which expenditure takes place, it does not follow that he is better than or even as good as some other Member of the Government who is called upon to fill a post of smaller prestige. These are some of the reasons why, it appears to me, that it would be a great gain if we could destroy the artificial hierarchy of offices, and put all men, more or less, on the same footing and the same level, so that in appointing a man his distinct acquirements and aptitude for the work he has to do should be the first consideration, while the very last consideration should be his prestige and the necessity of appointing a man to a particular post because he might feel slighted if he were passed over. For these reasons I consider that my hon. Friend has made out his case, and very completely, and I have great pleasure in seconding his Motion.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word 'That' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words, "it is desirable that the Offices held by Members of the Cabinet (except those of Prime Minister and Lord Chancellor) should, as far as possible, be made equal in position and salary, so that, in making or changing appointments, no consideration of position or salary may interfere with or influence the selection of the Minister."—(Mr. Rathbone),

—instead thereof.

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand): I should have been glad if some hon. or right hon. Gentleman opposite had thought it right to rise in support of the Motion of my hon. Friend. I think it would have been, upon the whole, more satisfactory if those who are the natural successors of right hon. Gentlemen who sit on that bench had expressed an opinion upon the subject. I do not desire in the slightest degree to under-rate the importance of the Question, which has been raised by my hon. Friend in a speech which was moderate and fair and not directed against any party in this House. On the contrary it was simply an endeavour to review the practice of Governments in years past with the hope of suggesting some improvement in the system which has prevailed. But I must remind my hon. Friend who moved the Resolution that if we go to the very bottom of his complaint it would be found that it is directed against the Parliamentary system of government which prevails in this country rather than against the differences in salaries which exist between posts filled by Members of the Government and certain other posts. The hon. Member complains of the fact that in the formation of Governments men are not appointed to posts which they have filled in previous Governments, but to other offices. That is true, no doubt, to a very considerable extent, but I am not certain that the country has sustained very grievous loss because a man of proved ability in one post has been advanced to another where his abilities would prove of value to the country. I think that the country would lose rather than gain from the enforcement of the doctrine which the hon. Gentleman desires to lay down. The greatest duties they have to perform are those which belong to the head of a great Department. The practice at present is the result of the system under which the Government of this country is carried on, and unless the House or the country is prepared to substitute another system for it which will be quite independent of Parliament, it occurs to me that there would be the greatest possible difficulty in arriving at the accomplishment of the object which the hon. Gentleman desires. In ordinary occupations it is necessary for men to pass through a stage of apprenticeship, and similarly Ministers require training. There are numerous instances of men who have served in subordinate positions, and there shown abilities that have led to their subsequent promotion to higher places. It is desirable in considering this question to exclude all personal questions and to merely consider how the country could best be served. Under the present system, which gives the House of Commons power to dismiss any Government, the services of the most competent men on either side of the House are available. The hon. Gentleman desires to obtain men to fill the positions of head of each Department who are specially fitted. That is, no doubt, desirable, but it must not be forgotten that it is desirable that Ministers should have experience outside the Department over which they preside. It would be a very great misfortune if a Member of the Government was the only man who had any knowledge of the duties and business of his own particular Department, and if his judgment and opinion were not to be called in question by his colleagues. It is very desirable that the other Members of a Cabinet should be able to control and check any one Minister. The hon. Gentleman has referred to the question of salary, but this does not really affect the matter. A Minister who receives a lower salary does not necessarily occupy a lower position. There are frequent cases in which Ministers have, owing to their services being required in another Department, resigned one office and accepted another at a lower salary. This has been the case more than once in regard to the Chancellorship of the Duchy of Lancaster, and the same thing had recently occurred in the case of the present President of the Board of Trade—an able and accomplished Statesman. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Howorth) asks for absolute equality of salary, but there is no such equality in the responsibilities and duties of the respective offices. The work of some Departments is so onerous that any remuneration within reason would not be excessive, while there are other Departments which do not make by any means the same demands upon the health and strength of the Ministers at their head. The hon. Gentleman has referred to the permanent officials, who, he says, frequently under the present system, shape the policy of the normal head of the Department, and he referred to the getting of round men into round, and square men into square holes. I hope when he is called upon to form a Government, he will find the absolutely round men in the round holes. Sir, I trust that the House will not accept the motion of my hon. Friend, though I admit that the moderation and good feeling with which he brought it forward. I should be glad, indeed if we could have in our Ministers as heads of departments, that special knowledge which would enable them at once to take command and control, but we must make a very considerable change before anything of that kind can be done. All I can say is, in reference to the permanent officials, that no country is better served by its permanent officials than is ours, no matter what Party is in office. They lay the facts before us in the most correct and straightforward way, and then it rests with the Head of the Department to shape the policy on the full and complete information which he has got.

Mr. W. H. Smith

Unless we had greater permanence and continuity of policy in our system, I admit I do not see how the suggestion of the hon. Gentleman is to be carried out; and I do not suppose the hon. Gentleman would suggest a vital alteration of our Constitution. I do not believe that the change in remuneration even would have any material effect. I believe that the men who are appointed to these offices are appointed as a rule on the ground of their fitness. It is the interest of the Prime Minister to constitute the best Government he can have, and he selects his ministers from experience of the qualifications of those appointed, and so the object of securing the best administration to carry on the business of the country, and to that task the present inequality of salaries proves our hindrance.

MR. RATHBONE: I have no object in putting the House to the trouble of a division. I have brought the matter forward and I know that it can only be dealt with by the Government. I beg to withdraw the Amendment.

The withdrawal being objected to,

The Question was put and agreed to.

Main Question again proposed.

EVENING CONTINUATION SCHOOLS.

*MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire) had upon the Notice Paper the following Amendment—

“That it is desirable to establish a national system of evening continuation schools where children who leave elementary day schools at a very early age may continue their education.”

The Amendment however, could not be put.

The hon. Member said: I am sure that I have with me the sympathy of the great majority of the Members of this House, and that, if it had been possible to have taken a division, I should have had almost unanimous support. As it is I trust the expression of sympathy will have almost as much weight and authority as could be expressed by means of a division. For several years I have sought to bring this matter before the House and to take a division upon it, and, although I have been disappointed, the cause has ripened out of doors so rapidly that a much more favourable judgment can be hoped for now than would have been given a year or two ago. We have now the Report of the Royal Commission on Education which took a large amount of evidence on evening schools, and almost unanimously recommended the establishment of a national system of such schools. I will call attention to one or two paragraphs in the majority report as follows:—

“That the necessity of having some form of evening school for the purpose of fixing and making permanent the day school instruction is almost self-evident; and that it would be worth the while of the State to spend more money on such schools.”

“That the evening school system should be thoroughly revised; that a special curriculum and special schedule of standards and subjects should be allowed, suitable to the needs of a locality, and that the local managers should be encouraged to submit such schedules to the Department for approval; that the provisions embodied in the code requiring all scholars in evening schools to pass in the three elementary subjects as a condition of taking up additional subjects should cease to be enforced, and that no superior limit of age should be imposed upon the scholars.”

These were the views of the majority of the Royal Commission, but the minority enforced them in a much more copious manner, and they went much more fully into the question of evening schools. I state this to show how unanimously the Commission was in favour of establishing evening schools. Memorials and resolutions in favour of evening continuation schools have been received from school boards, education associations, trade unions, co-operative societies, friendly societies, chambers of commerce, teachers' associations, and working-men's clubs, colleges, trading associations, and societies engaged in educational work. There used to be an impression that the working-classes were not favourable to legislation of this kind because they desired to get their children to work as soon as possible. I am happy to say that now this feeling is entirely dispelled. I have been in communication for two or three years with many working-class leaders, who insisted strongly upon the necessity for establishing evening continuation schools. I have been in communication with most of the school boards in the country for the purpose of ascertaining the average age at which children left the elementary schools, and I have found it was about 12

life, and under the degrading influences that surround them these children sink into that state of heathenism in which a considerable part of our people live. There is no way of Christianizing, of civilizing them, except by the State putting them into schools and keeping them there as long as they can be kept. But we allow the children of the poorest class to leave our schools at 11 or 12 years of age, and then they pass through the education of the alms; they sink down into the same state of degradation as that in which their parents live, and in a few years become parents of another crop of the same destitute class, and create another generation of "the unemployed" in our large towns, for this class is always unemployed, and never will be anything else. How should they be anything else? They have never learned a trade; they have no means of living but by what they can pick up in the streets by odd jobs. By the time the children have grown up into youth they are hopelessly condemned to a life of poverty and degradation. We have let go the critical moment for changing their destiny; we have lost the period between 12 and 16 when the character is forming, and when education can be turned to good account, and to our shame we have let these evils repeat themselves from generation to generation. Let me quote a few lines from a writer who has spent his life working among this class and knows exactly what he writes—

"Year by year (says the Rev. Benjamin Waugh) from 70,000 to 80,000 London children pass out of elementary schools; of these, possibly, the half obtain bona-fide occupation. As for the rest—the poorer part, inhabiting, too, the more densely-populated quarters—there is nothing for them but the streets, and the almost certain life of a knave or a fool. It is probable that, every day, not less than 70,000 boys and girls are actually 'hob-jobbing' about, utterly helpless, until they hob-job into gaols, penitentiaries, and reformatories."

I think I know Liverpool well—I do not know London so well—and I can say this describes the state of things in Liverpool. There you may see thousands of these children from 10 to 16 years of age half-clothed, half-fed, screaming about the streets, selling newspapers or fuzes or doing any odd jobs. This is the condition of Liverpool as I have known it for thirty years, a veritable scandal to the country. When an American lands at Liverpool, the first thing he notices is the crowd of squalid, dirty children who swarm around him. Their number is far larger in Liverpool than anywhere in Europe, so far as I know it. An hon. Member says in New York you will find as many. That may be true, though it was not my experience, and if it be so, those are the children of the destitute emigrants who have landed there, the sweepings of European towns. I have travelled over almost the whole of America twice, and I can say that nowhere except in New York can you see a score of ragged begging children in the streets. I have travelled in most civilized countries, and have specially inquired into this subject, and I say you can pick up in Liverpool in a single day more of these ragged, dirty, neglected children than you can find in six months in any other civilized country. I have made a study of this question, and I have inquired very specially into the condition of things in Germany and Switzerland. Once before I told the House the results of my inquiry, but as there are now present many Members who did not hear me on a former occasion, I may be allowed to repeat something of what I have said. I went to Germany with the special object of inquiring into the subject. I went through the largest cities, I saw the best authorities on education, and I inquired specially into the condition of the children of the poor. I did not find in any city, not even in Berlin, any sign of the existence of this class of dirty, ragged, neglected children. And yet the average rate of wages is lower than in England, and the struggle for life is very severe. So perfect is their system of education, so thoroughly are the children looked after, that such a thing as the class of squalid, neglected children we are so familiar with does not exist. How is it that in the great German Empire, that in Switzerland and in Scandinavian countries, they have got rid of this pest, this social nuisance that afflicts our country? There are many causes, and one is germane to this question. I found all over Germany that attendance at school was compulsory, almost universally up to the age of fourteen for boys, and so regularly was this rule complied with, that the average attendance of those on the school books was 97 and 98 per cent, whereas our average attendance in England is about 76 per cent. In one school I found 99 per cent of the children in actual attendance. This seems to us almost a miracle. I found there was no such thing as shamming and finding excuses to keep the children from school. If any parent did keep his child from school, he heard of next day, and, if not provided with a proper reason, he was liable to imprisonment within a week. Such is the law in Germany almost all over the Empire. The school teaching, too, is much better than in England; the teachers are of a higher class—a better taught class—than in England, and they occupy a higher social position. But what I especially want to call attention to is this—that I found in every large city a system of evening continuation schools, into which the children went when they left the day schools, and where attendance was generally compulsory, in most towns up to the age of 17. So thoroughly was this system carried out that I found, at the hotels in Dresden, waiters under the age of 17 had to give five hours a week out of their time to attend these continuation classes, and several of these youths were learning two foreign languages. I inquired how it was possible to get such a large attendance of children at night schools up to the age of 17, and I found it was carried out without friction; the people liked the system, and it worked wonderfully well and smoothly. The effect of it is you never see swarms of unruly children in the streets. The streets of the large towns are as quiet in this respect as an English country village at night; there is no noise of rowdy children such as we find in London, fighting, swearing, and using vile language. The child population attend the evening schools, and throughout Germany there is almost no pauper class. In 47 millions of people, and with great poverty among them too, the pauperized class and the professional tramp, such as we have here by the thousand, scarcely exists, and I believe this thorough system of education is the main cause of it. And now, the House may ask, what is the plan we propose to get hold of the children, and get them into the schools? If the House will permit me, I will briefly sketch out the plan we propose to submit at some future time. We, first of all, adopt the recommendation of the Royal Commission, that the age for leaving school in all cases shall be raised to 13. I regard that as one of the most important recommendations of the Royal Commission, and if that alone is carried out it will immensely improve the educational condition of the children in this country. Then we propose that the half-time age should be raised from 10 years to 11 years. In Germany the age for entering factories is 14, and that is also the case in Switzerland; only in some special cases is the working age lowered to 12. But in England we allow children to enter the factories and workshops for half-time at 10 years. It is high time, in my opinion, we raised the age to 11, and the full exemption age to 13. Enormous advantages would accrue from raising the exemption age. We shall prevent the hurry-scurry and scramble there is to push the children through the standards, and get them out of school as soon as possible. Our education is spoiled, to a large extent, by this terrible scramble to get up to the standard; but, if the exemption age is made 13, the Sixth Standard should be made obligatory. Experience has shown that the majority of children who attend regularly can pass it at the age of 12. Here, in passing, let me say I think we begin the education of our children rather soon, and that it is perhaps better to wait until a child is five or six years old than commence at the age of three or four, which is bad for the brain, the sight, and the health of the child. I have no objection to the Kindergarten system in infant schools. The opinion of the German authorities is that six or seven years of age is early enough to commence mental education; their principle is to begin later and continue longer. With us, everything is precipitated to meet the exigencies of poor parents. We propose to make the exemption standard the sixth, as it now is in London and elsewhere. But we know there are a great number of children who will not pass this at 13; and here comes the crux of the situation—What shall we do with the dull, the stupid children, poor and ill-fed, who cannot pass the Sixth Standard at the age of 13? Our proposal is to give two options—either to attend the day-school up to the age of 14, or to pass into the evening continuation school at the age of 13, and continue there until the age of 15 or 16, or until the equivalent standard is passed; and the standard will be there framed in a manner suitable to these dull children. We propose to say to the parent, "Your child has failed to pass the Sixth Standard; will you let him remain longer at the day school, or shall he go into the evening school?" I think, in the great majority of cases, the parents will prefer the evening school and have the advantage of his child's labour for part of the day. They will come to regard the evening school in the light of a relief from the day school. It will not appear to be harsh and tyrannous; it will be a kind of harbour of refuge into which children may go to escape the compulsion of the day school. We propose that when a child gets into the evening school he shall have a totally different treatment to that now pursued. Evening schools have, hitherto, been ruined by pedantry. The Education Department have laid down certain foolish rules about committing so many lines to memory every week, and other things which disgust the children who attend these schools, tired as they are with their day's work. They go to school at night to improve their intelligence, not to go through a course of verbal training. We have almost allowed our evening schools to be ruined by pedantic theories of educationists who have mistaken the object of the schools. We have gone on allowing the mass of the people to grow up deficient in intelligence, owing to the foolish regulations made by the Board of Education, without practical knowledge of the real wants of the working classes. I feel very strongly the folly of going on year after year in this hopeless, fruitless manner. We propose to make our evening schools as cheerful, as bright, and attractive as it is possible to make them. We can do much in this way to secure a large attendance; we will make it a recreative movement, so that children themselves will be delighted to attend; they shall be bright, cheerful, and attractive, with calisthenics, musical drill, handwork, object lessons, history and geography, taught in an interesting form, everything we can do to encourage and develop the training of eye and hand. We mean these schools to have a partially technical character; we wish to appeal to the eye and hand as well as to the mind. We hope to make the schools so attractive that very little compulsion will be required, or only for the first few weeks, and when the children get into the way of going to these schools, they will regard it as a great deprivation to be kept away from them. We wish to carry out the suggestions of Mr. Heller, who drew up the recommendations in the Minority Report of the Royal Commission, and allow a wide discretion in management, having no cut-and-dried system, but an elastic course of instruction adapted to the trade or industry of each locality. It would be ridiculous, for instance, to give in an industrial centre like Bradford and in a rural parish the same kind of teaching. It may be asked what are we going to do about Voluntary Schools? In regard to Board Schools there is no difficulty. We have the buildings, and the bulk of them are idle in the evening, and they might just as well be open as shut. Wherever there is a School Board a sufficient number of evening schools can be provided to meet all requirements, but in rural districts where there are no Board Schools there is some difficulty. I would propose that in the first instance we make evening schools obligatory only in Board Schools and optional in Voluntary Schools. I should be most happy if Parliament went further and made them obligatory upon Voluntary Schools, but in the present state of public opinion we can hardly take this step. I know there are many cases in which clergymen in rural districts have admitted the desirability of opening evening classes in Voluntary Schools and would welcome an Act of Parliament to compel the attendance of children in such schools during the winter months. Of course there is not the same danger from moral corruption in the country as there is in great towns, so if we fail for the first few years in developing the system freely in rural districts, yet we shall have done much by inaugurating the system in towns. I propose that these schools should only meet in the winter months, not in the summer, so as not to interfere with field labour; and I think that three nights in the week would probably be sufficient in the earlier stages of the movement, probably two hours in the evening, or six hours during the week. Ultimately, perhaps, we might extend the hours. I should think the present scale of grants is and would be nearly adequate to support the schools. If I am mistaken in this, at all events a grant of 16s. or 18s. per head would, I am told, be sufficient to carry on evening schools where you have a large number of children. Of course, it is not necessary to open every Board School for the purpose, probably, one in four would be sufficient. Then arises perhaps the greatest of the difficulties, the creation of a staff; but I would not meet it by employing the day teachers, their work in the day is too severe to allow of it. But there are a good many retired teachers who would be willing enough and perfectly competent to conduct teaching in the evening for six hours in the week at a reasonable remuneration, and I think we might rely upon a considerable amount of voluntary teaching. But whether we secure voluntary teaching or not, I would follow the recommendation of the Minority Report of the Commission that it is not desirable that the head teacher of a day school should be required to undertake the charge of the evening school, and that the additional duty though not forbidden, should be rather discouraged especially in towns. Without committing myself to details I hope I have said enough to commend the scheme as a practical one. Knowing the sympathy and support it has received throughout the country, I am rather disappointed that I am unable to carry my proposals to the test of a Division. I believe that in this House there is a general approval of my scheme, and that if members were left to vote freely according to their preference I should have a large majority in my favour. I have had almost as much support from the other side of the House as from my own. I hope I may be allowed to mention that we have a Bill prepared and ready, and I hope that at an early date I shall be enabled to introduce it to the House. I trust then that the Government will see their way to permit that Bill to pass the Second Reading unopposed. It has been most carefully framed after years of consideration with the view of meeting every difficulty. I know that I can rely on the sympathy of several members of the Government, and especially on that of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who has always been an advocate of education. I well recollect the speech which the right hon. Gentleman delivered some years ago. Towards the close of it he spoke of the ladder provided by the State by means of which children were to climb up from the elementary schools to the universities. The right hon. Gentleman went on to point out that owing to the want of Continuation Schools the ladder had been left hanging in the air, and it was impossible for the children of the working classes to get on to the lowest rung. I appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Government to help us in this matter. In doing so they will be conferring a great honour on themselves and performing a truly patriotic act. I believe that in passing an Act of the kind I have sketched the Government will double the value of our educational system, and do more for the cause of social reform than has been accomplished by any Measure passed since the great Act of 1870. I beg to thank the House for the patience and attention with which it has listened to me.

MR. HAYES FISHER (Fulham): I cordially concur in the Resolution which the hon. Member opposite placed upon the Paper, but I rather regret that the hon. Gentleman should have taken what I deem to be a somewhat too gloomy view of the present state of things, particularly with regard to parental responsibility. I cannot say that I entirely share his views on the subject of compulsion. But there are within the four corners of the Resolution many practical points which deserve the consideration of the Government, and it is to those points I wish to address myself, before my right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council rises to reply, during the short time I shall occupy the attention of the House. It may be thought that too great a demand is made on the Department to which it would be necessary to go for the money to carry the scheme of the hon. Member for Flintshire (Mr. S. Smith) into operation. But I think, although we may not be able to satisfy altogether the requirements of the right hon. Member, we may, nevertheless, do something between the maximum demands he makes and the minimum of other hon. Members, who, at the same time, are earnest friends of education, and are ready to do everything in their power to encourage any laudable effort in that direction. Now, what is the real evil that the resolution of the right hon. Member for Flintshire is intended to meet? The evil of our educational system is that it has failed, notwithstanding the enormous expenditure incurred, to fix the knowledge acquired by the children in their minds. The resolution of my hon. Friend is one way of stopping the mental and moral leakage of our children. It is incredible folly to spend £7,000,000 every year in pouring knowledge into the minds of our children, and then to refuse to secure for ourselves by a little additional expenditure the full value of our money. In London alone 80,000 children pass out of the schools every year, but only 4 per cent continue in any way a systematic education. If examined at the end of the first year those children will be found to have lost half their knowledge, in the second year to have lost two-thirds, in the third the whole of it will be found to have gone, while in the fourth year after leaving school it will be found that their minds are replete with the noxious garbage picked up in the purlieus of London. The Registrar General points out the vast number of people who have gone through the ordinary curriculum and yet are unable to write their names when they come to be married. Every one, after listening to the speech of my hon. Friend will admit that there is a practical remedy. Polytechnics and schemes for extending University lectures are splendid in themselves, but they have been designed rather to meet a different age of life altogether. What we want is to fill up the gap between the age at which children leave elementary education and the age at which they are capable of educating themselves and of getting some benefit from the science and art classes. The night schools are undoubtedly failures. No hon. Member will deny it. If it is denied, I would ask hon. Members to turn to the report of the Education Commissioners, where they will find over and over again evidence which points to the decay rather than to the advance of the evening school system. If they have not been such a failure in London as elsewhere, it is due to the efforts of the Recreative Evening School Association, by means of which so many people are struggling to educate the poorer parts of London. The Rev. Mr. Diggle, the Chairman of the London School Board has made this statement:—

“Throughout England and Wales only 32,000 scholars in night schools were qualified by attendance for examination. Of these, 4,138 were qualified in connection with the evening classes under the London School Board. It is satisfactory to notice that whilst elsewhere in England and Wales night schools are apparently either stationary or decreasing in number, the evening classes under the Board have been steadily increasing during the past year, and for some of this improvement, and for much valuable help, the Board are indebted to the energetic exertions of the Recreative Classes Association.”

Why is it that evening classes are successful here and not in the country? The Recreative School Association have discovered that the failure in the system of night schools is owing to their not being attractive, and I agree that the great failure is due to the pedantry of the Board of Education. Perhaps hon. Members will not be prepared to go as far as I should in the direction of compulsion, but I believe it is generally agreed that the minimum exemption for half-time should be 11, and for whole time 13. But without imposing compulsion at all, the Education Department could do very much in carrying out our ideas in regard to the moral and physical development of the children. It may not be desirable to use any form of compulsion in order to secure the attendance of children at night schools, but short of that, the Education Department ought to offer every kind of attraction to induce the children to attend school voluntarily, and continue their education. What the Board can do has been well pointed out by the hon. Member for Flintshire, and I will only give one further illustration. What I would impress upon the Department is that they should carry into effect the recommendations contained in the Report of the Royal Commission. In order to show how impossible it is to fill our English schools at the present moment, let me take a case from the Commissioners' Report. The Report says:—

"We have endeavoured to find out the causes of this comparative failure, and we learn that, in the opinion of many witnesses, a chief cause is to be found in the insufficient encouragement of evening schools by the Education Department; and one of Her Majesty's Inspectors agreed, in the view that if the Government encouraged such schools with more liberal grants they would increase in number. We are told in particular that evening schools need more freedom in respect both of classification and of subjects of instruction. The Code makes it obligatory on evening schools earning a grant that they must be examined in the three elementary subjects. In like manner a girl cannot join the evening cookery class without making 24 attendances at the evening school, and without being presented for examination in the standard subjects. This requirement is said to deter many girls from attending the cookery classes."

What we ask from the Board of Education is greater freedom. I do not know whether my hon. Friend the Member for Flintshire is correct or not when he says that the present special grants are sufficient. At all events they might be divided among more subjects. At a Conference of the Re-creative Evening Schools Association, held in this House, it was resolved—

"That the following subjects be added to the list of special subjects in the Code—
1. For girls—laundry work, dressmaking, needlework, bookbinding, and other useful work.
2. For boys—mechanical, wood-working, and other useful work.
3. For both sexes—drawing, painting, and sculpture.
4. For both sexes—agriculture, horticulture, and other subjects connected with the land.
5. For both sexes—any other subjects which may be found to be of special value to the community."
The hon. Member for Flintshire has referred to the memorials which have been sent to the Home Minister and the Education Department. These memorials have been most generously signed by large and important bodies of men who are engaged in the work of education, and who have been able to express the views of the community on this subject. I have had something to do with this question for some years. The hon. Member for Flintshire has referred to the memorials which have been sent to the Home Minister and the Education Department. of submitting subject schedules to the Board, and I would even ask for more money, because I do not think that the present grants are sufficient. I trust that my right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council, who I feel convinced concurs in the spirit of this Resolution, will be prepared to give practical effect to the opinion it expresses, which I believe to be that of the House generally. We may not be able to correct the evil under which we are suffering for the present generation, but we may do much to improve the mental and moral condition of their children, who will form the next generation.

*MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I do not think it needs any argument from any quarter of this House to impress the Government with the absolute necessity for taking this subject in hand without further delay. Of course, the Government may have some difficulty in dealing with the matter. It may be supposed that the Government will have to find more money in order to carry out the plan suggested by my hon. Friend; but that question, I think, has already been answered. We are now losing a great deal of money which is set apart for education simply because we do not spend it in the most judicious manner for the purpose of perfecting the system. I have had something to do with this question for some years. The hon. Member for Flintshire has referred to the memorials which have been sent to the Home Minister and the Education Department. These memorials have been most generously signed by large and important bodies of men who are engaged in the work of education, and who have been able to express the views of the community on this subject. The secretary of a large Trade Society numbering nearly 30,000 members writes:—"I have got the petitions agreed to by my council and sent in as directed." Other large Trade Societies and a Society representing a considerable body of miners write in similar terms. Working mens' clubs all over the country have sent in Memorials. Almost every body appealed to has unanimously signed the Memorial, and only in a few cases has there been any hesitation about one or two details. I think that this fact ought to encourage the Government to take the matter in hand and see whether something cannot be done to push it forward. The unanimity which has been manifested in this House to-night ought to encourage them for once to throw aside Party politics and agree upon something which is to benefit future generations. So far as compulsion is concerned I am afraid there are a great number of persons to whom compulsion is absolutely necessary, and although it is right and proper that a child should honour and obey his parents, yet it is also right that parents should do their duty by their children. If parents fail to do their duty the State ought to step in and compel them to do it. In a great majority of cases, no compulsion would be required, especially if a proper curriculum of education is provided. It will be my duty to-night to take the chair at a very popular institution in London—the Polytechnic. The way in which the children are attracted to that institution at the present moment and the way in which they are taught is perfectly marvellous. I have had the pleasure of going through the rooms and of seeing the system of education carried on there, and it was most gratifying to witness the large number of young persons who evince a desire to attend the evening classes. I am not quite sure that I am accurate, but, as far as I can remember, the Secretary told me that the applications to go into the school are much greater than the facilities for accommodation can make provision for. I went into one of the classes where lessons were being given on geography. The lessons were made as attractive as possible by the aid of the magic lantern, and I am perfectly satisfied that a considerable amount of sound and useful information can be given to children in a way to excite their interest and attention. If we can by any means provide something in our schools that will be attractive to the children, and keep our boys and girls away from the music halls and other haunts—I was going to say of vice—but at any rate where vice abounds, I think we shall have done a great deal of good. The most important thing is to keep the children under good influences between the ages of 12 and 16 or 17. When they leave school at about 12 or 13 years of age and go back to poverty-stricken homes, in some cases where vice is in the ascendant, how is it possible for a child to resist the evil influences that are brought to bear upon him? Keep the child under the influences of school for two or three years longer, and you will find that the better side of his nature becomes trained so that he is able to resist the evil influences even of a bad father and mother. I know plenty of instances where it is being done now. Cases have come under my own knowledge where the drunken habits of the parents have been resisted by the voluntary abstinence of the children, and where the children have left home and gone into other institutions of their own accord. I think we should do something to encourage that state of things all over the United Kingdom. I am quite in favour of extending the age of children in elementary schools, but I would not curtail the age. In very many cases the school-house is a much brighter and more comfortable place than the home, and I am in favour of getting them there at the earliest possible moment. The hon. Member for Flintshire spoke of Liverpool as a town with which he is better acquainted than London. I know both towns very well, but London much better than Liverpool; and I must say that of all the towns where it is necessary for something to be done it is this great Metropolis, with its nearly five millions of inhabitants. I am quite prepared to pay tribute to the London School Board for having done its best, under difficult circumstances, to give encouragement to voluntary education, and to bring the children into the schools. I sincerely trust that the Government, if they cannot see their way to bring in a measure themselves, will support any measure that may be brought in by the hon. Member for Flintshire, so that something may be done this Session to commence this great work.

*SIR R. TEMPLE (Worcestershire, Evesham): I rise once more to pay my tribute of approbation to the philanthropy of the hon. Member for Flintshire. I have done it so often that hon. Members may think I am painting the lily. Nevertheless, I entreat the House to remember that, although there is a general consensus of opinion upon the abstract propositions of the hon. Member for Flintshire, the statements which have been made are of an academic character, and that a certain amount of practical application is necessary. Therefore, with the permission of the House, I propose for a few moments to offer a running commentary upon the remarks of the hon. Member from a Metropolitan point of view. The hon. Gentleman said that he would not attempt to press the Resolution to a Division. I am afraid that, however he might feel disposed, he could not do so under the Rules of the House. Nobody, however, challenges the expression of opinion contained in the Resolution. The hon. Member says that it is desirable to establish continuation schools all over the country. I suppose that nobody denies that proposition. It is one of those propositions which nobody can deny. To the various Memorialists mentioned by the hon. Member I would say, "If that be your opinion, why do not you act up to it?" Now, I am thankful to the proposer and seconder of the Resolution for the tribute they paid to the efforts made by the London School Board. The fact is that while outside society is memorializing, and the House is debating, the London School Board is acting: we are men of action. There may be some Boards who are not doing as much as they ought. I have no objection to the hon. Member's (Mr. S. Smith's) strictures being addressed to them, but I do claim exemption on behalf of that great Corporation which I have the honour to represent, the London School Board. The hon. Member for Bethnal Green (Mr. Howell) said that for a long time the evening classes in London, as elsewhere, were failures. That description cannot be applied to the evening classes which now exist. The evening classes in London are not all they might be, but they are already something very considerable, and therein I gladly acknowledge the assistance and co-operation we have received from the various societies which are promoting evening classes. Reference has been made to the term "education." Let me ask hon. Members what is meant by education? I am sure some listeners would gather from the speeches of certain hon. Members that the speakers think education consists in the imparting of knowledge, and that such knowledge as is afforded by the system of elementary education may pass in at one ear and go out at the other. That may be, but I am anxious to remind hon. Members that education does not consist of knowledge alone. There are in our elementary system influences of a moral character; there are the disciplinary and humanizing influences and the recollections of our school buildings in contrast to the misery and degradation of some of the children's homes. These things are not forgotten—they last as memories through life. Then the hon. Member for Flintshire said a great deal about our children running wild about in the streets. What he said may be very true as regards the evening, but I submit it is not correct as regards the day. Judging from the hon. Gentleman's speech, one would suppose that the children of the Metropolis are running wild about the streets at all hours of the day. That is really not the case, and I am sure the hon. Gentleman will admit it, because in the very next breath he spoke of children being treated too much as wage earners. If it is so, it is impossible that the children can be running about the streets in the day time. It is the fact that children are apt to run about wild in the evening, and this is one of the greatest of the many reasons for the establishment of continuation classes. Again, the hon. Gentleman spoke of parents being neglectful of their children. There is unquestionably another side to the question. There are parents who are neglectful, but there are others who pay attention to their children in a manner which makes them examples to all classes of society, and these parents are to be found amongst the very poorest classes in the Metropolitan area. It is my duty to constantly inspect the children of the poorest classes in the poorest schools in the poorest parts of the Metropolis, and I am therefore able to declare that for one mother who neglects her children there are scores who manage somehow or other to send their children decently to school. Mothers who themselves are starving manage somehow to keep their children in something like physical condition; women hardly able to afford decent clothing for themselves contrive to send their children respectably clad to school. Only this week I have seen, in the poorest parts of London, cases which came under the category. Such parents certainly deserve every praise which can be bestowed on them. The hon. Member seemed to think that in London and in our great industrial centres the children are uncared for, and he alluded to the care taken of children in Berlin. Any outsider listening to the hon. Gentleman would suppose that little or nothing has been done in London to bring the children into the educational fold. Will the House be surprised to hear that at this moment, within the Metropolitan area, there is a house-to-house visitation, so that no child of any class, sort, or condition of life can possibly escape education? Every child is accounted for. Even the children who sleep out under arches are brought up before a Committee of the Board and sent either to a reformatory or an industrial school or a truant school. There is not a child who escapes going to school so many times a year. What is the average attendance? More than four-fifths—more than 80 per cent—so it is really not just to our countrymen, and to our organization, to indirectly imply that the children of the humbler classes are uncared for. Then, the hon. Member drew moving pictures of the sorrows and the miseries of England, and attributes them all to the want of education. I am sure the House will say that the statement of the hon. Gentleman was tinged with exaggeration. ["No, no!"] If it was not, the hon. Gentleman's remedies, the extension of the age of compulsion from 11 to 13 years, and the establishment of continuation classes for children up to 14 and 15 years, are very small remedies for such a wide-spread and deep-seated disease. Either the disease is exaggerated or the remedy is insufficient. Then, the hon. Member spoke in very complimentary terms of the elementary school teachers in Germany, and drew, as I understood him, a comparison between the German teachers and the teachers in England generally, somewhat unfavourable to the latter. But the hon. Gentleman is not the only Member of the House who has travelled. I am myself a traveller—perhaps a greater one than he; and I assert that our teachers—certainly those in London and in great centres like Liverpool and Birmingham—are a very highly trained and competent body of people. Our teachers, whether male or female, have a great deal of force of character, power to command, and aptitude for enforcing discipline which cannot be surpassed by the teachers of any nation in the world. After all these very powerful descriptive passages the hon. Gentleman proceeded to develop his plan, which really amounts to this—that the period of compulsory attendance should be somewhat prolonged, and that every child should be obliged to pass a higher standard than that which is now made obligatory. Neither I nor any educational authority would have any objection to these proposals, provided only that the people will stand them. I understood the hon. Gentleman to say that while parents on the Continent of Europe are willing to let their children remain at school for a long time without earning wages, British parents insist upon their children earning wages at a tender age. Now, in justice to my country, I should like to point out that, with respect to the labour of women and children in factories, England compares most favourably with all other nations.

Mr. MUNDELLA: Not children.

SIR R. TEMPLE: I speak subject to correction, but that is certainly my impression. Then the hon. Gentleman spoke of our infant schools in terms of disparagement. He seemed to think that children ought not to go to school till five years of age. It is commonly admitted all over London that the infant schools, in which children are brought into training from three to five years of age, are the means of diffusing a blessing upon the people. The infant schools are very popular with the parents. My right hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) will admit it is far more easy to induce universal attendance between three and five years of age than it is in the subsequent period of life. I am sure that if the hon. Member for Flintshire were to inspect some of our Infant Schools in London, see the little children going through their Kindergarten exercise, and notice the tender maternal care taken of the children by the head and assistant mistresses, he would admit that our Infant School system is one of the jewels in the educational crown. Then the hon. Member alluded to the standard to be followed for evening classes. I heartily agree with him although here again I think he spoke in somewhat too severe terms of what he called the pedantry of the Education Department. He thinks the curriculum is unattractive. That is admitted to be the case by every person who has had anything to do with the matter, but on previous occasions I have stated in the House that the School Board of London is not at all at fault. We find ourselves hampered by the regulations of the Educational Code and have repeatedly drawn the attention of the Education Department to the matter and prayed for relief. We were told relief could not be afforded pending the Report of the Royal Commission. That Report has been presented; we are still without relief, but we trust that the New Code will enable us to make our classes thoroughly attractive. But when the hon. Member for Flintshire spoke in such interesting and eloquent terms of the singing, of sketches, musical drill, and the like, I thought he was drawing a picture of what is going on at the moment under the School Board for London. The special instruction is actually being given at our evening schools. I should be glad to see the hon. Member for Flintshire visit the evening classes of the School Board for London. Something has been said about the cost of the evening classes, and it is a very sufficient answer to say that a very large number of the children in the evening classes in London are of the age of five years and under, and that the cost of the evening classes is very small. I am sure that the hon. Member for Flintshire would be very much interested to see the evening classes of the School Board for London, and I am sure that he would be very much interested to see the evening classes of the School Board for London.

in combination. The hon. Gentleman made a very pertinent inquiry. How is the staff to be provided? He rather deprecates the ordinary day school teachers being employed in the evening schools, but may I remind him that by so employing the day school teachers, we effect a great economy, and economy, surely, is a very essential element in the calculation. It is a most expensive thing to employ teachers for this work alone; besides, I cannot admit it is impossible for day school teachers to do the work. The work for the teachers in Board Schools is not excessive. ["Oh, oh!"] It begins at 9 o'clock and goes on till 12 o'clock; then there are two hours' recess, and afterwards the school is open from 2 to 4.30, possibly on some occasions to 5 o'clock. [Mr. Picton: Then there is evening work and preparation of pupil teachers.] The preparation of pupil teachers has nothing to do with the matter, in London at least, and considering the elementary nature of the instruction and high educational qualifications of the teachers, it is not a fact that the teachers have much in the way of preparation over night to undergo. As a matter of fact, many teachers do give private instruction in the evening. I assure the House we shall not find the slightest difficulty in getting clever and physically strong young teachers both male and female, to take charge of the evening classes, and in this way saving a great deal of money to the public revenue. Lastly, I must urge the question of finance. At present our educational charges are as large as the people can bear. The school rates and taxes are becoming highly unpopular, and there is the greatest danger that if the rates are enlarged to any appreciable extent education may become unpopular and a great movement put back. I entreat all friends of the evening class system to try to make the cost as small as possible. We should not thoroughly re-organise the system of principles contained in the instruction—namely, that instruction should not end at 12 or 13 years of age, but that a child having learned not only the vowels but moral discipline—having also been instructed in habits of thrift and temperance—has won under the benevolent influence of such instruction classes the second number of savings in the course of the year.

*SIR LYON PLAYFAIR (Leeds, S.): The hon. Member for the Evesham Division (Sir Richard Temple) commenced by saying he was about to paint the lily; but I think, before he ended his speech, he had so besmirched the lily that there was little of its lustre left. He endeavoured to show that my hon. Friend the Member for Flintshire (Mr. S. Smith) had brought forward an impracticable or useless scheme. I quite agree that we must take care to satisfy the country that the proposed expenditure will not be wasted. But what my noble Friend and those who support him contend, is, that the expenditure of the country upon education which is now getting very large, is an unproductive expenditure, that we are wasting a large portion of our expenditure by not continuing the education of our children when they leave our elementary schools with a taste for further knowledge; that the little knowledge they gain is quickly rubbed off in the wear and tear of life, and is of little use in their future career. My hon. Friend contends that unless you proceed with the children's education you are wasting the treasure and resources of the nation. I recollect years ago, when we first began to seriously take up the question of education in the House in 1870, and for years afterwards, we found that very few indeed—not 30,000—children went into the higher Standards and received an education that was capable of being continued in after life, and experience showed that unless a child passed Standard 4, in a few years amid the wear and tear of life, the whole value of education was gone. But do not let us depreciate what we have done. Since then we have done a great deal in education. Very few children now pass through our schools who do not pass the Fourth Standard, which, in all towns except Bradford, is now the standard for labour. Do not let us depreciate what we have done since 1870; we have done much. But we have still a great deal left to do. As my hon. Friend has shown by statistics, the great bulk of the pupils come out of the schools at the age of 12, and I would ask hon. Members to consider what knowledge our children would possess in our own position of life, and with the advantages we have, if they were turned out at 12 years of age to take part in the battle of life. Even with our own children there would be but miserable armour of knowledge for the struggle; but what can the children of the poorer classes get at 12 years, but a thin veneer of learning that, unless continued and strengthened, can be of little effect in after life? It is because our educational expenditure is unproductive, because so much of it is wasted; it is in order that the children we have taught up to the age of 12 may continue their education that Evening Schools, Science and Art Classes, and Technical Schools are proposed. I do not wish to pose as a prophet, but in the discussions upon the Bill of 1870 I pointed out that the night schools would become a complete failure under the Act, because they were designed to give elementary instruction to neglected children, but gradually as your children became educated night schools ought to have been made higher schools, useful and attractive continuation schools, where children could learn the use of hand and eye in preparation for pursuing the industrial arts of life. We did not do that; and the night schools went dragging on in a system of mere verbalism, which the children do not care for and find no advantage in, and now are in the miserable condition of having an attendance of only 30,000 in all England. I have always regretted the division between the Scotch and English educational systems, because Scotland does not get the advantages England has, nor England the advantages of Scotland. So completely separated are the two Administrations that here in England you do not know what is going on in Scotland. What has been done there with night schools is, they have been converted into higher schools, and the result is that the attendance bears that proportion to population that 60,000 or 70,000 would represent in England. I support the Resolution of my hon. Friend, and do so in a much broader sense than he does. I think continuation schools are excellent if you have the sense to make them attractive to the growing intelligence of youth, for the training of hand and eye unencumbered by verbalism, opening two new gates of knowledge—sight and touch. They make the scholar very much more intelligent, and much more useful in life; but more than that, I look upon these schools as the means of inducing children to go still further; that they should not lose their time, but go on to the Science and Art Schools—supported with so much expenditure and with so much usefulness—and the Technical Schools of the future. And here I would like to ask the Vice President what has happened to the Technical Education Bill which has been mentioned in two Queen's Speeches, and which we are all anxious to see become a reality? For three years a Technical Education Bill has been before the House, and twice it has been promised in the Speech from the Throne, but we do not yet know what particular Bill is to be laid before us. As leading to the Science and Art Schools, and the Technical Schools, I want to see these continuation schools established. I regard this as a matter of urgent national interest. We see competing nations spending their treasure to a far greater extent than we are, and spending it without stint, to create a trained intelligence among their workmen. We are not accustomed to rely on all expenditure from the central authority, nor do I know that Technical Education should rely on State support, but we ask the Government to show us how they will allow localities to spend for themselves as well as what aid they will give in order that our present educational expenditure may not be wasted, as now it is, in part from want of these schools. With this view I thoroughly support the Resolution of my hon. Friend, only considering it a road to a much higher and more important education, which will put us in a position to give that intelligent training to our working classes which will enable them to keep their position in the competition of the world.

*MR. YOUNG (Christchurch): I ask the indulgence of the House not only because this is the first time I have trespassed on its time, but because I have had something to do with boys in the early years after they have left school, and also because I may express views upon this question that may not meet with great favour in any quarter of the House. I have nothing to say against the principle of evening schools; everyone, I suppose, is convinced that when our children leave school at twelve or thirteen years of age their education is by no means complete, and I would be prepared to agree with the hon. Member for Flintshire in extending the time of compulsory attendance at day schools to thirteen years. But that is not the point we are discussing to-night. I believe that these continuation schools would do much to give a higher education to our children, that they would enable that education to be completed, and I am quite prepared to admit that between the ages of 13 and 16 is just the time when the mind begins to expand and to appreciate the instruction offered. No doubt, to a certain extent, higher education has been neglected in this country, and, in consequence, foreign nations have been running us close if they have not been outstripping us in the industrial race. But what I do object to in the terms of the hon. Member's Resolution is the use of the word "National." I am quite aware of the importance attached to this by many hon. Members, who think that not only elementary but higher education should be controlled, supported and directed by the State. But I must protest against the unlimited adoption of this principle in regard to higher education without very careful consideration. We know very well the large appetites of many hon. Members and of some right hon. Members, too, for the expenditure of public money for educational purposes, and as a "National system of evening continuation Schools" means in the first place a system supported by the State we may well ask with some alarm what limit is to be put upon this doctrine of National support? Whatever the state of our National finances may be, I think, we ought to pause before taking action that may tend to check the responsibility of parents for the education of their children, and discourage those voluntary agencies which have done a certain amount of good in the past and are now doing a great deal more to supply what is lacking in this respect. Education is a very important matter, no doubt, but there are many other important and necessary things not provided by the State; food, clothing, shelter, medical attendance, these are all matters of primary importance, but individuals are left to obtain them for themselves and their families, or to get them from those who will supply them. No doubt, an exception was made in the case of elementary education, but I do think we ought to pause before extending that principle to an indefinite degree. As a matter of fact these evening schools as has been pointed out by the hon. Baronet (Sir R. Temple) do exist to a great extent, and what exists in London may very well be extended to other large towns in the country, and, indeed, it is admitted on high authority that there is hardly a large town where Technical Schools do not exist, and where provision is not made for education in science under the Science and Art Department. It may be true that the ordinary night schools are not so well attended as they might be, or so well as they were attended some years ago. Why? I should like to quote Dr. Paton who has already been referred to by the hon. Member for Flintshire, and he is an authority who I know will be respected by those who take an interest in this subject. He was examined before the Royal Commission on Elementary Education, and he said the whole system of education at the day schools was such as to deter boys from attending evening schools, and when they have passed the exemption standard they fling up their caps and cry, "Catch me going to school again!" It is the principle of compulsion to which I take principal objection in reference to this Motion. It has been introduced in the case of elementary education, and there are a good many people who think it has not been altogether a success. You have a gigantic staff to compel attendance at a cost of £30,000 a year in London, and there is an opinion, that has penetrated even the London School Board itself, that this compulsion has not been worked altogether satisfactorily, and has not been productive of the happiest results; and now you propose to extend this principle to children of more advanced age, whom it would be still more difficult to bring into school. We may be asked to look at the Continent, and, of course, we there see the compulsory principle introduced. Why, there is one place where the lads working in a large factory for 12 hours' daily are made to attend evening school up to the age of 18, but I should like to know whether the people of this country are disposed to sanction the introduction of such a principle on any large scale here? I do not believe they would, and I should be sorry if they were. It is all very well to refer us to the Continent, but I do not think we are bound slavishly to imitate Continental models when we know that our habits and character are so very different from those of other nations. I think it would be a fatal mistake to adopt a system of compulsion in higher schools just because it has been adopted and been found to answer among other nations. Boys leave school now, say, at the age of 13, and most of them go to work of some kind, and some of them work long hours; they come home tired in the evening and want rest. Now, set up classes for these boys which shall be bright and attractive, and invite them to come in, and you may be doing them a benefit just at the time when it will be most advantageous to them. But compel them to attend, and you make that distasteful if not odious to them, which should be a pleasure and a boon; you are cramming them with knowledge with the effect very often of permanent injury to the health; you may possibly turn out a very superior wage-earning machine, but it is at the expense of all the higher qualities of the man—and the woman too. I may seem 20 years behind the time, perhaps, but I believe I express the opinion of a certain number of the working classes and of a good many of the already over-burdened tax and ratepayers, and some of the best friends of education, who will agree with me when I say that the cast-iron method of thrusting knowledge down the throats of the people is not the real way to promote the cause of education in the highest sense—that, however important it is to have the working classes instructed in science and art, as well as the ordinary branches of knowledge, there is another side to their nature which ought not to be left out of account—and that by this constant and evergrowing interference on the part of the State in matters of individual and family concern, you are doing your best to destroy that spirit of freedom, self reliance, and self respect which have helped to make our nation what it is.

*MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I have felt it my duty to make many visits to schools in manufacturing towns, and I have given some attention to this subject. If the hon. Member for Flintshire will allow me to express an opinion, I think he takes too gloomy a view of the condition of our town population. I do not believe he exaggerates in the slightest degree the condition of things in the town of Liverpool, and I confess as a Lancashire man I look with the greatest regret and the deepest sorrow on the condition of Liverpool. The reason for it I think is not far to fetch. You have in the great city of Liverpool no occupation for girls or women. If you pass from Liverpool to one of our great manufacturing towns, say Wigan or Bolton, you find the whole of the population that in Liverpool would be running about the streets, a source of anxiety and discredit to all, are in Wigan and Bolton occupied day after day in the great factories of those towns. I do not think that anything is gained by exaggeration in this matter. I believe on the contrary, that a cause is greatly weakened when statements are made which do not stand the test of severe examination. I do not believe myself—the hon. Member for Flintshire will pardon my friendly criticism—that there are three millions of people in the country on the edge of pauperism; I cannot think that a tenth of the entire population of England and Wales are at the door of the workhouse. I think in that as in his more general statements the hon. Member is not supported by facts, and in his inferences has gone beyond the truth. With reference to the popular opinion in favour of some movement of this kind, there was one omission in the speech of the hon. Member for Flintshire. During the last few weeks an important and representative body of churchmen, who met to consider how the National Church can best discharge its duties, passed an emphatic Resolution in favour of a system of continuation schools. I think it is only due to my co-religionists to say what they are doing in that particular. I think the real argument in favour of the hon. Member's proposition is that laid before the House by the right hon. Member for Leeds (Sir L. Playfair). We have a gigantic machine, a system of the most elaborate character, teachers trained with the greatest care and accomplished in their art; we have millions of children gathered together, and yet we allow them to be removed from this most careful and elaborate method of instruction just at the time when they are beginning to take advantage of it. Of this there is no doubt, and the more the case is rested on this argument the more it will be supported and the more speedily the matter will be settled. I do not in the slightest degree believe that the education of our young children begins too soon. It is a delusion to think that the infants collected in the schools are subjected to a painful process of instruction until their lives are made unhappy and school hours a period of misery. On the contrary the years spent at school are happy years, and the hours passed in our schools are hours of enjoyment to young children and among the happiest hours of a child's life. I need not describe the scene in an infant school as I have often witnessed it to anyone who cares to do so can visit a school, and after he has done so I am sure he will agree with me. But the real difficulty is the age at which children leave school, and I may mention a remarkable circumstance which has a bearing upon this point. It is a fact that now in some of our manufacturing towns children pass through the standard which gives them exemption from school attendance at so early an age that they are not allowed to enter upon factory labour. This is the almost incredible condition of things, and shows how machinery does occasionally get out of order. The effect is that many of these children pass months or more in a condition of idleness: the bye-laws of the School Board cease to have effect, because the standard is passed, but the Factory Act remains in operation, and the boy is not permitted to work. So children idle away a year or more of the most precious years of their life, because parents are unwilling to continue sending them to school, and compulsory attendance has ceased. Another fact to be borne in mind is the great reluctance of magistrates to enforce the bye-laws when a parent who does not attend as he ought to the education of his child is summoned before the magistrate by the School Board or School Attendance Committee. The mother comes forward with a story, always true, which excites sympathy, the case is dismissed, and thus the effect of the school authorities to secure attendance are discouraged. Night schools have comparatively failed, and some years ago I had a correspondence with some clerical friends, who expressed regrets in regard to the decay of these schools which were fast ripening into despair. They have been conducted in a half-hearted fashion, rather to the prejudice than the advantage of education. They have failed, because of the nature of the subjects taught; because successive Governments have made injudicious requirements, and because of the difficulties of securing an efficient teaching staff. I confess I do not think we can expect day school teachers to add night teaching to the labours of the day. In the case of London I believe teachers in elementary schools are free from the necessity of instructing pupil teachers. In my judgment, to require a teacher who has been at work during school hours to also instruct pupil teachers is to subject these teachers to an excessive amount of pressure. Whether you can supply deficiencies by means of a voluntary staff, or whether you might accomplish your object by exempting teachers from half their day labour when they engage in night school teaching, I will not venture to say, but I do say that it is quite impossible for teachers to do both, and there should be no attempt to induce a teacher to conduct a night school as well as a day school. As to compulsion, I confess that my opinion—an opinion formed, with considerable regret, under the pressure of observation—is that we are at the edge of a period when there will be an objection to compulsion on the part of parents, just as there has been a reluctance on the part of magistrates to carry the compulsory law into effect. I deeply regret so retrograde a condition of public opinion. Some years ago I embarked in an education campaign with a strong feeling against compulsion. I argued against it before large gatherings of working men, and I found, to my great surprise, that my arguments were not well received by the working men. I arrived at the conclusion on which I have acted ever since—namely, that working men are in favour of compulsion, and that it is our duty to press on them in a friendly spirit that which they believe to be, and that which we know to be, an advantage and boon to them. That being the case, I think we ought to be very careful lest we press the movement too far. I do not think it would be prudent in the interest of the continuation schools to make them compulsory. There are two difficulties which meet; and the first one is the fatigue of young persons after the day's labour. Sometimes the school may not be near the home—it may be very far distant. Some of the factory workers walk a considerable distance to their factories, because the labour of the household is not exclusively factory labour, and the young persons have to seek their livelihood as best they can, often at a distance from home. And, secondly, you have that which I believe to be a most valuable duty on the part of our young girls, and that is, assisting in the management of the household. That I always regard as a technical education of the most valuable character, and I do not think the House will act with wisdom—and I am sure it would not act with mercy and consideration—if it were to pass a compulsory law to prevent the young women of our working classes from assisting their mothers in the management of the home. I think, Sir, these remarks are quite sufficient to show that the time for compulsion has not yet come, and that we ought to be most tender and careful how we advance in that direction. There is one further remark I would make, and that is that I do not think that sufficient recognition has been given to work actually done. If you come to our town—I am speaking now of the North of England, with which, by this time, I hope I have some acquaintance—you will find that some of our schools are well occupied at night. You will find various classes under various names to young boys and young women. Sometimes there is a certain degree of technical education, sometimes there is some debating society, sometimes there is some music taught of a more or less valuable character, sometimes there are lectures given on subjects of deep interest, and, altogether, there is far more to continue education given to these young persons as they become more advanced in life than might be thought by some who have not carefully investigated the subject. There is one other point in which I think we do indulge in too much depreciation opinions, and all the hon. Members who have spoken have agreed on that point. The difficulties are two: first in regard to compulsion, and then in regard to expense. Compulsory evening classes would be especially objectionable in the rural districts. For my own part, I am strongly in favour of every encouragement being given to the establishment of evening classes; but I think that the principle of compulsion ought not to be applied. There are two chief objections to these schools being made compulsory, especially in the rural districts; in the first place it would interfere with the labour market, because boys who have been working in the fields all day, can hardly be expected to attend classes every evening; and, in the next place, the difficulty with regard to girls would be even greater. On this point Archdeacon Barber, for 12 years Diocesan Inspector in the Diocese of Oxford, when before the Royal Commission, was asked (Question 49,779)—

“Should you be prepared to say whether you thought it a feasible plan to require compulsory attendance in evening schools?—A. I should hardly think that it was feasible.”

Question 49,780—

“That must apply specially to rural districts?—A. Yes.”

Then the Rev. F. Synge, who was appointed by the Education Department to the Norwich district in 1869, and has been there ever since, and was made Chief Inspector of the Eastern Division in 1886, was asked (Question 58,330)—

“You would not think it desirable that there should not be evening schools?—A. I think that some of the most useful of the evening schools, are those which it would be impossible to inspect and assess grants for fairly, and that they do their work much better, being free from all Government restrictions.”

Question 58,334—

“We have had a considerable amount of evidence before the Commission very strongly in favour of much greater encouragement being given to evening schools; and it has sometimes been suggested to the witnesses that, though they might be comparatively easy for boys, they would be very difficult to organize for girls, owing to the necessity for caution as to their being out late at night?—A. I think that it would be exceedingly difficult to organize them so that they would not be a greater evil than good.”

Question 58,335—

“Would you apply that remark to country schools, as well as to town schools?—A. Yes; I think so.”

Mr. J. G. Talbot

Question 58,336—

“And perhaps even more to country schools, because of the long distances and the unfrequented lanes they would have to pass?—A. Yes; I think so.”

Those who know anything about rural districts will admit that to compel children over the age of 13 to attend evening schools would be nothing less than insanity, and, in fact, it could not possibly be done. A system of compulsory attendance at evening schools must apply equally to both sexes, and the House, before it comes to a decision, must carefully examine the question as it affects the girls. I believe the universal feeling of the Royal Commission was that it was absolutely impossible to enforce compulsory attendance at night schools on girls. Of course, it is comparatively easy for boys in great centres of industrial occupation to be compelled to attend, but when you come to deal with rural districts the physical difficulties in the matter are exceedingly great. The districts are scattered, and it is almost impossible for boys who have been at hard work in agricultural pursuits during long hours to be compelled to attend night schools. I therefore hope that the House will not be led away by philanthropists to enforce a system of compulsion, which, if pushed too far, might have a disastrous effect in alienating public feeling in rural districts and producing a re-action which we might have to deplore. And then, too, there is the matter of expense. When the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Education Department and the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer come to address themselves to this subject they will have to make up their minds to dip their hands pretty deeply into the taxpayers' pockets. In the first place, the existing staff of school teachers will not be adequate for the additional labour which will be involved. I do not say this as an argument against continuation schools, but it is a matter which the House and the country should deliberate upon before rushing too hastily into this work. I hope, if we undertake the work, it will, indeed, be organized on a liberal scale; I am not speaking from a pecuniary point of view only, but as against that system of payment by results, which is universally denounced by the best friends of education.

and which will be specially to be deplored if it is applied to evening schools. I think Her Majesty's Inspectors, instead of looking to see if the schools pass given standards, should, in the case of evening schools, see that the schools are kept in good order, that the young people are really improving themselves, that the apparatus is satisfactory, and that the schools are doing good work. Do not let us, in fact, be tied down to that miserable system of earning so much money by so many passes, which is the bane of the day schools. An hon. Member suggested that it would be economical to employ the day teachers in the evening schools. No doubt we should thereby spend less money, but we might exhaust our material; and I do not think it would be wise to trust to that means of supply alone. I congratulate the House and the Government on the tone of the discussion.

*MR. W. F. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby): I can add little that is fresh or new to that which has been said, but I venture to address the House as an hon. Member fully alive to the importance of the subject. The hon. Member who introduced this matter has entitled himself to the thanks, for many years, of the people of Liverpool by his liberal hand and his liberal thoughts, and I am quite certain that I express the feeling of my constituents in extending to him, on their behalf, thanks for bringing this matter forward. Two hon. Members have referred to the squalor of the City of Liverpool, and those who do not know may think that, in some measure, its squalidity is owing to the want of action on the part of the School Board or of the Corporation. Now, I speak in the knowledge of many hon. Members when I say that the educational authorities of Liverpool are foremost in the educational battle, and also that the great Corporation of that city has been foremost in extending sanitary improvements throughout its length and breadth. The hon. Member who introduced this matter referred to the squalor to be found in the City of New York, and he attributed it, in a great degree, to the foreign element introduced from outside quarters. I think he would have been equally accurate if he had gone on to state that the squalor of the City of Liverpool was also, to a large extent, attributable to the outside element brought into its borders. In classical history we read of a certain people who were doomed to pour water into vessels without a bottom, and sometimes I think, when I look round the streets and courts of Liverpool, with which I have been intimately acquainted all my life, that the authorities of Liverpool are very much like those unhappy people, who, after all their efforts, find that a great deal still remains to be done. I cordially approve of the Motion before the House, and perhaps I do so more cordially because it keeps clear of details; but I think that, even about the details, there will be a large amount of common agreement, and when the question comes to be reduced into practice, we shall find hon. Members on both sides of the House combining to further the better instruction of our children who are growing into men. I cordially approve of the proposal to extend the school age of children, and I am quite in favour of promoting continuation schools, which, I feel convinced, will do a great deal to bridge over that time when children are turned loose from their regular schools to enter on the battle of life. It seems to me the real cruz of the whole thing is the matter of compulsion. I myself would strongly deprecate trying to compel these children to go to the evening schools. I believe, with the hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford University, that, whether it be in rural or in urban districts, compulsion is practically impossible. You can neither punish the child by imprisonment or fine for playing the truant from evening schools, nor can you punish the parent who, because the child does not come back after work, is unable to send him to school. I therefore think that the compulsion would break down, and that it would be a thousand pities that it should be tried. We have been told that, in the City of London, at least £20,000 or £30,000 is spent yearly on compulsion; and the hon. and gallant Baronet, who so ably represents the London School Board in this House took to his Board great credit for the way in which they swept the streets of London. But if I may make a remark, I should say that in the Bermondsey district the streets are by no means adequately swept of waifs and strays. Indeed, I think compulsion cultural pursuits to attend evening schools under a system of compulsion. But why not introduce the system of half-timers? Why not let the boys go to work in the morning and rest during the afternoon? They would then come fresh to their educational studies, which would have a charm for them after their half-holiday. I have done a good deal of voluntary work in evening schools in London, and I know how difficult it is to overcome the natural drowsiness of boys coming into a heated atmosphere from the fresh air after a long and hard day's work. As to the expense of the compulsory system, it has been said that £20,000 is spent yearly in sweeping the streets of London of the waifs and strays. But that is a mere bagatelle, when you come to remember that there is a population of five millions to deal with. I do not wish to make this a Party question; but when hon. Members opposite hold up their hands because an increase of expenditure is proposed in connection with national education, I would point out that there is no difficulty in finding millions when we want to increase the Navy and add to the Army Estimates. We ought not to be alarmed at a little increase of expenditure on our schools. That outlay is, in the long run, absolutely productive, whereas the money spent on the Army and Navy is not; indeed, the latter only increases the class dependent on the labouring community, and abstracts wealth from the population and impoverishes the country, while the money spent upon the education of the people makes them better wage earners and wealth producers. It is a matter for congratulation that while, since 1870, the amount spent on education has increased, the expense of pauperism has decreased and the number of criminals has diminished. In other words, we have forced open the door of our elementary schools and have compelled the children to go in, but in doing so we have closed the door of the gaol and the workhouse to them; and this is a distinct economic advantage, if we look on it from no other point of view. With regard to the pauperism that now actually prevails in our midst, hon. Gentlemen opposite appear to have underestimated the amount of it. My hon. Friend who introduced the Motion stated that he believed the pauper population of this country to be something like three millions. Well, I am afraid that this pauperism is double the number at which he set it. Instead of the number being only three millions, I greatly fear it is nearer six millions. I do not regard the pauper population as only those who, at any one given moment, are in receipt of pauper relief. I maintain that if the condition of a man is such that last year he was a pauper, and that he is looking forward to being a pauper again next year, he is in that state of abject fear, misery, despondency, dread, doubt, and difficulty which necessarily classes him amongst the paupers. If you find statistics which show that when a man's life comes to an end he has no alternative but to be classed with the paupers, I maintain that that man belongs to the pauper class. I hold in my hand some statistics compiled by Mr. M'Dougall, Vice Chairman of the Manchester Board of Guardians, according to which it appears that there are in the City of Manchester, living in a state of actual pauperism, 10·88 per cent of the entire population. But that is not all. The number who actually die in the workhouse, or in receipt of parish relief, is one in every 5·84; that is, more than 17 per cent. of the population die under the shadow of the workhouse at last. It seems almost incredible to think that when you have an audience before you of 1,000 people in the City of Manchester, you can say 171 of these people will die in the workhouse, or at the time of their death will be in receipt of workhouse relief. I do not take these figures merely on the statement of Mr. M'Dougall, Vice Chairman of the Manchester Board of Guardians, but I refer to one of his authorities — namely, the Registrar General's Report for 1879, and I find there that in public institutions, including workhouses, infirmaries, and public lunatic asylums, the deaths recorded were equal to 10·1 of all the deaths in the whole of England and Wales. This does not include those who died in receipt of outdoor relief, nor the many more who die as beneficiaries at home, and in hospitals of benevolent and philanthropic institutions. Therefore, it is indisputable that beyond the 10 per cent of the population which die in the workhouse and other institutions, those who live in poverty but escape the workhouse at the end of life are also very numerous. This reveals a most miserable state of things, and I am glad my hon. Friend has brought forward one aspect of this case of pauperism, and has made an effort in one direction of relieving it. I do not believe his plan will have the far-reaching effect and influence which he expects. There are many disintegrating causes at work. Education alone will not be enough to relieve us from the miserable position in which we are placed. I look to other social efforts. I look forward to the time when workhouses will be done away with, and we shall have workfields and workyards where those now driven to the so-called workhouse can earn a livelihood. I look forward to the time when men and women, having a larger share of the wealth they create, will be released from the necessities and troubles which now surround them, and will gladly contribute to the education of others, as we now insist that they shall share better educational advantages from the State.

*THE VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): I will not detain the House by enlarging on, or dealing further with the sad and gloomy topics which the hon. Member who has just sat down brought under our notice. I do not admit the correctness of his figures, or the accuracy of the conclusions he has drawn, and I cannot help thinking that he seems disposed to paint the shadows rather too darkly, and to admit too little sunshine into the picture. I would rather go back to the more pleasant aspect of the case. So far as I am concerned I am sure there is no Member in the House who feels the difficulty of the position that I have the honour to hold than I do, or the inadequacy with which I fill it. If there is anything that can encourage a man in my position, it is the candid and generous treatment I have received on all sides of the House, and if I disagree from some of my friends and their conclusions it will be in no hypercritical or contentious spirit, but in an earnest desire to carry out the object of the hon. Member for Flintshire has in view in bringing forward the Motion. It is rather difficult to deal with the formal Resolution on the Paper, because it is partly shadowed or accompanied by a Bill; and between the two there is some divergence. The Resolution refers to those who leave day schools early; but the hon. Member, in his speech, contemplates schools for ex-day scholars of from 12 to 16, and for those who have passed the exemption standard. The hon. Member suggests that the last standard may be taken in the continuation school; but I am strongly of opinion that there would be something hazardous in breaking up day-school life. If you fix a standard of exemption, you ought to secure that the education is completed in the day school. If I had any doubts on the point beforehand, they have been confirmed by the debate. The State has a right to demand absolute security for the value of that for which it pays, and I think we have had ample indications in this debate to show that if the education in the last standard is confided to night schools the security as to that standard will be of an illusory character. The day-school education should be completed at the day school, from which the continuation school should be kept quite distinct. The hon. Member for Liverpool gave a gloomy picture of neglected children in large towns; but the hon. Member appeared to be carried away by his enthusiasm, for, go where you will, to town or agricultural district, there is a general concurrence in the statement that children are now better fed, clothed, cared for, and educated than they were 10 or 12 years ago. The hon. Member has quoted the City of Liverpool with which he is well acquainted, but I maintain that the condition of things there is exceptional, and that people of the knowledge and common sense of Members of this House who are constantly travelling and visiting the large centres of the country will confirm the view I have just expressed. I can speak confidently in this matter of the condition of the children of the wage earning class in the agricultural districts of Kent. And, Sir, when the hon. Member presents to the House his gloomy picture of the state of these unfortunate neglected children in our large towns I would appeal to something stronger and more material than our own observation and experience, I would appeal to the statistics of crime—for, after all, if the picture the hon. Member draws has anything of truth in it, it means infant crime. If these vast numbers of neglected children which he pictured are constantly running about the streets by night, contaminated by everything evil, I say it can only lead to one possible result—namely, infant crime. What is the main result of the statistics? They amount to this, that since Mr. Forster's Act of 1870 was passed our population has increased by one-fourth, and in spite of that increase that our juvenile crime is to-day exactly half what it was in 1870. I think, therefore, that the hon. Gentleman opposite has painted the picture in too deep and fervid a colour. There is perfect unanimity as to the object in view. The House of Commons is unanimous on the subject, and the Royal Commission unanimously reported in favour of encouraging the system of evening and continuation schools. I shall, no doubt, be asked what is the view of Her Majesty's Government in the matter. In reply to this inquiry, I am obliged to contest much that has been said as to the actual position of our evening school system. Many gentlemen, in referring to that system, have dealt only with the bare figures as they appear in connexion with the grants paid by the Education Department; but that is an altogether fallacious view to take. It ignores the vast amount of good that has been done by voluntary effort and in other ways. The minority Report of the Commission, in dealing with this question, was strongly in favour of extending the system of continuation schools. Yet they concluded with some very remarkable observations—that while they thought the State, through the Education Department, should help these schools as much as possible, and while the local machinery of School Boards should also be directed to their improvement and extension,

“We are of opinion that this is a branch of education in which we must endeavour very largely to enlist voluntary activity and co-operation.”

To my mind, taking the view I do of the existing state of things—that is a very encouraging sentence—and, in view of that, I should like to point to another sentence in the Minority Report, in which the Commissioners allude to the systematizing of science and art schools, the expansion of mechanics' institutions, and other agencies. From the first day I entered the Education Department I have given most earnest attention to this question, and the first motive which induced me to introduce a Technical Instruction Bill was that a vast number of youths and others would, under the operation of such a measure, be attracted to evening classes. In addition to the voluntary agencies to which I have alluded, the Recreative Evening Schools Association is doing a vast amount of good in our large towns, and there are also the Science and Art classes. I often think it is too much the fashion to ignore the extraordinary amount of good which these classes are doing. In making these observations I am not pleading against the Motion, nor against any assistance the Government can give to continuation schools, but simply pointing out what is being done by the Science and Art Department, and showing the extraordinary increase which is yearly going on in connection with these classes. At the April, May, and June examinations in 1888, the number of Science Schools examined was 2,035; and up to November last the number of applications sent in by schools for forms in the present year has been 2,212, showing an increase in one year of 200 schools. Take the number of students in the schools. In 1888, the number of students was 113,000; and in the Estimates for 1889-90, the Department Estimates for 125,000—an increase of 12,000 scholars—and a proportionate increase is anticipated in the Art Classes. These figures show that a vast movement is every year going on in connection with these classes at the expense of the Exchequer. As regards evening classes, there is a growth of something like 8 per cent. this year, and there is an increase in the number of students receiving instruction in additional subjects. There is another very important element which, I think, we ought to consider in dealing with the question, and that is the one the hon. Gentleman opposite has referred to, technical education. I am glad my right hon. Friend has appealed to me on it, and I hope that before the end of the Session he will appeal to me in still more harsh terms if nothing is done. I am most anxious to carry the Bill dealing with that subject, and although it is not distinctly mentioned in the Queen's Speech, my colleagues in the Government are equally anxious to see the measure passed. There are one or two difficulties in the way, but I hope we shall be able to surmount them; and, so far as I am concerned, I will leave no stone unturned to deal with the question in the present Session. Something has been done to remove the extraordinary hindrance which has hitherto been placed in the way of evening schools by the stringent requirement of the Department as to elementary subjects. It has been discovered that the sooner this restriction is removed the better will it be for the evening schools and for the cause of education. It has been stated that if this hindrance were removed, the 30,000 schools would become 60,000, and I do not regard that an exaggerated estimate. I am not divulging any Cabinet secret if I state that in the new Education Code there will be a provision whereby any scholar who can show that within six months of the time of his appearing in the school he has passed a certain standard, he will not be bothered with any of the elementary subjects, but will be free to be put in additional subjects, as the locality may deem necessary. I hold that in a question of this kind, the common-sense view is to leave the localities to deal with the curriculum as much as possible, although with State aid it is, of course, necessary to have some security that the money is not wasted. I do not say these things in antagonism to the Motion, but simply to show that as far as the Government are concerned they are not blind to the necessities of the day, and that they recognize as one of the chief and most urgent necessities of the day the advance and encouragement of evening and continuation schools in every possible way. As to the standard of exemption in Elementary Schools I am not prepared to join issue with hon. Members. It is a very large and important question affecting not only the educational future of the country, but the labour market. The one commercial centre most affected by the half-timers—Bradford—resents most strongly any interference with the present standard of exemption. I have here a memorial from the school authorities in Bradford which, referring to the hon. Gentleman's Bill of last year, said—

"As the Bill now stands it would create an impracticable condition of things in Bradford if it did not give rise to an open revolt against the Education Act as a whole."

I quote this merely to show that the Government cannot introduce legislation without a due consideration of the whole subject. Then the question of the supply of teachers—one on which both the minority and majority of the Commission insisted—has to be faced in any attempt to provide the continuation schools suggested. I do not agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Evesham (Sir R. Temple) in suggesting that the day teachers should be employed in the night schools. The teachers are an already overworked body of men having quite enough to attend to during the day. Again, the question of compulsion has to be met in any attempt to deal with the question in the terms of the Resolution before the House. The minority of the Commission were not prepared to advocate the system of compulsion. A State-aided system to be successful ought to be universal; and then there are difficulties to be met in suburbs and agricultural districts, where scholars will have to travel a great distance. Some security ought to be provided that the schools will be successful and that the children will attend. It has been urged, and I am of opinion it would be better to lessen the harshness and asperity of school life and adopt some system more likely to make the schools draw. But then the taxpayers ought to be consulted on the point before they are asked to put their hands into their pockets. They ought to have the chance of asking the question, "Where is education to end and where is amusement to begin in these continuation schools?" Then another question that will rise will be that of secondary education. I do not say whether it is right that the State should pay for it or not; but I maintain that if the taxpayers are to pay for secondary education, it is only fair that they should first be told of the new incubus to be laid upon them. I assure hon. Members on both sides of the House that any measure which may be introduced on the subject will receive the candid consideration of the Government; but as far as legislation during this Session is concerned, I must say that I do not think there will be much chance for it if the present rate of progress is maintained. I should be glad if I could carry a measure dealing with technical education; but, so far, it seems that the Session is to be one for Supply only. Independently of that, however, I, in my responsible position, will do my utmost to promote the cause which has to-night been advocated in the House.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): I think all hon. Members will feel we are indebted to the hon. Member for Flintshire (Mr. S. Smith) not only for the admirable speech he has delivered but also for one of the most useful and interesting debates we have had for some time. I find myself in agreement with the hon. Gentleman in nearly all the statements he made. I think, however, my hon. Friend underrated the enormous work already done in education, and exaggerated, somewhat, the results which we may hope to follow upon the establishment of continuation schools. How is it that my hon. Friend is able to draw such a deplorable picture of the state of our elementary education after 18 years of work and the large expenditure of money which has taken place during that period? It is not at all difficult to explain. When Mr. Forster brought in his Education Bill there were 3,000,000 fewer children at school than there are to-day. Mr. Forster was so anxious to obtain a recognition of a standard for labour that when the local authorities came to him and fixed a Standard at which children should pass out of school and take employment, he was glad to accept almost any standard they brought, and he did in some instances accept a standard for total exemption as low as the third. But Standard IV. prevails very largely throughout the country, and especially in the rural districts. What has happened? Standard IV. is a standard which, when Mr. Forster passed the Act, was not attainable by children until they were something like 12 or 13 years of age, but now it is commonly attainable by children of 10 years of age. Better the regularity of attendance, better the quality of teaching, and the same children pass the standards of education, until it has come to this, that clever children in large numbers pass the necessary Standard at an early age, and, especially in rural districts, pass out of school. There can be no more wasteful system than to allow children to pass out of school at 10 years of age, and forget at the time they are about 13 nearly all they have acquired at so much expense. The Vice-President of the Committee (Sir W. Hart Dyke) has expressed his approval of the object the hon. Member for Flintshire has at heart. The Vice-President is always courteous and always sympathetic, but then he has not always got the power to carry out his good wishes and intentions. When hon. Members reproach the Vice-President with the pedantry of his Department, they must recollect that it is not the pedantry of the Education Department that is to be complained of, but it is the parsimony of the Treasury. It is no use blaming the right hon. Gentleman because he does not give a larger amount of grant or a larger latitude to School Boards, but it is the Chancellor of the Exchequer who is to be complained of. I am glad to see the Chancellor of the Exchequer present, because I want to make a request, which I trust he will find it difficult to refuse. In 1887 the right hon. Gentleman, addressing a large audience in the Free Trade Hall, Manchester, pointed out how important it was that the children of the country should enjoy the advantages of technical education, and hoped the people would not let Irish obstruction stand between them and the education of their children. There is no Irish obstruction now; it is Treasury obstruction. The Vice-President hopes he will be able to carry his Technical Education Bill, but he seems to fear delay in the House. There will be no delay in the House. [Mr. GOSCHEN: Will you see to that?] Let the right hon. Gentleman produce his Bill. We have had it mentioned in the Queen's Speech twice, and two Bills have been laid on the Table, but both have been withdrawn. Why? Because they have been condemned by the Liberal Unionists, supporters of the Government. Let us have a good measure introduced; let us have it soon, and I think I can promise the right hon. Gentleman that it will not occupy many—I will not say days, but hours, to pass. I must say another word in defence of the good work that has been done by the Education Department. My hon. Friend (Mr. S. Smith) pointed out that only 128,000 children have passed annually the VI and VII Standards. I agree with him that every child who passes out of school should pass the VI Standard, but what was the state of things 18 years ago? When Mr. Forster introduced his Bill, the number of children presented in the VI Standard in any one year was only 24,000. Then the VI Standard was the present V; there was no VI and VII; and what have we done? Last year 265,000 children were presented in the V Standard, (formerly the VI,) and 128,000 children were presented in the VI and VII. That is a marvellous advance, one which must be a source of rejoicing to everyone. I agree with a good deal of what was said by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Evesham (Sir R. Temple). The London School Board are doing magnificent work in the Metropolis. They have done more to civilize and humanize the poor and wretched classes than any other body in the Metropolis. I hope they will continue in the good work, and not flinch because it costs another  $\frac{1}{4}$ d. or  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. in the rate. We are very economical whenever education is mentioned. As a matter of fact we are wasteful, because we do not complete our work. There is no man of business would ever dream of doing his business as we do ours—leaving off in the middle and letting the part we have done perish because we will not furnish the remainder. Now, I am bound to say that while the Motion of the hon. Member for Flintshire refers only to night schools, the hon. Gentleman practically impeaches the whole of our educational arrangements. I think he is right, because the arrangements made by the Education Act of 1870 became obsolete by 1880. The Vice President has said that Bradford objects to any interference with the half-time Standard. It used to be Standard II, but now it is Standard III. Will he believe that in Yorkshire, in Lancashire, and in the Midlands there are factory towns in which factory labour is important and where there is Standard IV for half-timers and Standard VI for full-timers. I hope that the Report of the Royal Commission will not be left without Legislation. I trust that we shall raise the age of exemption throughout by law. With the exception of Belgium and Russia, England works its children longer hours and harder than any other country in Europe. In most countries children cannot leave school until they are 14, but in England children are allowed to begin work at 10. Now, while compulsion is necessary for day schools, I think it very doubtful whether it should be applied to the night schools, which should be made attractive. With the widest range of colonies in the world, we want to see our people enterprising and ready to go out into the world rather than sit at home and starve. Therefore we should teach them the geography and resources of our colonies. Those also who are intended to engage in commerce should have the advantage of being able to learn a foreign language. But, more than all, what is wanted from one end of England to the other is technical education. We are told by everybody—by Professor Huxley, by Lord Salisbury, the Prime Minister, by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and by others—how important technical education is for the people, and yet we cannot get a fair Bill laid on the Table. A Bill on that subject might be passed in less time than this debate has taken. Why not refer it to a Grand Committee, as was done in the case of the Railway Bill last year? Again, I entirely agree that it is of the utmost importance to maintain our infant schools. That is a part of our system of which we have reason to be proud. I do not believe any system in Europe can compare favourably with it. My hon. Friend made reference to Berlin, and spoke of the kind of education given there. When I was there some three years ago, and investigated this matter for myself, I was astounded to find the numbers of children who attended the principal schools in Berlin. There is a school within a few yards of the British Embassy, through which I was told in three years 2,000 scholars under 17 had passed in the higher curriculum adopted, and in the various industries of Berlin they desired to follow. In all the 19 arrondissements of Paris, languages, technical education, art and science teaching, as applied to industry, can be obtained free of cost by any man coming out of the street in any of the schools of the arrondissements. Nothing is more astonishing to an Englishman than to see the sacrifices foreign nations are making to enable their workmen to compete in the production and beauti-fyng of manufactures. The Vice-President has assured us that when he lays the New Code upon the Table we shall find in it some of the provisions we are so anxiously looking for, and I can promise him in this matter of the Code that anything that appears there shall have not only our most careful but our most favourable consideration. I know the difficulties of his position in regard to payments by results. The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. J. G. Talbot) spoke in a tone of strong condemnation of the system, and is anxious that we should abandon it, but I am surprised to hear from him, an advocate of the voluntary system, a condemnation of payments by results. I want to know how you are going to pay away millions from the Exchequer without having some test of the application of the money. The whole difficulty is a consequence of the voluntary system, whether we like it or not. You cannot pay into the hands of voluntary managers money without exacting some proof that the money is well expended. You may pay it to local authorities, to elected bodies over whom you exercise supervision, but it is not possible to pay to private persons, however good may be their intentions and however good their management, without some test as to how the money is expended. I only hope the Vice-President will lay, not only the Code, but his Technical Instruction Bill, upon the Table, and I hope it will be advanced with the least possible delay. He may be assured it will be received with the most sympathetic consideration by the House.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex S.E.): As a Member for an agricultural constituency I cannot help offering a most emphatic protest against the bare idea of continuing compulsory education after the age of 13. In towns it may be well and good, but in agricultural and rural districts it would be an absolute and complete fiasco. What the agricultural labourer wants, and what he has some expectation of having, is that his children shall not be kept entirely at school after the age of 12, when they are able to work. Where the agricultural shoe pinches, is not in the fact of having to pay school pence—I believe the hon. Member for Spalding (Mr. H. Stewart) will agree with me—but the fact that the labourers' children are taken away precisely at the time when they are wanted—to use a colloquial expression—“to keep the pot boiling.” To tell him that his children are to be kept at school till the age of 23 is to pile up the agony, to put the last straw upon an agricultural labourer's back, when he is extremely ill able to bear it.

*MR. PICTON (Leicester): I join in the meads of praise which have been so repeatedly uttered concerning the service done to the cause of Education by the hon. Member for Flintshire in introducing this discussion, but I cannot help thinking the discussion has often strayed from the immediate purpose of the Motion the hon. Member has given notice of, and would have moved had the forms of the House permitted. The subject of this Motion is the desirability of establishing a system of Evening Continuation Schools. Now we have heard a great deal about the whole system of Elementary Schools in the country, but we have not heard so much as I would have desired to have heard concerning the especial subject of the hon. Member's Motion. In order to explain the point of view I desire to lay before the House, I will call attention to a phrase used in the Resolution that gives some reason for possible differences between Members who are heartily in sympathy with the hon. Member and the object he has in view. The Motion speaks of Evening Continuation Schools “where children who leave Elementary Day Schools at a very early age may continue their education.” Now we ought to distinguish two entirely different things; on the one hand real continuation schools adapted to prolong the normal culture of children, to give them a further amount of knowledge and develop the instruction they have received at day schools up to the age of 13 or 14; and, on the other hand, evening schools to do the work left undone by day schools in the case of very young children. These are two entirely different things. The hon. Member and others have referred to evening schools carried on in considerable numbers by Continental nations, but these are schools to continue the education and culture children have previously received, and in a measure perfectly received up to the age of 13 or 14. But the very notion of schools held in the evening in which hard-worked young children of 10 or 11 years of age are to attend after some four or five hours' manual labour during the day, and weary their brains with endeavours to master reading, writing, and arithmetic, is wholly foreign to any idea of education in any country on the Continent, and I wish it were foreign to every civilized nation. Hon. Gentlemen have spoken as if it were quite within the limit of human nature for boys and girls of 11 and 12 years of age to go to the evening school, and there weary their young, immature minds after engaging in manual labour during the day. The very idea of the thing is, to my mind, most cruel and inhuman. I would ask fathers of families who know what the burden imposed upon boys and girls by evening after-school lessons is, what they think of such a proposition? Over and over again we have had complaints of the evening study required from boys and girls at high schools. It has been asked is it wise, is it healthy for young children to spend as much as two hours' mental labour in the evening? I know that head-masters and principals of girls' schools have issued instructions to parents that for children of 10 or 12 not more than an hour's evening study is desirable, and for older children not more than two. With what decency, with what pretence to human sympathy, can we propose that young and tender children should occupy four or five hours in manual labour during the day and then attend school in the evening? It is impossible that they can derive any benefit from it. Therefore I cannot sympathize or agree with any portion of the speech of my hon. Friend in which, if I rightly interpreted him, he seemed to favour the idea that we could supply the defects of our system of elementary education in allowing a short time at day schools by sending children to school in the evening. [Mr. SAMUEL SMITH: I did not advocate that.] I am sorry if I misunderstood him, but I can claim some justification from the terms of the Resolution itself—"children who leave day schools at a very early age." That must surely mean children under 12 years, and, if so, I say such children ought not to be allowed to attend schools in the evenings. I deprecate that most earnestly, most emphatically. I am of opinion that proper continuation schools are in the highest degree desirable for boys and girls who leave ordinary schools at the age of 13 or 14. I am very sorry that the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Major Rasch) should consider it necessary to protest against children continuing at school until they are 14. Why, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) says, in no European nation that boasts any high rank in education is such a thing tolerated as that a child should leave school before the age of 14 unless under very peculiar circumstances, and I trust to see the time come when no child shall be allowed to go to work before the age of 14. I know it is often said that it is very necessary to poor parents that their children should go to work at an early age, but I deny it altogether. I say it is wholly against the interest of the labouring classes that child-labour should be introduced so profusely as it is. It lowers the standard of life; it lowers the standard of expenses a parent is expected to meet, and, therefore, it lowers the standard of wages. If no parent had a prospect of sending his child to work until the age of 14, the standard of wages would rise, for parents would always have to consider and have to regard the necessity of providing for their children up to that age. It is a most short-sighted, unsound view to take of the interests of the working classes, that they should be allowed to send the labour of young, immature children to compete with adult labour—for that is really the meaning of it. Therefore, so far as my remarks are concerned, I wish to deal only with proper continuation schools—schools for young people between the ages of 14 and 17, at which the culture they have received at the day schools may be continued and developed. So far as the Vice President has replied on the subject, I think we may congratulate ourselves very highly on the tone of his observations, and I, as having had some experience in the matter—I as member of the earliest School Board of London for nine years, and for country School Boards after that, besides being concerned in various enterprizes for promoting culture—I say I heard the remarks the right hon. Gentleman made with the greatest pleasure. I congratulate him upon recognizing, as he did, the necessity for considerably more elasticity in the relations between the Education Department and the local managers of evening schools, continuation schools, or others. I recognize also with pleasure the extent to which he approved of making evening schools attractive as a substitution for compulsion. I do not think it possible in this country to apply the principle of compulsion to evening schools. I know it is done to some extent in Germany, but we have other ideas of freedom here than those which obtain in Germany. I do not think the thing is possible. We must make these schools attractive if we would bring young people into them. On one point I cannot help disagreeing with the Vice President; he seemed to desire rather more supervision on the part of the Education Department than is absolutely necessary. He said—"Of course to the Education Department must be reserved the ultimate decision whether the course of education devised for an evening school is wise or not." Well, I know, if the Government are to grant money, they must be consulted, and that their authority must have weight in regard to the curriculum we adopt; but I beseech the right hon. Gentleman to get rid of the superstition that while obscurity reigns outside the Department, but that Whitehall has a peculiarly luminous atmosphere.

*SIR W. HART DYKE: May I explain? What I referred to was supervision to see no subject was taught that was practically absurd. I always supposed there would be a liberal curriculum.

*MR. PICTON: Of course, I am unable to contravene the view urged that no subject which is absurd should be taught; but I think it is highly improbable that any local authorities would desire to have such a subject taught. All I want to say is this—that human nature is the same in Whitehall or Little Pedlington, but Little Pedlington understands its own requirements better than Whitehall; and there should be considerable room for experience—greater elasticity or freedom—allowed to local authorities in this matter. Another subject referred to is the creation of the evening school staff to be employed; and, as to the cost, various hon. Gentlemen have spoken with some fear, if all the young people are gathered into these schools as we should like to see them. When I heard these remarks, I could not but call to mind those discussions upon which we have recently been occupied. Of course I should not be in order to go into them, but I may refer for a moment to the proposal for granting extraordinary sums for naval and military expenditure. It seems there is no limit to extravagance when these destructive services are concerned; but when the building up of our civilization, the culture of our race, is concerned, parsimony and timidity reign supreme! I suppose I may not hope to live to see the day, but I hope it may be in the time of my great grandchildren, or within a few generations, when more money will be spent on schools than on the Army and Navy. For that end I think we ought to work. If money is wanted for our schools, and we cannot—and we ought not to—raise it by fresh taxation, then it should be economized from money saved out of warlike and destructive expenditure. But I pass from that. There was considerable reason in the discursive allusions that have been made repeatedly during the evening to the system pursued in our ordinary day schools, and many reasons have been given for the difficulties that have been found in working our evening schools as we should desire. It seems to me the chief difficulty lies in the inefficiency of our day school system. It is well known that children do not for the most part—I know there are exceptions—do not leave the day school having passed the Fifth or Sixth Standard, with any enthusiastic desire to learn more. The whole system has been so mechanical, so painful and tiresome, that all but exceptional children are glad to get rid of school, and dread the idea of entering a continuation school. I may be permitted to refer to a principle I have at times enunciated when the subject of education has been before us, the need of moulding, of co-ordinating our whole educational system into a unity—a unity of organic development. In this point of view, infant schools have been rightly referred to. I am sorry my hon. Friend (Mr. S. Smith) does not seem sufficiently to appreciate the work of infant schools; but I am convinced that in the most improved methods of infant school training, such as Froebel's, we have the proper system which by natural development could be pursued throughout ordinary day schools, and without any detriment to learning in the evening schools, and it would be so attractive to the scholars that there would be no temptation to stay away. We cannot treat one part of our educational system without regarding the whole, and if this leads us to appreciate the necessity for one principle running through our whole system, this discussion will not have been in vain. Though I differ from my hon. Friend on some points, I cannot help congratulating him on what, I hope, will be the fruitfulness of the discussion he has raised.

*MR. DE LISLE (Leicestershire, Mid): I have been very much interested in the debate, but I have heard very little in favour of the Motion, and if it had been possible to call a Division I should have voted against the Motion. Had it been possible to move an Amendment to the Resolution, I should have proposed it in this form—

"That it is desirable to develop the existing system of education by evening schools, where children who have left elementary day schools, not before they have attained the age of 13 and have passed the sixth standard, may continue their education."

That I think would express the opinion of the generality of speakers this evening. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sheffield made an eloquent speech in favour of technical education, but I do not think he said anything in favour of the Resolution. In the remarks that fell from the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Picton) there is much with which I agree. We must all see the gravity of the problem presented. We see the expense of our system growing at a fearful ratio, while we see in our great cities a great amount of human misery. In the development of education lies the best influence on the future of the working classes. Certainly, I should like to see the age of compulsory attendance raised to 13, and no child allowed to leave school until he passes the Sixth Standard. I know the difficulties; I view the future with anxiety, and I feel how sad is the picture the hon. Member Mr. S. Smith has put before the House. But in the extension of a true, sound, rational, and Christian system of education, I see the best hope for the future. Education leads to emigration, and in emigration there are the means of escape for hundreds of thousands from lives of misery. I do not, however, think a proposal such as this will assist us. If the Government can see their way to raising the age of exemption from attendance at school and raise the standard of education they will do a wise and just thing; but, on other hand, I do not minimise the difficulties involved in such a policy—Primum est vivere, deinde philosophari—and our agricultural classes can scarcely keep their children from starvation in many cases, so that the benefits of education often seem to them to be a cruel mockery. However, I congratulate the hon. Member for Flintshire on having brought this matter before the House, as I think it has resulted in a very useful debate. But so far as the Motion is concerned, it is certainly one I should have voted against, if it had been in my power to do so.

MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford): I wish to make an explanation as to the position taken by the borough I have the honour to represent in regard to the representation made to the Education Department—referred to by the right hon. Gentleman—in the Memorial that was sent in in regard to the half-time system. I should be sorry if the impression were to get abroad that Bradford is indifferent to education. The House will know that no town in the country interested itself in education with more zeal, and vigour, and liberality at the time of the passing of the Education Act of the late Mr. Forster; but it should be known that nearly half the whole number of half-timers engaged in the textile industry of England are engaged in the district of Bradford. Bradford, therefore, is singled out in reference to this question affecting the great industrial community. I wish the House to understand that if any arbitrary or severe step is taken in raising the standard suddenly and inconsiderately, it will be the death-blow for years to the industry of the town I represent. Our machinery and the character of the industry carried on make it absolutely necessary that young people should be engaged in certain branches of that industry. We have already had a raising f the standard, and I have no doubt that in a moderate time it will be possible to go a step further. An hon. Member opposite aptly quoted the old proverb, "It is necessary to live before you begin to philosophize." Many people come to these towns because they have children. Widows come in large numbers because their children here can find employment. I do not wish to dwell upon this subject, the difficulty of which will be understood by the Education Department, but I wish to remove any misapprehension there may be as to the desire of Bradford, or the Bradford School Board, to do anything to hamper the cause of education.

I congratulate the hon. Gentleman the Member for Flintshire on the discussion he has raised to-night. He has stimulated our desire to see something done on this question—he has done more than that, for he has been instrumental in eliciting from the representative of the Education Department an utterance pointing more to an advancement in education than anything we have hitherto had. I can only say that I think the House and the country are to be congratulated upon there having been an interlude of this kind. I can only hope that the Government, having listened to this debate, will take a somewhat different view from that which seems to prevail at this moment, which is, that the taxpayers are prepared for any extravagant expenditure in ships of war which may go to the bottom of the sea, and only become parsimonious when this question of education is mentioned. For a very small expenditure—only some £150,000—we should be able to offer to children of superior capacity in all parts of the country an opportunity of carrying their education further and of developing gifts which now lie waste, and I am sure the country would never object to the necessary expenditure. I trust the hon. Gentleman the Member for Leicester (Mr. Picton) will re-echo the sentiments he has expressed, not only to the House, but throughout the country, and that the country will force on this and other Governments the conviction that when they are asked for something like liberality and breadth in the consideration of this educational problem it will not do to be at all parsimonious. If the Government bring forward the Measure foreshadowed by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, for which the country is panting, I agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) that it will be received on all sides with real unanimity.

*MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I desire to congratulate hon. Members generally, on the tone of this debate and on the fact that the discussion has not been altogether left to this side of the House. But, whilst I am content to join in the general chorus of self-congratulation, I am bound to say I have been asking myself while I have been listening to the latter part of this debate, how far there is any prospect of solid results arising out of it. I am not sure that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford has not gone a little too far in eulogizing the right hon. Gentleman the Vice-President of the Council for the speech he has made, not that I have anything to find fault with in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, but I am bound to say that I do not see that what he said advances much the cause of those evening continuation schools, whose establishment we are advocating this evening. It seems to me that the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, the Vice-President of the Council, really amounts to no more than this, that he will introduce certain alterations in the code which will tend to facilitate the working of the existing evening classes, and that, if allowed to do so by his colleagues, and if time permits, he will introduce and carry a Technical Education Bill. I should have been glad if the right hon. Gentleman could have seen his way to have suggested other alterations in the law, which would not have tended to raise our evening classes to a higher level of usefulness and of perfection. I should like to point out one or two directions in which I think that might be done. With regard to expense, I heartily concur with the observations which have fallen from my hon. Friends the Member for Leicester (Mr. Picton) and Bradford (Mr. Illingworth), as to the folly of our continually squandering large sums of money upon hostile destructive purposes, and refusing in a niggardly spirit to spend a few thousands on the immensely important business of the education of our artisans. When I point out that in this country we are spending only a miserable sum of £6,000,000 on education against £30,000,000 on the Army and Navy, whilst in the United States the sum spent on education is at least double that spent on armaments, the House will see at once one great reason why we have to fear the competition of our cousins across the Atlantic, and one great cause why they are so far ahead of us in everything connected with commerce and industry. The more you spend on this remunerative business of education the more you get back. It is absurd to be pottering over a few hundreds of thousands of pounds on this subject of education when we ought to be glad to invest our millions on it. I am certain that if the people of the country, burdened as they are now with rates and taxes, could see that they are now being robbed of millions for worse than useless purposes and that the same millions could be employed on the advancement and development of their own children, they would not in the least make an outcry when it was proposed so to spend their money; but would be only too pleased to pay whatever amount might be considered necessary. Another matter I desire to refer to is, the question of compulsion. Something has been said as to the impossibility of compelling children to attend night schools. I can only say it has not been found impossible to secure the attendance of children at such schools which already exist particularly in Switzerland. I am not anxious to increase the terrors of compulsion to the parents of children, because I believe that it is not by forcible means, such as prosecutions and so forth, that you can inculcate a true respect and love for your education in parents any more than you are likely to instil into the children a love for learning by frequent applications of the cane. This I believe, that if you adopt that sensible course of instruction which is advocated by the Recreative Evening Classes Association, even though it may be difficult, sometimes, to distinguish between amusement and real education—if you adopt a system thoroughly in harmony with the instincts and feelings of the children—you will have an end to the necessity for compulsion. If you make your teaching sufficiently attractive, you will find your children glad to come to the schools, and their parents delighted to send them. That, I believe, is the true antidote for compulsion. I would illustrate this by pointing to what I myself had experience of before I came to the House to-day. I was visiting one of the schools in the district which I happen to represent on the London School Board, and I found in one of the boys' department, that it was the afternoon for object lessons, and the master was teaching his pupils physical science. The master pointed with pleasure to the fact that on these afternoons when object lessons take place, he has a far higher attendance of children than on any other day in the week. Well, what happened in this school, will happen at evening classes in higher schools. If you teach the children something besides the rules of grammar—which are in the highest degree distasteful and painful to those who have them thrust down their throats day after day—if you infuse into the minds of the children something of a more practical kind, which is just as wholesome, and as calculated to benefit them in future years, you will get rid of the necessity for compulsion. In some of the reports of the best of Her Majesty's Inspectors, you will find statements to the effect that the children who have been the brightest and the most advanced in the infant classes under the Kindergarten system when sent up to the boys' and girls' branches go back in their work owing to the lack of interest attaching to the subjects taught, and owing to the methods of teaching. This shows the importance of having your curriculum adapted to the age of the child—and I hope that this is a point which the right hon. Gentleman, the Vice-President of the Council will devote careful consideration to. As to the teachers, I have been looking over a report touching the educational system of the City of Boston in the United States which has, perhaps, the highest development of the highest system of education which this world can produce. We find in this Report that the authorities declare in favour of having the best teachers at the night schools. It has been said by the hon. Member for Worcestershire (Sir R. Temple) that we are spending too much on the teaching staff, and that, if we are going to give more teaching in evening classes, it will be necessary to require the teachers in the day schools to work a sort of double shift.

*SIR R. TEMPLE: I said that some day-school teachers work at night voluntarily for extra remuneration. I did not say I would put additional work on them compulsorily, without remuneration.

*MR. CONYBEARE: I know that some of them do voluntarily undertake additional work, and where they do that there is no cause to complain; but I want to point out that there are a great number of young teachers who have been trained at great public cost in our training colleges who never find employment at all. Why should we not avail ourselves of the services of these teachers, who are amply qualified to teach, and who, I am sure, will be only too ready to undertake such employment. I do not desire to go into subjects upon which we are all more or less in harmony; but I should like to recall the attention of the House to the statement made by Sir Charles Warren, when Chief Commissioner of Police—and which may be verified by every hon. Member who will take the trouble to look for himself at the crowds which are very often called, rightly or wrongly “the unemployed”—that numbers of those who meet in the open spaces of London, and who are arrested (and otherwise ill-treated) by the police, are young boys. Is it not of importance to consider that whenever there is a little excitement, political or otherwise, or an opportunity for people to come together, you find the greater number of them consisting of lads who are apparently out of work. It seems to me that this is a consideration bearing on the question, and that we should see if these lads could not be beneficially influenced by making the schools more attractive. The right hon. Gentleman has spoken of the moral results of evening classes, and thinks that you ought not on that ground to compel attendance at night schools. For my part, I do not agree with the right hon. Gentleman. I think the moral results of night schools are, and will continue to be, in every respect admirable, and there need be no fear that girls' evening schools would prove a failure on this score. It is stated that not only is no complaint made on this ground; but, on the contrary, those who are familiar with the working of these evening classes say they are conducive to moral results, because, by providing a pleasant and attractive means of recreative instruction in well-conducted and well-lighted schoolrooms, you bring under better influences those who would otherwise be going about the streets. Therefore, I think that the alarm which has been expressed by hon. and right hon. Gentlemen is unreal, and that we may go forward with this work of educating our youth without fear, let, or hindrance, only hoping that Her Majesty's Government will do whatever they can with a view of meeting the general demand for this sort of instruction.

CROWN RIGHTS IN SCOTLAND.

*MR. BUCHANAN (calling attention to the Question of the rights of fishing in Scotland, and suggesting that a Select Committee should be appointed to inquire into the disposal by the Commissioners of Woods and Forests of rights of fishing and other Crown rights in Scotland), said: On the discussion on the Woods and Forests Vote last November, the Government, by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, agreed that the alienation of Crown rights of Fishing in Scotland should be inquired into, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave it as his impression that the General Committee of Inquiry into the Administration of the Department, already promised, would not be a good instrument for this inquiry. A more special Committee, mainly consisting of Scotch Members, would be preferable. Accordingly, last week, I put a Question to the First Lord of the Treasury as to whether he intended to appoint such a Committee, and the right hon. Gentleman stated in reply that—

“The reference to the proposed Committee would not exclude the disposal of Crown rights in Scotland from being investigated;”

and he further stated that—

“If it should appear that a Special Committee was necessary the Government would not refuse it.”

If the case for the appointment of such a Special Committee was strong in November, it is much stronger now; and this on Parliamentary grounds as well as on general grounds. Since 1832 two Committees have been appointed to inquire into the administration of the Woods and Forests Department—one in 1833, and another in 1849. I have examined the Reports of those Committees, and I find that the case of Scotland was entirely overlooked, the evidence having dealt almost exclusively with larger and wider questions relating to England; and if the Question is to be referred to a General and not to Special Committee of Inquiry, the Scotch Members can only anticipate a similar result. It is only in recent years that the Woods and Forest Department has proceeded to make sales of fishing rights in Scotland. These sales began about the year 1872. In the year 1883-84 there were seven sales of sea salmon fishing rights in Scotland and the price realized was £15,800; in the next year, 1884-85 there were ten sales of sea salmon fishing rights in Scotland, one sale of foreshore to the bugh of Dumbarton, and one of river salmon fishing, the total price being £4,600; in 1885-86 there was one sale of sea salmon fishings, four sales of river fishings and one of foreshore for Tynabruaich pier, the price being £375; in 1886-87 there were two sales of river salmon fishings, of which the price was £45, and three of Loch Morar salmon fishing, the price being £270, namely, one to Mrs. Nicholson, for £60, one to Lord Lovat for £150, and one to Colonel Macdonald for £60; while in 1887-88 there was one sale of Loch Morar fishings to Mrs. Cambell for £150, three sales of sea salmon fishings for a total of £4,175 and one sale of land at Stirling for £310. I and my hon. Friends who took part in the discussion of this question in November last contended that it was not merely one of the sale of the rights of salmon fishing in a particular loch in Scotland, but that it was also a great public question—that it was not the actual value of the rights of fishing in Loch Morar that would ensue from the concession of these salmon fishing rights to the riparian proprietors; and what we contended for has been amply justified by what has since taken place. It has transpired that although there was trout fishing, there was no salmon fishing in Loch Morar and what has resulted from the proceedings in the Court of Session is that by the concession of the rights of fishing in Loch

Morar, the riparian proprietors have been able to shut out the public from going in boats upon the loch and from navigating freely on that water as they have been accustomed to do from time immemorial. Even before the case was brought before the Court of Quarter Sessions, the very first action the riparian proprietors took was to give notice to the inhabitants on the shores of the loch, that they must part with their boats, and that they could not be any longer allowed to use their boats in the loch. The net result of it was this—the application was made and stated by the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, as a cession of the right of fishing. It has been found to be a right which can be construed, and which has been construed into a deprivation of the general rights of the people in the enjoyment of moving freely to and fro upon this vast sheet of water. No doubt Loch Morar is a very long way off, and situated in a very sparsely populated part of the country. What has been done in the east of Loch Morar may be done in the case of many others of the waters of Scotland. As my hon. Friend behind me also says, there are other fishing rights on the seashore with which the Woods and Forests have to do, and there is the question of foreshores, fishing of salmon, and the fishing rights of the foreshores. These are questions which I wished to deal with had there been more time at my disposal. What I wish to urge upon the Government is this, that if our case was strong, as it was acknowledged to be strong by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the First Lord of the Treasury in November last, it is very much stronger now. We contended then that it was not a mere formal question of fishing, but a matter in which important public rights were involved. And that has been clearly demonstrated in the Court of Session. The question is very wide, far reaching, and important to the public, and is one which commands very great attention in Scotland; and the decision of the Government upon it is looked forward to with considerable eagerness and attention in Scotland. It is an especially Scotch question, which I think ought to be investigated by an especially Scotch Committee. It is a question, the settlement of which, the longer delayed, will, I feel perfectly convinced in my own mind, be productive of still more wide and far reaching issues, by leading to further agitation in the country, and to a stronger case being brought before this House. I do most earnestly urge upon the Government to carry out what I certainly thought was the understanding in November last, that we should have a special inquiry into this subject; and that this special inquiry will be conducted in the manner we should have expected—namely, by a Select Committee of this House, consisting mainly of Scotch Members.

MR. HALDANE (Haddington): There is one point on which I should like an answer from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I think upon the last occasion when this subject was discussed, the Chancellor of the Exchequer very reasonably recognised the necessity of some inquiry into this matter. He suggested that the inquiry could be very satisfactorily conducted by a Committee representative generally of the administration of Crown rights. The situation seems to me to be one which commands some consideration. As I understand, the position is this—the Crown is trustee of certain rights for the public, that is to say, the local public, because it is nonsense to talk of the Crown being trustee of, say, the rights of foreshore up in the Northern islands, or the rights of salmon-fishing in those regions. The public generally, if they choose to go there, can go; but it seems to me that the sense in which you are trustees for the public does not for a moment bear out the suggestion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that there was a difficult and delicate question as to whether it might not be the duty of the Crown to dispose of those rights, and to turn them into money, and put the money into Consolidated Fund. It seems to me that the trusteeship of the Crown is an open trusteeship. In that sense it cannot be a question or matter for the Committee at all to decide whether the Crown is to sell those rights and turn them into money, and apply them to the benefit of the Consolidated Fund. You might just as well say that, because people who live in the Northern Hebrides do not come often to St. Paul's Cathedral or Westminster Abbey therefore, you might sell those edifices and apply the money to the Consolidated Fund. These rights are of a local nature. As I understand the law it is this. Some of these rights the Crown cannot alienate at all. Others they can alienate under their direct trusteeship for local interests, but only on certain statutory conditions which are imposed upon the localities. I think in the 2nd William IV. there was an Act passed which placed all those Crown rights under the provisions of an earlier Act, 10th George IV., which was passed for their regulation in England. In that earlier Act you can only dispose of those Crown rights under certain restrictions. There must be a broader application, and, unless the purchase money is less than 100 years, there are certain other conditions which have to be observed. What we want is a Select Committee of some kind, which should not merely inquire into general matters. It should not even discuss such questions as the Chancellor of the Exchequer has suggested, and which seem to me to be questions for this House, and not for any Committee. It should inquire not merely into the restriction which is to be imposed upon the action of the Commissioners, acting under the direction of the Treasury, for the future, but also into the validity of some transactions which have taken place within the last ten years, and which seems to me to be very doubtful. It is perfectly true there is a provision in the Statute protecting bond fide purchasers against irregularities; but if, as occurred in two or three transactions, the Solicitor to the Woods and Forests Commissioners was at once acting for the Crown and a private purchaser, it does seem to me that is a matter which ought to be the subject of some investigation by a special Committee. In that view, it is impossible for me to accept the suggestion that a general Committee, extending the scope of the inquiry to England, could look satisfactorily into that matter. There must be a special Committee for this purpose. I trust that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who seemed to take a most reasonable view of this matter on the last occasion, will give an expression of assent to an opinion which I am confident is the opinion of the whole of the Scotch Members.

*MR. C. FRASER MACKINTOSH (Inverness-shire): After what the Chancellor of the Exchequer said last year, I am rather disappointed with the course of the debate this year. If a Scottish Committee is not granted, a great deal more will be heard about this subject. One word in illustration of these Crown rights. Many years ago, the foreshore of the island of Lewis, extending to several hundred miles, was sold for £400, but when the Harbour Commissioners of Stornoway wanted a small piece of ground to extend their harbour, they were asked to pay no less than £100 a-year. These are matters worthy of consideration, and I must say that a special Committee of Inquiry will be the most advantageous.

MR. JACKSON: The Government cannot consent to the granting of the special Committee the hon. Member is asking for. It will be in the recollection of the House that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, in the autumn of last year, agreed to the appointment of a Committee of Inquiry into the administration of Woods and Forests and Crown Revenues. That Committee of Inquiry will shortly be appointed—as soon as I can get the names. The question which the hon. Member has brought forward is one of which I quite admit the importance to the localities interested; nevertheless it is a question which may be inquired into by such a Committee as we propose, while at the same time other questions affecting other localities could be investigated. Now the administration of Woods and Forests affects not only Scotland, but Ireland, England, and Wales, and I have no doubt that the whole subject would be thoroughly considered. I may point out that there have been very few transactions of the kind which the hon. Member complains of. Of course the pledge will be kept that no more transactions of that kind should take place until the Committee had made its inquiries, and thoroughly investigated the subject. And I should expect that the hon. Member will admit that the Government have shown their desire to meet him as far as they possibly can. My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, I think, in an answer to a question, expressly stated that this subject could not be excluded from the inquiry; and I hope that on the Committee we shall have Scotch Members thoroughly conversant with the details, and who will take very good care that the question is thoroughly investigated. I do not think, Sir, I can say more than that. It is not advisable to have a separate Committee to deal with this question; and if the Government do what they propose, I believe it will prove satisfactory to all parties.

MR. HALDANE: Are we to understand that the Committee to be appointed will have within its scope inquiry into the validity of past transactions?

*MR. JACKSON: I should not like to answer that question offhand. The Committee would, of course, have power to deal with all questions of administration, and would have the power to observe not only action in the past, but what action should be taken in future.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I cannot help saying that the promise of the hon. Gentleman is eminently unsatisfactory. The law respecting these public rights in Scotland is perfectly different to what the law is in England, and no general Committee can give any attention to the matter, or arrive at any decision on the subject which will commend itself to the confidence of the people of Scotland.

It being midnight, Mr. Speaker interrupted the business.

House resumed.

SUPPLY.—REPORT.

Resolutions [14th March] reported.

(1.) "That a Supplementary sum, not exceeding £45,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of various Miscellaneous Effective Services, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1889."

(2.) "That 65,400 men and boys be employed for the Sea and Coast Guard Services for the year ending on the 31st day of March 1890, including 14,000 Royal Marines."

(3.) "That a sum, not exceeding £3,201,700 be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of Wages, &c., to Officers, Seamen, and Boys, Coast Guard, and Royal Marines, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1890."

(4.) "That a sum, not exceeding £1,061,100, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Expense of Victualling and Clothing for the Navy, including the cost of Victualling Establishments at Home and Abroad, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1890."

Resolutions agreed to.

Ordered, That the Resolution which, upon the 14th instant, was reported from the Committee of Supply, and which was then agreed to by the House, be now read;

"That a number of Land Forces, not exceeding 152,282, all ranks, be maintained for the Service of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland at Home and Abroad, excluding Her Majesty's Indian Possessions, during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1890."

Ordered, That, leave be given to bring in a Bill to provide, during Twelve Months, for the Discipline and Regulation of the Army; and that Mr. Secretary Stanhope, Lord George Hamilton, the Judge Advocate General, and Mr. Brodrick, do prepare and bring it in.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON SMALL HOLDINGS.

Ordered, That the Select Committee be re-appointed to inquire into the facilities which exists for the creation of Small Holdings in Land in Great Britain; whether either in connection with an improved system of Local Government or otherwise, those facilities may be extended; whether, in recent years there, there has been any diminution in the number of Small Owners and Cultivators of Land; and whether there is any evidence to show that such diminution is due to legislation.

Ordered, That the Committee do consist of Seventeen Members.

The Committee was accordingly nominated of,—Sir Edward Birkbeck, Mr. Broadhurst, Sir George Campbell, Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, Mr. Chaplin, Mr. Cobb, Mr. Jesse Collings, Viscount Curzon, Sir Charles Dalrymple, Sir William Hart Dyke, Mr. Thomas Ellis, Sir Walter Foster, Mr. Compton Lawrence, Mr. Llewellyn, Mr. James William Lowther, Mr. Halley Stewart, and Mr. Angus Sutherland, with power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That Five be the quorum.—
(Mr. Akers-Douglas.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That this House do now adjourn."

DR. TANNER (Cork, Mid): Seeing the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his place, I should like to ask him whether the Government have received any intelligence respecting the election at Kennington?

No answer being returned,

DR. TANNER said: Really I must press for an answer, Mr. Speaker.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at five minutes
after Twelve o'clock.

[APPENDIX.]

MR. C. FRASER MACKINTOSH (Inverness-shire): After what the Chancellor of the Exchequer said last year, I am rather disappointed with the course of the debate this year. Resolutions agreed to.

Ordered, That the Resolution which, upon the 14th instant, was reported from the Committee of Supply, and which was then agreed to by the House, be now read;

"That a number of Land Forces, not exceeding 162,282, all ranks, be maintained for the Service of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland at Home and Abroad, excluding Her Majesty's Indian Possessions, during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1890."

Ordered, That, leave be given to bring in a Bill to provide, during Twelve Months, for the Discipline and Regulation of the Army; and that Mr. Secretary Stanhope, Lord George Hamilton, the Judge Advocate General, and Mr. Brodrick, do prepare and bring it in.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON SMALL HOLDINGS.

Ordered, That the Select Committee be re-appointed to inquire into the facilities which exists for the creation of Small Holdings in Land in Great Britain; whether either in connection with an improved system of Local Government or otherwise, those facilities may be extended; whether, in recent years there, there has been any diminution in the number of Small Owners and Cultivators of Land; and whether there is any evidence to show that such diminution is due to legislation.

Ordered, That the Committee do consist of Seventeen Members.

Ordered, That Five be the quorum.—(Mr. Akers-Douglas.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."

DR. TANNER (Cork, Mid): Seeing the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his place, I should like to ask him whether the Government have received any intelligence respecting the election at Kennington?

No answer being returned,

DR. TANNER said: Really I must press for an answer, Mr. Speaker.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at five minutes
after Twelve o'clock.

The following is the corrected version of the Speech delivered by the UNDER SECRETARY of STATE for FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir JAMES FERGUSON) in the course of the Debate upon the Address, and is to be taken in place of the Report commencing at page 97 of this volume :—

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE for FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): This debate has been somewhat desultory, because by common consent the discussion of the most important questions mentioned in the Queen's Speech has been postponed until the measures are before the House. Hon. Members have complained of omissions from the Speech, but that is a little at variance with the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, who hinted in his remarks that perhaps Her Majesty's Government had fallen into the error of proposing too many measures. There are, I think, plenty of topics for the consideration of Parliament which in due time will engage its attention. I have risen principally to notice remarks made by some hon. Members with reference to Foreign Affairs which deserve reply, and particularly those made by the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Buchanan), who has in a very temperate speech referred to subjects which have in former Sessions been discussed by him. The hon. Member takes a warm and very natural interest in the safety of trading and mission stations in Central Africa. Well, I cannot on this occasion say anything of a different nature to what I have said before, which is that, while those stations, whether commercial or missionary, are entitled to all the respect that belongs to enterprises most honourable in themselves and involving great personal sacrifices on the part of their promoters, it is impossible for Her Majesty's Government to undertake the responsibility, or to impose on this country any burdens in connection with them. These enterprises are undertaken by the free act of their promoters, and are in a region with which the Government of this country are not in immediate contact, and in which no assistance the Government can render them could proceed from any base. It is therefore impossible that Her Majesty's Government could give any indication that those persons could depend upon any material assistance from them. I have stated that there are certain things that Her Majesty's Government will require on behalf of those persons. When the Portuguese endeavoured to close the Zambesi, except to vessels carrying the Portuguese flag, their right to do so was disputed, and it was stipulated that our countrymen should not be interrupted in obtaining those warlike stores which might be necessary to maintain their positions. I cannot recognize the justice of the complaint that the Portuguese had established a Custom-house on a tributary of the Zambesi, because it was an admission that the Portuguese territory ended there, and Her Majesty's Government have rather reason to complain that that Custom-house has been removed. The hon. Member suggested that the Government should interfere with the progress of the Portuguese force, which Government in undertaking the negotiations, and is a tribute to the admirable way in which they were carried on by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. The hon. Member has referred to the Sackville and Morier incidents. These are not matters that seriously disturb the relations of great countries. The Sackville incident has blown over, and we can afford to regard the comments which have rendered the incident of more importance than it would have otherwise acquired; and I am quite sure the relations between the great American Republic and our own nation will not be permanently injured by a trap laid for the British Minister, or by any attempt to fan the affair into undeserved importance by those who do not wish well to the good relations between the two countries. As to the affair in which the name of Her Majesty's Ambassador in St. Petersburg has been involved, I can only say that I do not think that there is anyone in this country who believes for a moment that that distinguished British servant would have been guilty of any act which was unworthy of his position, or of which he would have had cause to be ashamed. It is to be regretted that mischief-makers should have dragged his name forward in this undeserved manner; but it has not been necessary by any public action to clear it. The incident has passed by without any interruption of the good relations between those great countries which have so many common interests, and which are so concerned in the advancement of civilization and the preservation of European peace

ade. They were in a sense, be-complied with the invitation the enterprize and undertake lance of their own coast. They concerned in the operations on bar coast because they have sion from the Sultan; and as o war in their country it was a blockade jure gentium. The e not parties to the blockade;
 French have no immediate ch as Germany and England at coast. By the admission of a Government, we are able to ive action against the import and the export of slaves by out an effective blockade on it, which could have been no other way. While h are as much opposed to the e as ourselves, they are jealous amination of their ships by ur of other nations, and had esty's Government not esta-blockade jure gentium on that y would not have had the visit vessels flying the flag, though possibly en-the slave trade; therefore every way a great advantage bjects in which all civilized ave a part, particularly this by joining in the establish-the blockade on the Zanzibar
 We have, too, by our joining in a, taken up a position which a, to safeguard the rights and the Sultan. I have said that, y, in the British sphere of in-ere has been no opposition of rtance, neither has there been ruption of trade. On the trade has been steadily in-the relations with the British an Company have been con-proving, and I am sure, while be sorry to gain at the ex-any rivals and competitors, we nothing in our sphere of inreason of the state of war which exists in the German sphere.
 therefore, that this British is tending towards a happy d is destined to add to the triumphs of this country, and an addition to the markets manufactures of the country.
 g has been said about the affairs in Samoa. Papers t to be presented on the subject which will give the proceedings at the Conference at Washington, and as that Conference is shortly to re-assemble, the House will not desire to go largely into the state of affairs in Samoa. But here, as with reference to Zanzibar, it is right that I should point out that, while the two Governments of Germany and England act independently of each other as regards the immediate action of the separate Governments, we have an understanding with the German Government as to the best means of exercising European influence over the Native Government of that country in the time coming. It is manifest from the internal troubles which have existed for so many years in Samoa that its Government cannot stand alone, and Her Majesty's Government expressed the opinion at the Conference at Washington that it would be better that one Power should exercise influence there rather than that three Governments should act through their representatives, who have failed to produce any satisfactory result.

 We have had no difference with the United States on the matter, but they took a different view at Washington; consequently the Conference did not result then in any settlement, but the Government of the United States have discussed the matter with the German Government in the most friendly and frank manner, and I hope that when the Conference re-assembles it will be with the prospect of coming to a satisfactory conclusion. There were some remarks made by the hon. Member for Queen's County which I will not pass over entirely without remark, because they were to some extent of a mischievous tendency, The hon. Member has said that the negotiations carried on by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham for the settlement of the Fisheries Question have proved abortive on account of the dislike entertained towards the right hon. Gentleman by a part of the people of the American Republic. Undoubtedly, from certain causes, the Fisheries Treaty has not been ratified; but by means of the modus vivendi provided between the two Governments not a single Canadian or American vessel has been seized since the arrangement was in operation, and no trouble occurred last year in the fisheries of the Canadian Coast. This fact alone justifies the policy of Her Majesty's

MEMORANDUM OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE

RELATING TO THE

ARMY ESTIMATES, 1889-90.

Presented to both Houses of Parliament by Command of Her Majesty, March, 1889.

In the present year it is proposed to include in this Memorandum only a few details in explanation of the Estimates, and to reserve any general review of policy and progress during the past year, for a statement in the House of Commons.

The Estimates for 1888-9, including the Ordnance Factories' Vote, showed an anticipated expenditure of £13,710,700 for effective, and £3,027,600 for non-effective Services, making a total of £16,738,300.

For 1889-90, the Estimates show an expenditure of £17,335,900, of which £14,322,500 is for effective, and £3,013,400 for non-effective Services, being an increase on last year of £597,600.

It will be seen that the main cause of this increase is the provision made for certain Colonial garrisons, the falling off of Appropriations in Aid, but, above all, the necessity of pushing forward the re-armament of our Regular troops with weapons of the newest pattern.

The changes to be noticed in the various arms of the Service in the present Estimates are not very numerous. There is a total addition to the Establishment of 2,615 men.

Almost the whole of this increase has been occasioned by the necessity of strengthening Colonial garrisons, in view of the new armaments, either already sent out, or about to be shipped during the present year. A large addition is made, both of Infantry and Artillery, to the Garrison of Malta, besides the Militia regiment that we are encouraged to hope will be raised there. The principal other additions made are to some of our distant coaling stations; where, however, the policy is being steadily pursued of utilizing, as far as is prudent and possible, the service of Native auxiliaries.

It will be seen by the Report of the Inspector General of Recruiting that the work of his department has been satisfactory during the past year. Fewer men were required than in 1887-8, and it is gratifying to be able to add that desertions were fewer in number by more than 1,000. During the coming year there will be a substantial increase to the Reserve, which will, it is hoped, reach 58,300, the highest point yet attained, with the prospect of improvement in future years.

The Militia is, I am sorry to say, 2,039 weaker in numbers than last year. In some districts this is to be accounted for by increased competition in recruiting, owing to the somewhat different class now admitted into the ranks of the Volunteers. In several cases where the deficiency in Establishment has been very marked, adjoining battalions have been amalgamated. In others the Establishments in unfavourable localities will be diminished in order to increase them in districts more favourable to recruiting. The percentage of loss by desertion and fraud continues to decrease, and the confidential reports upon the condition of Militia battalions are on the whole extremely satisfactory. Many

INTRODUCTORY REMARKS.

THE full videtur statement which I shall have to make in explanation of the whole scheme of shipbuilding for the future, with its attendant consequences, will anticipate much of what would otherwise have been dwelt upon in this memorandum, which is now rather of the nature of a summary than an exposition of the expenditure contained in the Navy Estimates 1889-90.

The expenditure is estimated to be £602,600 in excess of that voted last year. The increases are mainly in the "Shipbuilding," "Manning" and "New Works" Votes; and the decrease in the Vote for Naval Ordnance. A short explanation of the causes of these variations is appended, as well as an account of the work done in 1888-89, and that proposed to be done in 1889-90.

SHIPBUILDING PROGRAMME.

PROGRESS OF NEW CONSTRUCTION (CONTRACT) IN 1888-89.

The anticipations expressed in my Statement of February 1888 as to the progress to be made in New Construction during 1888-89 have been realised for the most part, and in some cases surpassed.

In a few instances the performance has fallen short of what was originally hoped for; but there have been special circumstances to account for the difference.

The completion for sea of the Victoria and Sans Pareil after their delivery by the Contractors has been effected, as it was feared it might be, by the dates of delivery of the 110-ton turret guns. Both ships are, however, now fully in hand, and it is expected that the Victoria will be ready for Commission (as flag-ship in the Mediterranean) in the course of two or three months.

The protected cruiser Magicienne has been delivered by the Contractors, and is about to proceed on her steam trials. Her sister ship, the Marathon, is nearly ready for delivery.

The conclusion of a Contract for the Blenheim was purposely delayed, until September 1888, for reasons that need not here be given; and this fact, together with the difficulty of obtaining an adequate supply of steel materials in consequence of the great demand for mercantile shipbuilding, accounts for the expenditure on that ship having fallen short of what was originally proposed.

Similar difficulties in obtaining materials have been experienced by the Contractors for the Bellona and the seven vessels for Australasian service, but it is hoped that these difficulties have now been surmounted, and that in subsequent stages of the work lost ground will be recovered.

Two composite gunboats, the Sparrow and Thrush, complete the list of armed vessels building by contract. They are to be delivered early in the next financial year.

Besides these armed vessels, there have been in progress in private yards a considerable number of coaling craft, designed in accordance with the recommendations of a Special Committee appointed to consider the arrangements suitable for coaling the Fleet.

A new type of boat has also been designed for the purpose of being carried on board large warships and employed in mining operations or in coaling. The first example of the type is now undergoing trial, and, if successful, it is proposed to add to the number in the coming financial year.

Six first class and ten second class torpedo boats have been ordered during 1888-89 for Naval Service, and are considerably advanced.

The first class torpedo boats are 130 feet long, the guaranteed speed, when fully loaded, is  $22\frac{1}{2}$  knots, and they are to carry an armament of 3-pr. quick-firers as well as three torpedo tubes.

The second class boats are of an improved type obtained as the result of a competition between the firms most experienced in this class of work. They are 60 feet long, have a guaranteed speed of 16 knots, and are to carry a machine gun as well as two torpedo dischargers.

In addition to these torpedo boats the Admiralty have advised and assisted the India Office in the construction of seven first class torpedo boats, which are now practically complete and in course of being dispatched to India.

DESCRIPTION OF NEW DESIGNS.

The first-class battle ships to be laid down in 1889-90 include two types: one armed on the turret system, and the other on the barbette system. It is proposed to build one of the former and the remainder of the latter type.

They are to be superior in speed and auxiliary armament to all preceeding battle ships of the Royal Navy; and will surpass them all in displacement.

Their principal dimensions are:—

Length .. .. .	380 feet.
Breadth .. .. .	75 „
Displacement (about) .. .. .	14,150 tons.
Speed on measured mile:—
Forced draught (about) .. .. .	$17\frac{1}{2}$ knots.
Natural „ „ .. .. .	16 „
Coal endurance:—
Speed of 10 knots (about) .. .. .	5,000 „
„ 16 „ „ .. .. .	1,800 to 2,000 knots.

The armament of each ship will include:—

- 4  $13\frac{1}{2}$ -in. 67-ton guns in two turrets or barbettes.
- 10 6-in. 5-ton guns, broadside.
- 18 to 24 6-pr. and 3-pr. quick-firers.
- 5 torpedo tubes (above water).
- 2 „ „ (submerged).

The disposition of the armament has been most exhaustively considered. It has been decided as follows:—

To adopt an arrangement (in plan) similar to that carried out in the Trafalgar and Admiral classes.

To place each pair of heavy guns in a separate armoured enclosure, situated about 50 or 60 feet from the bow and stern.

To carry the 6-inch guns and smaller quick-firers chiefly in a long central battery, situated between the heavy gun stations.

The armour protection of the hull proper includes two principal features:—

- (1) A belt,  $8\frac{1}{2}$  feet broad, extending over two-thirds of the length of the vessel, and having a maximum thickness of 18-inch armour.

Transverse armoured bulkheads complete the belt, a 3-inch steel deck is fitted above it, and a strong protective underwater deck completes the protection before and abaft the belt.

- (2) The broadside above the thick belt is protected, to the height of about 9½ feet above water over a considerable portion of the length, by 5-inch armour. Screen bulkheads, similarly armoured, enclose the central battery.

The protection of the heavy guns consists of 18-inch armour on the turrets and 17-inch on the redoubts protecting the turret-bases, &c. In the barbette ships the armour on the barbettes is 17-inch.

The protection of the guns and their crews in the auxiliary armament, as well as the ammunition supply, have been carefully arranged for, in view of the development of high explosives and quick-firing guns.

The turret and barbette designs are identical in nearly all the above-mentioned features. The essential differences between them are—

- (1) That the freeboard at the ends of the barbette ship is 18 feet, as against 11½ feet in the turret ship.
- (2) That the height of the heavy guns above water is 23 feet in the barbette ship, as against 17 feet in the turret ship.

The second-class ironclads will be reproductions on a smaller scale of the first-class barbette ironclads, being in speed and coal endurance their equal, but carrying a somewhat lighter armament, and armour of less thickness. Their displacement will be about 9,000 tons.

The first-class protected cruisers which are to be commenced have been designed to carry an armament practically identical with that of the Blake and Blenheim (of which a full description was given last year); but they are to be of considerably less size and cost, to steam at a somewhat lower speed, and to have a smaller coal-endurance than the Blake and Blenheim, although they will compare very favourably in these respects with any cruisers building for foreign Navies.

Their dimensions are—

Length .. .. .	360 feet.
Breadth .. .. .	60 „
Displacement (about) .. .. .	7,350 tons.
Speed on measured mile .. .. .	20 knots.
„ at sea (continuous steaming) .. .. .	18 „

Radius of action—

Speed of 10 knots (about) .. .. .	10,000 „
„ 18 „ „ .. .. .	2,800 „

Armament :—

- 2 9·2-in. (22-ton) bow and stern chasers.
- 10 6-in. (5-ton) do. do and broadside.
- 12 6-pr. quick-firers.
- 4 Torpedo tubes.

The protective deck, extending throughout the length, will have a maximum thickness of 5 inches of steel.

Careful consideration was given to the question of the best system of protecting these vessels, their guns and guns' crews, before the arrangements approved were finally decided. The use of a very strong protective deck over the vitals, in association with certain novel arrangements for protecting the guns and their crews from shell-fire, was preferred to alternative plans in which the broadsides, to a certain extent, were protected by comparatively thin vertical armour. Special care has also been bestowed upon the protection of the ammunition during its passage from the magazines to the guns, and unusual facilities have been provided for the transport of the ammunition.

Some of the vessels of this type will be wood-sheathed and coppered in order to adapt them for distant service on stations where docks will not be available, at least in war time. This will add somewhat to the displacements given above, and cause a small reduction of the measured mile speed.

The second class Cruisers, of which it is proposed to construct a large number, may be described as enlarged Medeas. In protection, engine power, speed, and coal supply they are practically reproductions of the Medea class. They are more heavily armed than the Medea, 35 feet longer, and of about 600 tons greater displacement.

The principal dimensions, &c., are:—

Length .. .. .	300 feet.
Breadth .. .. .	43 „
Displacement (about) .. .. .	3,400 tons.
Speed on measured mile .. .. .	20 knots.
„ at sea (continuous steaming) .. .. .	18 „

Radius of action:—

Speed of 10 knots (about) .. .. .	8,000 knots.
„ 18 „ .. .. .	1,000 „
„ 16 „ .. .. .	2,000 „

Armament:—

- 2 6-inch (5-ton) bow and stern chasers.
- 6 4·7-inch quick-firers, broadside.
- 9 6-pounders and 3-pounders.
- 4 Torpedo tubes.

Protective deck: maximum thickness (on slopes) 2-inch steel on horizontal portions, 1-inch.

It is proposed to wood-sheath and copper the bottoms of a large proportion of these vessels, which will involve an increase of about 200 tons in the displacement given above, and a reduction of about one-quarter of a knot in the measured mile speed.

Four protected Cruisers of the Pandora class are to be laid down in the Dockyards. They are to be built from the same design as the five Cruisers for Australasian service described in my Statement of last year.

A description of the Sharpshooter class (Torpedo gunboats) appeared in the same Statement. The first vessel of the class is now nearly complete, and about to enter upon her steam trials, so that it will shortly be possible to decide, as the result of experience, whether any changes are desirable in future vessels of the class.

Eleven vessels for the Royal Navy and two for India are now building from the Sharpshooter design; and it is proposed to lay down four more Torpedo gunboats in the Dockyards in 1889-90.

DOCKYARD ADMINISTRATION.

It was anticipated, in framing the Estimates for 1888-89, that the 23 ships mentioned in the programme of last year would be completed and passed into the 1st class Reserve by the 31st March 1889, and this would, without doubt, have been done as far as the armoured ships are concerned but for the delay in the delivery of their main armament.

The Dockyard work is complete on all these vessels, except Camperdown, Anson, and Aurora, where there is but very little left to be done, and that little is dependent on the receipt of guns.

The Trafalgar might be completed by the end of June next, but her last gun will not be delivered until 31st August 1889. If it had not been for this, and also for delays of materials for Trafalgar's turret roller paths, the cost of building would be less than is now expected. A reduction of £85,000 for labour, and £15,000 for material has, however, been made on her original building estimate.

It is proposed to commence building in the Dockyards during the present financial year the following 20 ships, viz:—

- 4 Battle Ships, 1st class.
- 1           "           2nd   "
- 3 Protected Cruisers, 1st class.
- 2           "           "   2nd   "
- 4 Cruisers (Pandoras).
- 6 Torpedo Gunboats (Sharpshooter class).

To enable this new work to be begun, and to complete 26 out of the 30 ships now building, as well as push on the repairs and reconstructions above mentioned the Vote for Shipbuilding, Repairs, Maintenance, &c. (Vote 8) has been increased by £615,900. The sum of £202,465 is the net increase on that part of this expenditure, as detailed in Vote B appended to the Estimates.

A special order has been issued during the year, by which a higher rate of speed than that known "as economical speed," has been directed for the future to be periodically maintained by H.M. Ships when making passages. The reasons for and objects of this order are explained in the Circular Letter in the Appendix.

NAVAL ORDNANCE.

The transfer to Naval Votes of the cost of Naval Ordnance has been associated during the past year with the difficulties which the assumption of new duties and responsibilities generally entails. In this instance they have been aggravated by the necessity of the Admiralty employing as their agents the very Department with whom they were not always in accord upon questions where the interests of the Army and Navy were not identical.

Considering the controversial nature of the points to be settled and the financial bearing upon the expenditure of the two departments by the division of the stores hitherto held in common, the work done has been remarkable. In future years, now that the ground has been cleared, there is little likelihood of a recurrence of these kinds of questions, which have now been decided once for all.

The Estimates as submitted by the Dockyard Officers for items of incidental charges were reduced by more than £30,000, but it appears, from the latest returns of actual expenditure, that a saving may be expected at the end of the year upon the approved Estimates as reduced.

Still further reductions have been made in Estimates of this class for 1889-90, and there is good reason to hope, that in a short time, the incidental expenditure will be brought down to a reasonable percentage upon the direct charges.

The number of men employed on board the various tugs and harbour craft have been considerably reduced without loss of efficiency. They swelled the incidental expenditure and had little to do, so that action in this direction was urgently needed.

The Cost Account System has worked fairly well during the year, and has given us returns of expenditure which will be useful in checking the value of work done, and in providing reliable data for estimating purposes in the future.

An account of expenditure upon alterations and additions separate from that upon repairs is about to be commenced for "Minotaur" and "Thunderer." After this has been started and tried in practice, it may be found possible to extend the system to all ships upon which alterations and additions are ordered to be carried out, and which are likely to cost over £200.

The cost of repairs, alterations, and additions to the vessels which took part in the Summer Manœuvres will be heavier than was anticipated when the Estimates for the current year were framed, but the excess is due to numerous alterations and additions proposed to be carried out in the various ships.

The "Nile," whose original estimate has been reduced by £80,000 for labour, and £10,000 for material, has been advanced during the year to such an extent as to admit, if necessary, of her completion in 1889-90.

Substantial reductions have been made in the previous estimates for building "Barrosa" (£3,000 for labour), "Anson" (£1,800 labour and £10,000 for material), "Howe" (£700 for labour and £3,300 material) and "Beagle" (£2,000 labour and material).

The work of re-engining "Superb" and "Thunderer" has been commenced, and will be completed next year. The building of a superstructure and carrying out repairs to "Hydra" and "Cyclops" will be completed this year. The repair of "Triumph," "Achilles," "Minotaur," "Nelson," and "Audacious," will be completed during the forthcoming financial year, and the reconstruction of the "Rupert" and "Devastation" will be well advanced.

The amount of the deficiencies of Ordnance Stores for Naval Service has now been ascertained, and, although they are serious, it is hoped they may be made up gradually in the course of the next three years, without in the meantime running any very great risk, as, by means of the increased plant recently put up by the Private Trade, ammunition for the smaller natures of guns could be produced very quickly in the event of an emergency, whilst as regards projectiles of the heavier natures, which take a long time to make, arrangements have been made for ordering these in larger proportions at once.

As is well-known, there has been very great delay in completing ships with guns. This delay was due to the faulty principle which was adopted in the design of these guns, viz., that of placing liners in the bores; these liners, when the guns were proved, cracked, and very considerable delay was caused before the guns were repaired and made efficient for issue to the Fleet. These difficulties, it is believed, have now been got over, and the War Office are of opinion that the block as regards ships of the Admiral Class and the belted cruisers will be removed by June, that is, in sufficient time to admit of all the ships otherwise ready taking part in the Summer Manœuvres. It is believed that no further difficulties or delays need be anticipated in the future delivery of guns, as in the gun designs now approved, the features which have led to the failures above referred to have been eliminated.

With reference to the new Shipbuilding Programme, the whole of the requirements for the large guns (that is, those taking more than a year to manufacture) have been made known to the War Office, and from reliable information which has been received and verified by personal inquiries, there seems to be no doubt, in view of the simpler form of gun designs now adopted, and of the larger experi-once and greatly increased plant of the private manufacturers, that the guns will be ready in ample time for the ships requiring them.

The 4·7-inch Quick-firing Gun has been brought into use since the date of my last Annual Statement, and all the anticipations have been fully realized as to the very great advantages possessed by this type of gun, more especially in resisting the attacks of torpedo vessels, and in enabling more accurate practice to be made when ships are moving at great speed. Practice from slow-firing guns under such conditions must be most uncertain on account of the very great alteration in distance between the rounds.

During the year ending 31st December 1888, 160 new Breech Loading Guns have been completed for the Navy, including one 16½-inch 111-ton gun, 6 13½-inch 68-ton, 9 12-inch 45-ton, and 6 9·2-inch 22-ton guns. During the same period 262 14-inch Whitehead Torpedoes have been manufactured and issued for Naval Service.

EXPERIMENTS IN 1888-9.

A Special Committee has been appointed by the War Office to deal with the question of High Explosives; and experiments are also in progress with several descriptions of smokeless powder for use with quick-firing guns. The experiments against the Resistance with shells charged with high explosives will also now be shortly completed, and will determine several important points in reference to Armament and Ammunition, besides affording the required information as to the most suitable form of defence to be adopted.

The experiments on armour-plating, mentioned in my Statement last year, have been carried out successfully, valuable information having been obtained as to the relative qualities of steel-faced and steel armour when attacked by modern guns and projectiles.

Experiments with submerged torpedo discharges in vessels of high speed have been continued; and many of the special difficulties incidental to that method of discharge have been overcome.

The reduction of this Vote to £1,463,000 has been possible by the transfer to another fund of the cost of armament of the new ships which it is proposed to build by contract.

NEW WORKS.

No new works of great importance were commenced during 1888-89, but the undermentioned will be practically completed before the end of the financial year:—

Haulbowline (Extension)	..	The Caissons are in place.
Chatham Dockyard	.. ..	New Foundry.
Gibraltar	.. ..	Accommodation for Torpedo Boats.
Portsmouth	.. ..	Torpedo Range.
		Barracks for 400 men (commenced 1889).

The Estimate of Vote 10 for 1889-90 amounts to £451,000, being £74,700 more than that for 1888-89.

The difference is caused chiefly by the provision for—

Improved Coaling Arrangements	.. ..	£50,000
Dredging Medway	.. ..	13,000
Malta Extension—Caissons, &c.	.. ..	11,700
		<hr/> £74,700

The charges for Staff have been reduced, and also those for Repairs and Maintenance.

The form of the Estimate has, in compliance with the wish of the Public Accounts Committee, been changed so as to resemble as much as possible that of the Army Works Estimate.

Provision is made for the commencement of works to facilitate coaling at—

Portland	..	..	..	..	Jetty
Portsmouth	..	..	..	..	Railways
Keyham	..	..	..	..	Pier, &c.

The only other large work to be commenced during 1889-90 is the important dredging of the Medway to allow of the largest men-of-war passing down the river at any high tide, the remainder of the new barracks on Whale Island, which will enable old hulks—very expensive to repair—to be given up, and the continuation of the reconstruction of the large trooping jetty at Portsmouth Dockyard.

The large extension works at Portsmouth are nearly at an end, and those at Malta are proceeding vigorously.

PERSONNEL.

The offices of Chaplain of the Fleet and of Inspector of Naval Schools have been combined, and the arrangement seems to work satisfactorily.

The arrangements affecting instruction of Engineer students, referred to in last year's Statement, have been completed. The training is now carried on at Davenport alone. The students have been made subordinate officers of the Royal Navy. The period of instruction is to be reduced to five (and in some cases four) years. Only those who attain a certain standard at the final Examination will be allowed a period of further study at the Royal Naval College; the remainder will commence service afloat at once.

The direct entry of Assistant Engineers at the Royal Naval College will commence in 1890.

It has been found necessary to increase the number of Engine-room Ratings by the following numbers:—

125 Chief or Engine-room Artificers.
780 Leading Stokers or Stokers.

Besides these numbers 200 Stokers have been added to the Coast Guard; though this addition to the Coast Guard will hardly be attained in the coming year, as only men of specified service and very good character are appointed.

Complaints have been made as to the quality of the Stokers of the 2nd Class. The increase which it has been found necessary to make in this class has led to numerous entries, and as many of the men are rather young, efforts are being made to obtain men of better physique.

The chief increases in other ratings are—

Subordinate Officers..	..	..	280
Seamen class, Men and Boys	..	..	390
Artificers	..	..	100
Marines	..	..	1,100

including in the Marines men added to the Corps on account of duties to be performed by it as Buglers, Lamptrimmers, &c., in lieu of non combatant ratings.

Arrangements have been made for the gradual reduction of Artificer and Stoker Pensioners in the Steam Reserves, whose places will be supplied by Active Service men. The reduction is gradual, owing to the desire not to deal hardly with men who do their Harbour work well, though rather old for sea service, if called on in an emergency.

The pay of the Signal Class has been improved, to put them on an equality with other Seamen class ratings, who can attain the higher Gunnery qualifications from which they are debarred.

The number of Signal ratings borne in Ships will be increased, and provision has been made for training more Signal Boys.

It is also intended to establish a School for higher training, and instruction given to all boys whilst in their Training Ships will be increased.

Progress has been made in reducing some of the non-combatant ratings which are to disappear entirely, or almost so.

These include—

Plumber's Crew.
Tinsmith.
Lamptrimmer.
Tailor.
Shoemaker.
Barber.

Besides these, in accordance with recommendations of the Ratings Committee or previous decisions, the following ratings will be abolished :—

Captain of the Hold.
2nd Captain of the Hold.
Ordinary 2nd Class.
Yeoman of Store Room.
Ropemaker.
Sailmaker's Crew.
Lithographer.

Schoolmasters are to be withdrawn from all but Boys' Training Ships, and the numbers will be considerably reduced. Those selected for the new establishment will receive improved pay and pension. The number of Schoolmasters of the Royal Marines has been reduced, owing to abolition of compulsory School after leaving the Depôt.

The Carpenter class will be reduced in number by the gradual abolition of Unskilled { Carpenter's Mates.

Shipwright.
Caulkers.
Caulker's Mate.
Carpenter's Crew.

Skilled Shipwrights being substituted for the last in proportion of 2 to 3. It is estimated that 326 non-combatants can thus be reduced. Skilled Leading Shipwright, 2nd Class Petty Officer, will be introduced.

The previous compulsory training of seamen gunners in Torpedo duties has been made optional, and restricted to men who take 1st class in Gunnery.

Gymnastic instruction has been established in mastless ships.

These changes and the increase to the number voted last year have caused a rise in Votes 1 and 2 of £275,300, as compared with the estimate of the preceding year. Of this amount, £78,900 is contained in a new Vote, No. 14, which deals with half-pay as a separate item. Half-pay in the previous year was contained in a subhead of Vote 1.

ROYAL NAVAL RESERVES.

Honorary Commissions as Commander and Chief Engineer will be conferred, in certain cases, on Marine Superintendents and Engineer Superintendents of large Ship Companies.

A larger number of Officers will be admitted for the year's training in the Royal Navy.

It is proposed to relax the rules as to appointment of Sub-Lieutenants, with the view of giving more Commissions to Officers of large Mail Lines, who are at present under some disadvantage, as their advancement in the service in which they are employed is rather slow.

. ROYAL MARINE FORCES.

Notwithstanding the heavy demands made upon Marine Headquarters to meet the additional requirements of the Fleet, the various drills and courses of instruction have been kept up, and the efficiency of the Corps fully maintained.

Increased attention has been paid especially to Naval Gun Drill training, and much improvement effected in the Armaments of the Gun Drill Batteries.

Classes for military training of Officers and men, and Reconnaissance and Field Sketching Classes for Non-commissioned Officers, have been established. Regular classes of Officers for the study and practice of the War Game have also been introduced at each Divisional headquarters with good results.

Discipline has been well maintained. Convictions by Courts Martial have been for many years steadily on the decrease, and in spite of the drain on the Corps by the facilities freely offered to all ranks to take their discharge and to be transferred to the Navy, Army, and Auxiliary Forces, the Marines find no difficulty in enlisting a most desirable class of recruits, which speaks well for the popularity of the Corps.

In view of the growing demands of the Navy and the adaptability of the Non-commissioned Officers and Men of the Marines to fulfil many duties on board ship hitherto performed by non-combatants, it has been considered advisable to increase the strength of the Corps from 12,900 to 14,000—the increase going to the Infantry branch.

During the mobilization of the Fleet, the various detachments were embarked with readiness and despatch.

NAVY SHIPBUILDING PROGRAMME, 1889-90.

MEMORANDUM EXPLANATORY OF FINANCIAL PROPOSALS.

(PRESENTED TO PARLIAMENT BY HER MAJESTY'S COMMAND.)

1. The total estimated cost of the 70 vessels to be built under the New Programme is £21,500,000, including armament and all warlike stores, with the necessary reserves. Thirty-eight of the vessels will be built in Her Majesty's Dockyards at an estimated cost of £8,650,000 for Hulls, Machinery, &c., and £2,850,000 for Armament, all provided under the ordinary Estimates. The remaining 32 vessels are to be built by contract, at an estimated cost of £10,000,000, including armament, &c., to be paid for out of the proposed Naval Defence Account.

2. It is proposed to provide the funds to defray the cost of the above in the following manner: The increase in the total amount proposed to be voted for Naval purposes in the ordinary Estimates of 1889-90 over the Estimates for 1888-89, is £602,600; this it is assumed will be continued in each of the four succeeding years.

3. In addition to the increased annual provision thus made in the Navy Estimates, it is proposed to provide a further sum of £10,000,000 from a Naval Defence Account, payable in seven annual instalments of £1,428,000 each, making, with the £602,000 already mentioned, an increase in the annual charge for Naval purposes of £2,030,000. The Treasury are to be empowered, under the Bill creating the fund, to make advances in anticipation of the annual instalments, charging Navy Funds for interest thereon.

4. Vote 8, which includes, besides Shipbuilding and Repairs, the Maintenance of the Fleet in Sea Stores and Coal, together with the cost of the Dockyards at Home and Abroad, amounts to £4,659,000. In this amount an expenditure of £2,650,000, excluding incidental charges, is provided for the special purpose of constructing and completing the vessels now in process of construction as well as those to be laid down under the New Programme in the Dockyards, except only as regards their Armament and Warlike Stores.

5. Vote 9, for Ordnance and Warlike Stores, amounts to £1,463,500, and includes the amount requisite for the equipment of the vessels built out of the funds provided under Vote 8.

6. The following Tables show the anticipated Annual Expenditure on the Programme, together with the provision to meet the same, on the assumption that the Estimates for Votes 8 and 9 remain unchanged :—

Thirty-eight Ships intended by the New Programme to be Built in Her Majesty's Dockyards, the Cost of which is to be included in the Ordinary Estimates.

The difference between the amounts available for New Construction, &c., viz., £14,554,000, and the sums required to complete the New Programme, viz., £11,500,000 can be either utilised in laying down New Vessels, or in reducing the Estimates for the years 1892-93, 1893-94.

Thirty-two Ships included in the New Programme to be Constructed by Contract and paid for out of the Naval Defence Account.

—	1889-90.	1890-91.	1891-92.	1892-93.	1893-94.	1894-95.	1895-96.	TOTAL.

The Excess Expenditure in some years over the instalment payable from the Naval Defence Account will, as already explained, be met by Temporary Advances out of the Consolidated Fund, the interest thereon being charged to the ordinary Navy Estimates.

• Wiederholungsfragen

1. Was ist die Bedeutung der Wiederholungsfragen?

Die Wiederholungsfragen sind eine Möglichkeit für den Prüfling, seine Kenntnisse zu überprüfen und sich auf die eigentlichen Fragen vorzubereiten.

1. The first group of people who are likely to be affected by the proposed changes are those who are currently employed in the public sector. This group includes a wide range of individuals, from those who are employed in the public sector to those who are employed in the private sector. The proposed changes are likely to have a significant impact on the public sector, as it is the largest employer in the economy. The public sector is likely to be affected in a number of ways, including a reduction in the number of employees, a reduction in the number of hours worked, and a reduction in the number of jobs available. The public sector is also likely to be affected in a number of other ways, including a reduction in the number of jobs available, a reduction in the number of hours worked, and a reduction in the number of jobs available.
